I have urged my right hon. Friend for more and have given him much credit for what he has done, but I make three final pleas. The first is that we consider specific grant funding for the arts, down to local government. I know that that is not a matter for my right hon. Friend, but it is a message for him to pass on. Secondly, the BBC, ITV and the satellite companies—one thinks of the Sunday arts programmes on the old BSB Marcopolo channel—are good at portraying the arts, but they have not done museums and galleries proud, and they could do more to popularise those splendid national institutions.

Architecture does not yet have a national museum. The Royal Institute of British Architects has a gallery, but there is no national museum of architecture. I must declare an interest, in that my daughter is a student of architecture. Perhaps her work will one day qualify for inclusion in such a museum. Battersea power station in my constituency might be an appropriate building to house that museum. I hope that my right hon. Friend will pursue with vigour the idea of a museum of architecture.

The Museums and Galleries Commission said in its report:

> "The national museums are a magnificent inheritance, held in trust for the future; they are a national and international asset of unrivalled quality and also a significant economic asset."

That is right. It is also right that Members of Parliament are the trustees of those assets on behalf of our children and our children's children. We have a duty to ensure that they flourish. We also have a duty to ensure that our national museums fulfil their duty, set down by the Museums and Galleries Commission, to promote public understanding and enjoyment. If we combine those two purposes, the galleries and museums will be doing their job, and we shall be doing ours.

2.1 am

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): I congratulate the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) on his good fortune in securing this debate and on his good sense in selecting this subject for debate. Once again, he showed that he has a real knowledge and understanding of and an enthusiasm for the arts. I agree and sympathise with much that he said. I was particularly glad that he mentioned the needs of architecture, a subject to which I shall return. I suspect that the Minister is also grateful for this excellent opportunity to present to the House his policy on museums, something that until now he has been unable to do.

The Minister's inheritance is very interesting. It is a mixed inheritance, but much of it is extremely good. We have a superb range of museums that rightly enjoy an enormous international reputation, due to the quality of their curators. They are a match for anyone in the world, and they are admired and respected throughout the world for the scholarship, range and quality of the collections. Our reputation in international circles is growing, due to the quality of our exhibitions.

During the last few years, some of our national museums have been restored to their former greatness. Alfred Waterhouse's natural history museum has been restored to its original form and colour. When I was a child, I regarded it as a black, frightening and rather depressing building. It is now a joy to see the original pastel colours of the brick, which enable us to appreciate a great piece of 19th-century architecture.

Compared with 10 years ago, the number of people visiting our national museums has increased. The Tate in the North and the national museum of photography, film and television in Bradford are most welcome developments.

Given that the Minister has inherited a collection of national museums of such range and quality, that should offer him the basis for exciting expansion. Unfortunately, over the past few years the Government have tended to see it as an excuse for neglect. Our national museums are in an appalling state of repair. I differed from the hon. Member for Battersea when he seemed to say that the Government's record on buidlings was good. It is a disgrace.

The hon. Gentleman should know from talking to any of the directors of the national museums—the Tate, the Victoria and Albert and others—that the money needed runs into millions of pounds. The Tate identifies its need as £27 million or more. The V and A estimates that it needs £100 million just to put the building right. The Government have been in office now for 12 years, and the fact that thay have allowed this state of affairs to develop is not to their credit.

The hon. Member for Battersea recognised the Government's poor record on acquisition funds, many of which have been frozen for seven years. It is self-destructive to deny museums the ability to keep their collections up to date and to turn them into living organisms rather than just historic collections.

The hon. Gentleman seemed to misunderstand the problem of staffing and core funding of museums. He said that 80 per cent. of costs were staff-related. Because of the squeeze on museums' funding, museums such as the Victoria and Albert are finding that almost 100 per cent. of their grant in aid from the Office of Arts and Libraries goes on staffing costs. That is why staff numbers have been cut. There are unfilled vacancies in the British museum and the natural history museum. Posts in the museum of London have been terminated——

Mr. Bowis: I was thinking of the £189 million that has been allocated for buildings for the next three years. As for staffing, I echoed the recommendation of the Museums and Galleries Commission to the effect that staff pay was unfairly tied to civil service pay rates. The commission made a plea that the system should be loosened up, although it understood the difficulties that that might cause. I accept, however, that a high proportion of running costs are staff-related.

Mr. Fisher: The fabric of museums, acquisition funds and staff costs all present the Government and the country with a problem. Unfilled posts affect the services that museums can provide—in scholarship, in skills and in the management of their collections. It is because these elements of our great museums are under such pressure due to inadequate core funding that morale in many of them—I instance the natural history museum—is at such a low ebb.

The Minister's challenge is to put all this right. He will not have many weeks or months in which to do so, but he can at least make a start by putting right the financial neglect that is the legacy of his predecessors in office. The real problem has been—I hope that the Minister will discuss this—the fact that the Government have not had a museums policy. Rather, they have a hands-off financial policy that restricts public expenditure wherever possible, and passes on responsibility to others.

The Government claim that it is up to the trustees whether they charge for admission. The hon. Member for Battersea fell into that trap, when he said that there was no compulsion to charge, as though museums were looking for opportunities to charge. I challenge him to find a single director of a national museum who says that charging improves the quality of his museums, and that, no matter how well the Government fund it, he wants to charge for admission because it enriches its cultural, educational and scholastic skills. Both the hon. Gentleman and the Minister know that that is not so. Trustees of museums such as the science museum and the natural history museum have had to charge because they have had no other option. Inadequate Government funding is an implicit compulsion, and it is disingenuous to suggest anything else.

It is not good enough for the Government to pass on responsibility to the trustees and say that they have nothing to do with what goes on. They should accept responsibility for the core funding of our national museums, and not leave it all to sponsors. There are some good sponsors. For example, British Petroleum has done magnificent work in helping with the re-hang of the Tate. Nor is it good enough to leave it to earning income through shops. That does not address the scale of the capital and revenue needs of the national museums.

The Government's problem is that they have not formed a coherent view, because they do not appear to have a cultural view and valuation of museums or an educational view and valuation of museums. If they do have one, it is at odds with that of the Department of Education and Science. The hon. Member for Battersea will remember, because he served on the Committee that examined the Bill, that the Education Reform Act 1988 put a squeeze on school visits, and that has damaged museums.

The science museum does excellent work. Its education department has a superb and imaginative programme and 7,000 schools visit every year, but organised museum visits by schools are in decline because of the Government's education policies. I fear that the local management of schools will make that more rather than less acute. If the Government do not understand how crucial are museums for the educational future of our children and our country, they are misunderstanding the role of museums.

It is curious that the Government—who, to their credit, are saying through the GCSE syllabus and the national curriculum that children should have hands-on experience in science, history and the social sciences and go to prime resources to see the objects about which they are learning—are also perversely initiating policies that reduce the number of school visits and are so reducing the finances of national museums that they cannot expand their education departments to take the opportunities that those education policies are opening up.

What is most perverse is not that the Government do not have a cultural or educational perspective of museums but that they do not have an economic policy for them. One would have thought that this Government—the great proponents of the free market—would at least understand the economic impact of museums. The Policy Studies Institute and others have done plenty of work in this sector. Cities such as Bradford demonstrated in a condensed and clear form what an enormous contribution—not just through tourism but generally—the museums of this country make to economic life and employment.

One would have thought that that would commend itself to the Government and the Minister, and allow him to make a positive case for expansion in investment in museums, but that does not seem to be the case. The Government do not understand their own free market economic case. That may not be anything like as important as the cultural case, but it is still a potent argument, and one that the Minister's predecessors have not deployed sufficiently or effectively, because investment in museums has not increased as it should.

I ask the Minister to examine the opportunities that have opened up for the Government and for whomever is in government in the 1990s. He could make a start. I am sure that he has visited Glasgow, a city which has invested substantially in museums, including the Burrell, Kelvingrove and the People's Palace. The city has a coherent cultural, educational and economic view. It has deemed it worth while to put a large proportion of ratepayers' money into its museums and has changed the image and reputation of the city as a result, or substantially so. If the Government had had the same positive and imaginative approach towards the national museums that Glasgow has had to its city museums, the cultural reputation of the United Kingdom would be very different, and much higher.

Perhaps the Minister should travel a little, and not only to Glasgow. He should visit Paris, for example. I am sure that he would enjoy the visit enormously. The French Government have grasped the opportunities that were available in the 1980s for national museums. They have opened up the old Gare d'Orsay into the Musée d'Orsay. They have opened a huge new science museum at La Villette, which involved vast investment. They have created the Pompidou centre, which is visited by 7·5 million a year. To take up the remarks of the hon. Member for Battersea about architecture, they have opened in the Asenal a huge centre that is effectively a forum and museum for study and for focusing debate on architecture.

[Mr. Fisher]

They have contributed considerably to greater interest and enthusiasm in public architecture, and in its quality too. The private sector is included, as well as the public sector.

The Minister would enjoy visiting the museums and centres to which I have referred. I believe that he would return inspired. If he takes a trip to Paris, he should extend his journey by travelling to Frankfurt. There he would see the most spectacular example of a city where the commitment to expanding its cultural sector and its museums is reflected in almost every street. Frankfurt has an extremely good architectural museum. It has commissioned new architects such as Richard Meier to create new museums such as the kunstandwerk museum and the museum of ethnology, which will open in 1992. There is Hans Hollem's museum of modern art and Unger's ikonmuseum. The Rothschild mansion has been converted into the Judisches museum. There is the museum of antique sculpture and Josef Kleihner's museum of pre and early history. If the Minister visited Frankfurt, he would see a city that has a pride in its past and a confidence in its future. It has invested in museums and is reaping the benefit in the number of visitors that it is attracting. The museum sector is making an important contribution to the identity and cohesion of the city.

We have a much stronger starting base in our national museums. If only we had a Government with the confidence to invest, we could grasp the opportunities that are available to us. When we compare what has happened in Paris over the past 10 years and what is happening in Frankfurt with the national museums in London, we see that our record is a bleak one. The only two substantial museums that have opened in the past few years in London have been the design museum and the museum of the moving image. Neither has received a penny from public funding.

The design museum is preparing plans and an argument —this is, if it is to develop and fulfil its enormously exciting potential—for public investment. I hope that the Minister will be sympathetic. Sir Terence Conlan and the other trustees who have set up the museum have created something in which we as a society should invest. They have given us the opportunity, and we should grasp it. Similarly, if we are ever to revive our film industry, the museum of the moving image must be recognised as worthy of public support.

There is something for the Minister to go at as well. He has a superb base to start with, but he also has a great deal of work to do to recover the lost ground which has been allowed to slide away in the last 12 years in buildings, in the frozen nature of acquisitions and in the crisis in staffing.

The Minister has probably only a few weeks left in office. Perhaps he could start on that agenda now and enjoy himself by going to Paris and Frankfurt. He could come back inspired to make a better stab at it in future.

2.19 am

The Minister for the Arts (Mr. Tim Renton): We have had a short, entertaining and useful debate. I am flattered that the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) wishes me to spend, as he put it, my last few weeks as Arts Minister touring Frankfurt and Paris. Perhaps there is malign intent. Perhaps he feels that if I did that he would have a greater chance of taking my job than would otherwise be likely.

I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) for arranging for us to have the debate, even at this unfriendly hour, and I thank him for his elegant and well-informed words on museums and galleries. He quoted Walter de la Mare in regard to the sense almost of timelessness that one has when debating at 2 o'clock in the morning. That sense of timelessness is perhaps appropriate to the subject of museums. As he was quoting Walter de la Mare, I was thinking of the lines of Andrew Marvell in introduction to his short poem, "To His Coy Mistress":

> "Had we but world enough, and time,
> This coyness, Lady, were no crime.
> We would sit down, and think which way
> To walk, and pass our long love's day.

That is a good way to consider how to fill a debate at 2 o'clock in the morning. At that moment we were disturbed by the arrival of the hon. Member for Asfield (Mr. Haynes)—I am sorry that he has left the Chamber, but in no sense could the word "coy" ever be applied to the hon. Gentlemen, so my thoughts of Andrew Marvell disappeared quickly.

Mr. Fisher: The Minister should reconsider his incitement to the House to go along the lines of Andrew Marvell. He will know that the rest of the poem is about fornication, or seduction leading to fornication. I am not sure that the House should indulge in that poem, if that is what he meant.

Mr. Renton: On the other hand, in his closing words, the hon. Gentleman, was trying to remind me of the refrain in that poem:

> "But at my back I always hear > Time's winged chariot hurrying near."

That is precisely why he was telling me to go off to Frankfurt rather quickly.

In the course of yesterday, which already seems a long time ago, I had the opportunity to visit two museums. During both visits I was reminded of some of the points that my hon. Friend the Minister for Battersea has made, but also of our efficacy in dealing with some of the problems about which he spoke. Between my visits to the two museums, I had a short time at the Dulwich art gallery which is well known to my hon. Friend the Minister for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden), who was kind enough to be with us during this debate.

The first museum which I visited yesterday was the Horniman. I was there for the opening of the exhibition devoted to Yoruba, a celebration of African art. That exhibition is a remarkable departure for the Horniman. It is unlike the museum's normal ethnographic exhibitions and its well-known exhibition of musical instruments. It shows great enterprise. It will appeal to many people, and especially to the Afro-Caribbeans who live in the area; they will have the opportunity to see an important display of past and contemporary African, and particularly Nigerian, art.

More specifically, I was shown by the director of the museum the lift that is being installed for the disabled so that it will be easier for them to visit the aquarium when it re-opens later this year. The museum has spent quite a lot of money on renovating it. Some of the money was from an improvement grant, jointly funded by ourselves and the Wolfson charities.

The other museum that I visited in the course of the last 24 hours was the Soane museum in Lincoln's Inn, which is receiving substantial repairs to its roof, funded by the MEPC property company and my office—each contributing £1 million over five years. That work will, among other things, enable the antiquities collected by Sir John Soane to be restored to his study, and for part of the museum's huge collection of architectural prints by Soane and Adam to be viewed by tourists and other visitors in a manner not previously possible.

At both those small but important museums, we are undertaking—with the help of sponsorship, private patrons, or charities such as the Wolfson foundation—the kind of improvements mentioned by the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central, enabling collections to be better displayed, and allowing the disabled an opportunity to enjoy them more easily.

I am delighted to see my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces in his place, and I am sure that the Whip on the bench will convey to him the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea about the RAF museum at Hendon.

The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central, not surprisingly, made a certain amount of play about lack of museum funding, to which I shall refer shortly. More importantly, he accused the Government of a lack of policy and having no sense of vision. My hon. Friend the Member for Battersea referred to a recent change of outlook. There might have been some measure of truth four or five years ago in the observation of the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central. In the mid-1980s, the museum world suffered a crisis of confidence, which coincided with lengthy consideration by my distinguished predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham (Mr Luce), of whether to introduce museum admission charges.

My right hon. Friend reached the conclusion that the decision should be left to the museums' individual management, trustees, or boards of director. It is official Labour party policy not to continue with charging. Setting aside the question of undermining the philosophy behind that policy, what does the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central suggest should be done, for example, in the case of the museum of the moving image, which was specifically introduced as a museum that charged admission, and which intends to meet its expenses as a result? Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that its costs should be met entirely from public funds? If so, that would be a foolish reversal of the policy adopted by that extremely successful museum. The hon. Gentleman seems anxious to get to his feet to tell the House that Labour intends to place yet another burden on the taxpayer, so I will allow him time to do so.

Mr. Fisher: The Minister has not been long in post, but he ought to have read his background briefing. Our criticism of charging for admission relates to public museums, for which the state has a responsibility. No one disputes the right of independent museums throughout the country, such as the museum of the moving image, which are not part of that network, to make admission charges. We argue only against charging at nationally funded museums for which the public have a responsibility, and in respect of which the Government have a duty to widen access, not diminish it. It is the decline in access that is the consequence of the imposition of admission charges that we so deplore.

Mr. Renton: The hon. Gentleman is playing with words. The museum of the moving image is part of the south bank centre.

Mr. Fisher: It is independently funded and does not receive public money.

Mr. Renton: The south bank centre is not totally privately funded. It gets a large part of its funds from the Government, from the Office of Arts and Libraries, from my Department, and there is that important space available which, if it were not used for a charging museum, could be used for something else.

However, I do not think that that is a proper line for us to pursue at the moment. As with so many issues, I do not think that the Labour party has worked out its policy clearly on this.

The directors of both the science museum and the natural history museum—the two most evident museums which decided, with their trustees, to introduce charges—pointed out to me, in discussions that I have had with them since becoming Minister for the Arts, the improvements in service and display that have derived from charging in their establishments. They do not think that charging is a backward step. They reckon that, for example, it has prompted them to provide much better services within the museum for their customers.

I do not think that the directors of those two museums would wish to recoil and depart from the charging principle. Charging gives them financial flexibilities, which derive from self-engendered funding because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea asked, the moneys that they bring in from charging are not deducted from their three-year funding but are in addition and they have flexibility as to how they are used.

As regards the broader point, the decisions that flowed from charging brought about the new atmosphere—the change in outlook to which my hon. Friend referred. Now, we have a far greater sense of confidence in many of our national museums—a sense of direction, or knowledge in where they are trying to go to—than was the case five years ago. We see that in the exhibitions and the displays that those museums are putting on.

Much publicity has been given to the new ecology gallery at the natural history museum. It has been described in exciting terms:

> "One end of this 50 yard long chasm is a life-size replica of a patch of rain forest, made of plastic. At the other, mirrors and a square-shaped wall of 20 video screens are combined to give the illusion of a huge animated hemisphere. The on-screen images trace the hydrological cycle of rainfall, evaporation and cloud formation."

What is the purpose of that? It is to show off in the natural history museum the basic history of ecology in a manner that is exciting and scientifically correct, but will stimulate interest among families and children.

It is that evolution towards exciting, often "hands-on", displays at the natural history museum, the science museum, the imperial war museum—with their recently opened "experiences" which go by the names of Blitz and Trench—and increasingly at the national maritime museum, and the determination to show off their collections in a manner that the public will find attractive and interesting, but that will not detract from experts' interest, that is giving a new sense of confidence and determination to so many of our national museums.

They are not all there yet. Here I agree with the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central. Some of our major museums are still in some doubts as to the direction in which they should go, and have difficulty in making the decisions as to how they can both win over the family with interesting exhibitions, yet keep the interest of the experts who have used access to their museums for so long.

By and large, however, the pattern is clear now and there is a far greater sense of determination in our national museums—a sense of where they want to go—which is reflected in the attendance figures. Last year, the estimate for attendance at national museums and galleries—for which I am responsible—was more than 20 million, 5·7 per cent. up on the year before. I believe that that trend will continue, and that more and more people will visit the museums and galleries as they solve the problems with which they were faced in the 1980s.

An important trend, referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea, is represented by the decision of my predecessor—my right hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham—to improve training, through the Museums Training Institute, for all who work in museums. In January 1989, my right hon. Friend announced the establishment of the institute, which would be responsible for the strategic development of training by establishing standards, validating courses, and providing training in selected areas. I consider that an important priority, which is emphasised by our commitment to provide significant support for the institute's activities—£400,000 in the current financial year.

Although the institute has not been going for long, it has already made significant achievements. It has been accorded official status as the lead body for the museums and heritage industry; it has established a steering committee that will develop a standards framework; and it is establishing 12 functional groups that will deal with the provision of training in a number of important areas such as collections and management, exhibition design, fund-raising and sponsorship, technical work, research, conservation, education and retail sales.

The aim is to ensure that anyone who enters the museum service—whether at the young age of 16, or later in life—not only has the opportunity to be trained upwards, so that he can progress from being, say, an attendant to becoming a museum director or curator, but has a certificate to give him the chance of a professional qualification that will give him better job security, or make it easier for him to transfer from one museum to another. That aspect has been neglected in the past, but I think that our aim is important and that even Opposition Members will wish it success.

My hon. Friend the Member for Battersea said some kind words about the increase in our funding of museums and galleries, which—inevitably—were contradicted immediately by the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central. I should not have expected anything else, but I remind hon. Members that, in the financial year that we are entering, our grant in aid for the national museums and galleries will increase by 8·5 per cent., from £99 million to £107 million.

Building and maintenance are a problem. That stems from the fact that so many of our great museums and galleries were built at the end of the Victorian age. The Victoria and Albert museum, for instance, was not very well built. Its construction involved experimentation with new materials. Because it was regarded as a museum for manufactures, it was considered appropriate to try out, for example, new types of concrete which were not always successful. Now, however, we are well aware of the problems of building and maintenance, which is why we are allocating £59 million for that purpose in the year ahead. That represents an increase of 115 per cent., after inflation, since 1979-80, when we came into office. Over the next three years, the allocation will be more than £189 million.

It was to review and assess the total building and renovation needs of our museums and galleries that, soon after taking up my post, I appointed Arup Research and Development. It is a problem because of the age of the buildings involved, and it is for that reason that the advice to be given to me Arup, who will report by the end of the summer, will be very useful indeed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) also asked me whether I proposed to continue to tie the wages and salary conditions of museum staff to civil service grades. This is an area in which I keep an open mind; I have not yet reached final decisions on the future pay regime for national museums and galleries staff. I have no immediate intention of making changes. There is now a wide range of pay and personnel flexibilities, as my hon. Friend will know, available within the civil service arrangements. It is nevertheless an area where it is worth keeping an open mind, always remembering the possibility that there should be changes.

My hon. Friend the Member for Battersea also asked me about disposals from collections. He will know, because he is very much an expert in this area, that disposal of items from national museum and gallery collections is a matter for the trustees of the institutions concerned; they must always consider whether it is within the constraints of their governing legislation. We would all feel that benefactors of museums and galleries should be confident that their wishes will be treated with respect by the institution concerned. If there is any increasing threat that gifts and collections are likely to be disposed of, I can imagine nothing that would make it more certain that a particular museum did not receive further gifts; donations to it would totally dry up.

It is against that background that I, like my hon. Friend, am very worried to note that Derbyshire county council has recently sent 17 works from its museum service to be auctioned. This will cause a great deal of distress to many people in Derbyshire. I have no statutory power to prevent that, but it would be wholly contradictory to the Museums Association code of practice if the proceeds from the disposal of those items were used for any purpose other than the purchase of additional items.

I would add for the future that, if this were to continue to happen, and if the Derbyshire museums were registered—as my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea will know, we are proceeding with registering all museums through the Museums and Galleries Commission—but then disposed of items in this manner, they would be de-registered and thus not be eligible for any of the moneys or grants available through the Museums and Galleries Commission, either from my office or from the Wolfson charities. That would be a considerable penalty and inhibition for them.

Mr. Bowis: I wonder, in that case, whether that should be made clear to all such institutions which may wish to benefit from registration in the future?

Mr. Renton: That is an interesting point. If it is not already clear to them as they apply for registration with the Museums and Galleries Commission, I will make certain that it does become plain to them.

I very much agreed with my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea when he quoted the words of the Museums and Galleries Commission on our duty to ensure that the museums flourished. I note that, in the recent booklet put out by the Area Museums Council, the Museums and Galleries Commission is quoted as saying:

"In the present boom in museum popularity"—

I remind the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central of those words—

"two things are vital, the setting of standards and achieving the most with the least."

I do not know that I would have used the words "the most with the least", but I think that museums are now very much more aware of giving the public enjoyment combined with value for money, and that both are perfectly correct aims for them to try to achieve.

In my view, three particular duties fall on the museums —to maintain the standards of education, to show off their collections to the best possible advantage, and to provide opportunities for new enjoyment for family and recreational interest. While I am Minister for the Arts, I shall certainly seek to ensure that the museums for which I am responsible pursue these policies.

Black Soldiers

2.44 am

Ms. Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): For many months, the nation's imagination has been focused on its armed services. Ever since the outbreak of hostilities in the Gulf, on every news bulletin there has been news film of our troops. As those troops return home from the Gulf, it seems an appropriate time to examine the position of black people in the armed services.

If it is indeed sweet and fitting to die for one's country, there can be no doubt that it is fitting for all our soldiers to be treated equally, both in recruitment and in their career prospects once they are in the armed services. I question whether that is actually the case. The history of black people serving in Britain's armed services goes back a long time. We do not hear much about it in the official history of world war two, but as many as 8,000 West Indians served in the Royal Air Force. Each year, I attend the West Indian ex-service men's Remembrance day service, where we remember the West Indians who died in the service of this country. Of course, the Indian army also played an important role in defeating the Germans and the Japanese.

The current evidence suggests that, far from being treated equally, black people in the armed services are under-represented. There are recurrent and tragic cases of brutal racial assault on black soldiers, which with monotonous regularity force them to leave the armed services. There is also evidence that black people have been kept out of certain regiments.

On the point about under-representation, although black involvement in the armed services has a long history —black air crew, black soldiers, black munitions workers and black forestry workers, who served in this country during the war—sadly, it has always been one of colour bar and segregation. When the war broke out in 1939, black students from Oxford, Cambridge and Newcastle who went to join the officer training corps found themselves banned. In the end, despite much agitation and pressure from the Colonial Office, only a handful of black men gained admission.

As late as 1943, the Royal Navy recruiting regulations stated:

"Black and coloured boys and any person in whom there is evidence of such parentage are absolutely ineligible for entry unless with special sanction of the Admiralty."

That theme ran through the recruitment attitude, both official and unofficial, of the armed services throughout the war.

For years during the 1960s there was a very strict quota limiting the number of black recruits. At the beginning of the 1960s it was 2 per cent., and towards the end it was 4 per cent. Throughout the 1960s, there were some regiments that would not accept any black recruits. That was revealed in a War Office memorandum that was published in newspapers during that decade. The regiments that would officially accept no black recruits include the Household Cavalry, the foot guards, the Highland regiments, the Lowland regiments, the Royal Military police, the intelligence corps and the physical training corps. There was an official quota, and black people were officially excluded from certain regiments.

[Ms. Diane Abbott]

All that was legally swept away by the Race Relations Act 1968, but I suggest that that history of official segregation and exclusion still casts its shadow over the policies and practices of the armed services today.

When applicants were monitored in 1987, MOD figures showed that black people comprised only 1·6 per cent. of the applicants when black people of the particular age range applying to join the armed services constituted 5·7 per cent. of the population. There is a much lower application rate among young black men and women. Worse, there is a much lower success rate.

There is a perception, which no one has been able to prove one way or the other, that once black people get into the armed services, their chances of promotion are not good. In that regard, I want to quote Scotty Muir, an ex-bugler. He left the armed services because he was disillusioned. He said:

"I feel strongly about people not getting promoted because of their colour. You can go to Northern Ireland and get killed. You can do just about everything else, but you can't get promoted."

Recent research that the MOD commissioned from Peat, Marwick, McLintock revealed that young black people are unwilling to apply to join the armed services because they believe that they would encounter racism. That leads me to my other point, about the recurrent incidents of brutal racist violence meted out to young black people who join the armed services.

The case of Stephen Anderson was in the courts last year. He joined the Devon and Dorset Regiment in 1983, and he was the only black soldier in his platoon. For that he suffered continued abuse. One night he was pulled from his bed at 1.30 am, beaten up and called a nigger. The beatings went on for two years and he finally suffered a nervous breakdown. He had to go on a hunger strike before any action was taken against his tormentors.

To give the House an idea of the closing ranks around that kind of brutality, I want to refer to a television programme entitled "Trooping the Colour" which was broadcast in 1989. A white ex-machine gunner was interviewed on the programme. Preferring to remain anonymous, he described how he had, by chance, seen a particularly brutal assault on a black soldier who received a cracked jaw and ribs and was covered in blood. He was rushed to hospital.

The machine gunner decided to report the soldiers who had carried out the attack to the appropriate authorities, partly to protect himself and his friends—to prevent them from being wrongly accused—and partly because he genuinely believed that that was the right thing to do. For doing that he had, in today's modern Army, to put up with months—which turned into years—of bullying. He was hissed and threatened and in the end he had to leave the Army.

I have spoken to members of the West Indian Ex-Servicemen's Association who have left the British Army in recent years. They say that such brutality is not uncommon, and inevitably young men leave the Army without any redress and with their dreams of serving their country in uniform shattered.

In evidence to the Select Committee on Defence when it examined the matter in 1987, the then Secretary of State for Defence struck a note of quite extraordinary pomposity and complacency:

"Once people are in the Services, as far as we are concerned they are British service men and we are no longer interested in their racial background."

That is a travesty of the truth. The service men who assault people like Stephen Anderson are very interested in racial background. The service men who abuse black young service men, make their lives a misery and drive them out of the armed services are very interested in racial background. Defence Ministers would do young black soldiers a great service if they left behind that kind of hypocrisy and fraudulent colour blindness and instead took seriously the brutality that is being meted out to young black soldiers in the armed services.

Now I come to the exclusion of black soldiers from certain regiments. Newspaper reports show that in 1986 the heir to the throne, Prince Charles, queried the absence of any black guardsmen. The attitude of the Guards on the matter is probably best expressed in a quote that I found in The Daily Telegraph from an anonymous guardsman. He said of the possibility of black guardsmen:

"It doesn't look right; you don't know where the bearskin ends and the face begins."

Young black men were officially kept out of the Household Cavalry, the foot guards and the Highland and Lowland brigades until 1968. It is hard not to suspect that that tradition, although technically and legally a thing of the past, remains in the memory of the people currently responsible for recruiting guardsmen.

Many of the people who are listening or will read this debate will remember Guardsman Richard Stokes, who was one of the first black men, if not the first, to enter the Guards. Who can forget the pictures of him in the newspapers in his uniform, full of pride with his white adoptive parents on one side and his black mother who gave him up for adoption when he was very small on the other? It ought to have been the culmination of his hopes and the beginning of a career that would do credit to him, his family and the British armed forces.

But what happened to Richard Stokes, who entered the armed services at 17 full of innocence and high hopes, only wanting to join what he regarded as a top regiment, was a tragedy. Less than three years after the pictures of him joining the Guards were all over the newspapers he left the Guards in disillusion. He had had to endure the unendurable—Nazi jibes, knife threats, racist taunts. He would enter the canteen and his colleagues would bang their plates all at the same time and make monkey noises. Colleagues of his have described the sustained humiliation and threats of violence that he had to endure throughout what must have seemed three long years in the Guards.

Another young black man who tried to join the Guards was one Khalil Janjua. He again had the same experience. He suffered harassment. He found excrement in his bed. In the end, he could not take the abuse, stress and threats. He ended his Army career waiting on tables. Mike Hermanis was driven out of the Welsh Gaurds by the same combination of abuse and violence. What was official policy until 1968 is still unofficial policy now. Despite everything that Prince Charles and others may hint and say, it is the view of the Guards that that there is no place in the regiment for a black soldier.

I must say at this point, having framed this speech very much in the context of the profile that our armed services have had in the past months, that what happens in the British armed services compares unfavourably with the United States system. Who can imagine the British system producing a Colin Powell, who is the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff of the American armed services? Yet when the Defence Select Committee put to the then Defence Secretary, the right hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger), that it might just be possible that the British armed services would benefit from studying how the American armed services handled these matters, he was defensive and said time and again that he was "resolutely opposed to any such system."

British Defence Ministers seem absolutely certain that they have nothing to learn from the United States military system. But I would say that in those armed services at least it was shown that that man could rise to the top on merit. Who would deny that Colin Powell, in his direction of allied forces and in his presentation of the case to the media, rose to the top absolutely on merit? On the one hand, there is a system in which a black man can rise to the absolute top on absolute merit and, on the other, there is a system in which, regularly and systematically, appalling tales of racism and brutality leak out. Are Ministers really so certain that they have nothing to learn from the American armed services in this matter?

I have quoted the cases of ex-service men and I have referred to well-publicised incidents, some of which ended up as court cases. I am sure that the Minister will make the point that we do not know how many black service men are forced out of the military. We do not know how high they rise or the number of black service men in each regiment. We do not know for certain that they are being kept out of the Guards. We do not know, because the Ministry of Defence has resolutely refused to institute monitoring that would reveal such results.

In 1987, the Select Committee on Defence—not a radical organisation—pressed the idea that, at the very least, the Ministry of Defence should monitor recruitment by regiment so that we could know whether it was true or an assumption that certain regiments were trying to prevent young black men from joining. The Ministry of Defence has resolutely set its face against monitoring recruitment by regiment, or by cap badge as it is called, and against detailed monitoring that would reveal the exact career opportunities for our young black men in the armed services.

Instead, we are asked to put our confidence in the protestations of Ministers that the British Army is colour blind. It was not colour blind to the young men whom I have mentioned who were forced out of the services, having had to endure in every case the years of taunts, of brutality and of threats.

Monitoring is the only way in which to prove that certain regiments do not discriminate, and the only way in which black young men, once they join the armed services, can experience fairness and equality, and have the same career chances as young white men. I am sorry to say—the Minister may find this unacceptable—that I am not prepared to put my faith in the well-meaning intentions of Ministers. I and the public want information on which to base our views.

When Ministers say, as the Minister may say tonight, that there are difficulties in monitoring, that it is not really acceptable and has no place in the Army, I must point out —the Select Committee report brought this out—that the Army practised monitoring throughout the 1960s to keep black people out. It kept racial records meticulously throughout the 1960s to ensure that the number of black people coming into the service did not exceed the quotas. If the armed services practised monitoring in the 1960s to keep black people out, why is it so difficult for them to practise monitoring now to ensure that black people are given a fair chance?

The armed services remain alone among large, public sector employers such as the national health service and the civil service in not having a comprehensive ethnic monitoring system. I do not suggest that keeping figures and number crunching is all, but given the steady stream of distressing cases of brutal assaults on black soldiers and the hearsay evidence that black persons do not have the career chances in our services that white service men have, the way in which Ministers have set their face against proper monitoring by regiment and against comprehensive monitoring suggests complacency about the problem.

In 1944, talking about Britain's armed services, the Colonial Office said:

"We must keep up the fiction of there being no colour bar."

Again in 1944, the War Office said:

"British troops do not take kindly to being commanded by coloured officers. Further, the presence of coloured officers in a unit in peacetime is apt to be a source of embarrassment."

I put it to the Minister that the position now in practice is not much different from what it was 50 years ago. The notion that there is no colour bar in the armed services is a fiction, and the resistance in the armed services to troops being commanded by coloured officers is perhaps just as strong as it was 50 years ago.

May we have monitoring by Government in line with the 1987 report of the Select Committee on Defence, so that we can establish once and for all that certain regiments are not excluding black applicants? Can we monitor promotion systematically to demonstrate that black soldiers in the British Army have the same chance of promotion as white soldiers? We must learn from the American experience. The careers of Colin Powell and dozens of other black American soldiers suggest that the American armed services, perhaps alone among such institutions, have constructed a system in which black and white can compete in genuine equality.

Above all, I ask Ministers to stop pretending that racist violence does not happen in the Army. It is not horse play; it is not teasing. It results in people being hospitalised, and it has driven people in a steady flow out of the armed services.

We learned today that the Government intend to set up a royal commission on our criminal system. Racism experienced by black soldiers in the armed services is so great and reflects so poorly on our society that this is an issue which itself deserves a royal commission. The Ministry of Defence has been told many times what it should do, but it resists blatantly, and meanwhile the Stephen Andersons and dozens of other unknown victims are continuing to suffer.

If black soldiers are good enough to die for Britain, they are good enough to be treated fairly. The test of a society and the test of equality in a society is how its different groups are reflected in the society's institutions. The armed services are one of Britain's institutions; they are one of the pillars of British society. The reports of brutality and racism in the armed services, the blatant absence of black soldiers from some of our most distinguished and celebrated regiments, and the fixed unwillingness of the Ministry of Defence to look at practices in other countries are a blot on Britain's reputation for fairness and equality.

[Ms. Diane Abbott]

Among the thousands of soldiers who return from the Gulf will be many black soldiers who never thought when they were in the desert risking their lives that perhaps they should not be doing so because Britain was not their country because they were black. They are as British as anyone and I demand for them in the House this evening not special treatment, not positive discrimination, but equality; an equality which I believe, from what I have learnt and heard, and from my own researches, does not exist at this time for our black service men.

There is a sad and tragic history of segregation and racism in the British armed services. In the last years of the 20th century it is time finally to close that chapter.

3.8 am

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North): Despite the lateness of the hour, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms. Abbott) on raising this subject and giving us another opportunity to consider it.

The subject has been debated a number of times, which highlights its importance. It has been put well not only by my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington but, previously, by my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) and, from the Front Bench, by my hon. Friend the Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) and my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers), who has tried to highlight it in the past two years.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington said that, in the past few months, quite naturally, her attention has been riveted on events in the Gulf. We are proud of the efficiency, discipline and prowess of our service men and women who served in the Gulf and of those who have been on active service for about 20 years in Northern Ireland but are sometimes forgotten in the drama of the Arabian peninsula.

When those young men and women risked their lives, no one asked their race, religion, creed or colour. War and the risk of death do not discriminate on grounds of creed or colour. As my hon. Friend said, tremendous interest and concern was expressed about the correctness of the Gulf tactics and strategy of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. There was much less concern, in the drama of the moment, about the fact that he was black; that did not enter into the equation during that period of emergency and drama.

As in war, so it should be in peace, but, unfortunately, that has not always been true in the British Army. Tragically, the facts show that the problem, which I hope is recognised by the Government, remains. The Minister has spoken of recognising the problem, but it is obvious to any objective observer that, despite the efforts that have been made—Labour Members have some criticisms of the speed with which those efforts have been pursued—the ethnic composition of our armed forces does not reflect the ethnic composition of the population.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington reminded us of the long and proud history of black service men and women in the armed forces, and of the less than proud history of discrimination —official or otherwise—in the British armed forces. Tragically, although not officially, that discrimination still exists. As my hon. Friend said, figures drawn from the labour force survey, which are well known, show that only 1·6 per cent. of applicants to all the armed services were from ethnic minorities. That represents less than one third of the proportionate make-up of the 15 to 24 age group from which one would normally expect applications to the armed forces.

The Government are aware of the figures and the problem. That awareness led to the commissioning of the Peat, Marwick, McLintock consultative document entitled "Ethnic Minority Recruitment to the Armed Services". I welcome that initiative, as did Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen at the time.

The report was published in response to a number of disturbing suspicions, but it raised other disturbing points. The most important and the most disturbing was the revelation that those from ethnic minorities were more, not less, likely to expect racial discrimination within the armed forces if they had already had some contact with the services. Expectation of discrimination by the ethnic minorities is therefore based not on fear of the unknown but on precisely the opposite. Expectation of discrimination on the part of ethnic minorities is heightened by familiarity rather than by ignorance of the practices of the armed forces.

Some idea of that experience is conveyed—admittedly in anecdotal fashion—in a recent book by Antony Beevor entitled "Inside the British Army." The author is not, to my knowledge, black, but it is worth repeating what he has to say. He served as an officer in the British Army for a considerable number of years. He has no particular axe to grind, and what he has to say about the issue may interest my hon. Friend:

"Racial harassment is an equally vexed issue. The Army, which is trying hard to bring in more recruits from ethnic minorities, is deeply embarrassed and angered by the tabloid treatment of the subject: the spectacle of the Sun setting itself up as a champion of racial tolerance sticks in many throats."

There the author is referring to the sensationalised reports that always appear whenever cases of bullying or racial discrimination in the Army occur. He then said:

"Yet senior officers do not like to admit how little can be done. Military life is likely to appeal to teenagers with skinhead prejudices, and one or two vitriolic characters are enough to stir up trouble against a black recruit. Once again, self-appointed guardians of the barrack-block flame think that to chase out blacks is to defend the honour of the regiment. They get away with it because the soldier's code against grassing is almost as strong as the underworld's, and because NCOs and officers often prefer not to acknowledge what is happening."

We do not have to agree with all those sentiments, particularly with what would no doubt be regarded as slanderous by many recruits about the skinhead tendencies. Nevertheless, when someone in the author's position goes out of his way to highlight the problem in a book about the British Army, it should be treated seriously.

Interestingly enough, the author goes on to give an example of something that parallels in a small way the fact referred to by my hon. Friend: that during times of emergency few people care to ask about a person's colour or creed:

"In the Parachute Regiment or the Royal Marines, racial harassment is relatively rare, once again because entrants are judged much more by the way they bear up under the arduous selection procedures. Overt racism is also likely to occur less when there are already a number of coloured soldiers serving in the unit, mainly because other newcomers are not prey to a frightening isolation. If the Army is to send members of ethnic minorities into the Guards, then it must not send in one token figure at a time, doomed to draw all the fire. (Although no figures are available, some officers are certain that the number of black soldiers has declined in the last decade. One Green Jackets officer estimated that nearly 10 per cent. of their soldiers were black in the 1970s). Apart from the Green Jackets and the Parachute Regiment, the only infantry regiments with a noticeable number are south-eastern and Midland regiments, nearly all in the Queen's Division."

That is anecdotal evidence, and one does not have to agree with every word in Beevor's book to accept that there is a continuing problem, especially in certain regiments. The Guards are the most continually referred to by objective analysts and by those who have first-hand experience of them.

The problem was most dramatically highlighted in November of last year, when a decision by the Army to deny a black soldier, Private Anderson, any compensation or redress after he had suffered racial abuse was quashed in the High Court. That was an important case, in that it established that the armed forces have no less a duty in cases of racial discrimination than has any other institution in civilian life. Indeed, they may have an even greater responsibility. The Anderson case signalled to members of ethnic minorities outside and inside the armed services that racial discrimination has no place in modern society or in the institutions established and maintained to protect and defend that society and its freedoms.

Some have argued that any institution that reflects society is bound to contain some people who suffer from the prejudices that—tragically—still exist in that society. That must not lessen the need for vigilance and prompt action against those who display such prejudices; because if those prejudices are allowed to grow and feed on themselves, they encourage a vicious circle which can only make the problem worse.

Every act of racial discrimination in the armed forces only encourages the perception of those forces—however wrong it may be—as institutions in which prejudice flourishes. Every strengthening of that perception decreases the likelihood of ethnic minority applications to enlist in the armed forces. In its turn, each decrease in enlistment serves only to isolate members of the ethnic communities already serving, and creates the conditions for further discrimination.

So the vicious circle continues, and we end up with the figures for 1988: only 1·7 per cent. of more than 50,000 applications for the Army came from the ethnic minorities. Only 1·5 per cent. of more than 17,000 applications for the Royal Air Force came from them; and only 1·4 per cent. of more than 21,000 applications to join the Royal Navy came from the same source.

Furthermore, the Minister must know that it is not only a matter of applications. Among the tiny proportion who applied at all, the rate of success in applications from the ethnic minorities was significantly lower—just over 19 per cent., as against more than 28 per cent. for white applications. This matter, which has already been brought to the Minister's attention, deserves further study. We hope that he will discuss it in this debate.

The Government have been unusually silent on a number of issues of late. The Minister has been asked several questions over the past 18 months. To be fair, the crisis, and latterly the hostilities, in the Golf may well have taken priority over those questions. That is perfectly understandable. However, as the Peat, Marwick, McLintock report made plain, the services must not only do something about the problem: they must be seen to be doing something about fostering applications from and enlistment by the ethnic minorities.

That report is often referred to, so perhaps it is worth seeing that comment in its context and looking at some of the recommendations in the report. About its contention that the armed forces must be seen to be doing something, the report said:

"With regard specifically to the ethnic minority community, it is the poor image of the Services on racial issues which is the single most important reason for low application rates. However, our research does suggest that there is scope to alter perceptions of the Services, particularly in relation to other employers. To achieve this change in perceptions the Services must be seen to be doing something. The external strategy must be complemented by a willingness to show the public what is being done in the internal strategy; recommended changes to internal procedures cannot be carried out behind closed doors—they must be seen to be believed."

It is important and urgent that that perception among ethnic minorities of the armed forces of the Crown is changed and changed rapidly, because if it is allowed to grow, it will inevitably become an insurmountable problem.

I have a parallel case, in which the circumstances are, I admit, different. It shows that, on one ethnic minority in one part of this kingdom, the pressure not to join the armed forces is even greater, often because it is backed by bullets. It is a tragedy that, whereas 20 per cent. of those in the Ulster Defence Regiment in the early 1970s were Roman Catholics, now only 3 per cent. are. That case is not a close parallel with the issue that we are debating, but I use it to show the vicious circle that is created if we allow to continue the perception that the armed forces tolerate or even foster within their ranks elements that perpetrate either racial harassment or racial discrimination and do not deal with it speedily and effectively.

The Peat, Marwick, McLintock report suggested a number of possible courses of action. First, for one group among the ethnic minorities—those for whom a career in the armed forces is not even a considered option—it suggested that the Government should consider changing perceptions of the services. It said:

"Such an objection will be achieved by means of a long term image building strategy targeted at young people".

That does not mean a superficial glossy approach. It means that there must be positive thinking within the services, not only about the virtues of the recruitment, enlistment and promotion of members of the ethnic minorities but about how that might be presented in a convincing fashion. It will convince the ethnic minorities only if it is genuine.

The report makes a series of other recommendations. I hope that the Minister will be able to tell us—the Gulf war notwithstanding—how far the Government have got not only in considering them but implementing them. For instance, so as to address perceptions of racism in the services, it is suggested that the purpose of such a campaign would be to show a more positive side of the experiences of ethnic minority service personnel.

There are always risks in such a strategy. A few years ago, it became necessary to have a more positive image of women in the services. That campaign walked the tightrope between the widely held view outside that every woman who entered the services was a butch lesbian and presenting the image of women inside the armed forces in such a way that the forces could not be accused of sexism.

[Dr. John Reid]

We understand that such issues have to be treated with considerable sensitivity, but they must be taken head on and dealt with.

We believe that the report was right when it stated that the services have considered what to do in the long term in allaying the fears of ethnic minority parents. It was recommended that advertisements in the ethnic minority press should be aimed specifically at parents. It was said that that would be an appropriate way to start the procedure. An extremely important recommendation involved the training of trainers and of recruiters. I hope that the Minister will respond to all these matters so that we may learn what advances, if any, have been made.

We want to know whether additional training will be given to recruitment officers on the recruitment of members of the ethnic minorities. Will recruitment advertising be reorganised so that it presents a more attractive and more positive image to members of the ethnic minorities? Above all, what concrete steps are the Government taking to deal with racism within the armed forces? These questions need to be answered because the moral issues that are involved are sufficient grounds for taking speedy and effective action to deal with the problem that has already been identified.

Even if the grounds of principle were not sufficient—I believe that they are—practical considerations such as undermanning and future recruitment are in themselves sufficient to compel any responsible Government to take action. We pride ourselves on being a multicultural and diverse society whose very diversity enriches society as a whole. We should expect no less from the armed forces, which we ask to protect our society.

3.31 am

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. Archie Hamilton): It has been an interesting debate. I am glad that the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms. Abbott) has presented me with the opportunity of making clear the Government's position on members of the ethnic minorities within the armed forces.

The hon. Lady referred to the United States armed forces and their position on members of ethnic minorities. As I am sure she knows, they have a policy of positive discrimination for minority groups, including women. I think that she accepts that positive discrimination conflicts with the principle of equal opportunities. It could be said that positive discrimination is illegal under our race relations legislation. That does not stop the encouragement of under-represented groups, however, and we are doing everything that we can in the Ministry of Defence to encourage members of the ethnic minorities to come forward.

The hon. Lady talked about the bullying of certain individuals. I am sure that she knows that there were problems of bullying in the armed forces in the past. They were problems which had to be dealt with firmly down the chain of command. The cases that come to mind did not involve the bullying of members of ethnic minorities—blacks—within the armed forces. White soldiers—one presumes the less adequate ones—were hounded by their comrades. We have been dealing with the problem and stamping it out. There is a tendency in regimental life for certain individuals to be picked upon. It is not exclusively a matter of whites picking on blacks, and, as I have said, we have been taking measures to ensure that bullying does not happen.

The hon. Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid) made the point, which has recently been brought home to us strongly, that war does not discriminate and that when it comes to death and injury, there is no colour bar. It was certainly brought home to me when I visited Woolwich hospital recently and saw some of the injured. There was one young black man from the Royal Regiment of Fusiliers. He was from one of the Warrior vehicles which was attacked. As the House knows, a number of people died in that attack and others were injured.

The hon. Member for Motherwell, North quoted from a book. I accept that he had reservations about the description of the skinhead element within the armed forces. When we saw members of the armed forces on television recently in the Gulf coverage, there was no evidence of a skinhead element. People were full of admiration for all ranks, who showed themselves to be extremely professional, reserved and controlled. The description of "skinhead" would have conflicted totally with the impression that the British people got of our very professional armed forces. I think that the public generally looked on them with pride.

I welcome the opportunity to set out the Government's policies on ethnic minorities in the armed forces. We firmly support the principle of equal opportunities for ethnic minorities and have taken steps in many areas to put that principle into practice.

As the House may be aware, the armed services are subject to the Race Relations Act 1976. They are fully integrated, non-discriminatory organisations, and no form of racial discrimination is tolerated in either recruitment or subsequent employment in the armed services. Any member of the armed services who feels that he or she has been wronged in any way has the right to submit a complaint under the redress of grievance procedures provided for in the services discipline Acts. I assure the House that all such complaints are taken very seriously and are thoroughly investigated. If complaints are proven, appropriate action will be taken against those involved.

In April 1987, we introduced a system of monitoring the ethnic origins of all formal applicants and entrants to the armed forces. The results of the first year of ethnic monitoring indicated that there was significant under-representation of ethnic minorities among the applicants to the services. The statistics were mentioned by the hon. Lady and by the hon. Member for Motherwell, North. Overall, the ethnic minorities amounted to only 1·6 per cent. of applicants, whereas estimates from the labour force survey indicated that they formed some 5·6 per cent. of the total Great Britain population in the 15 to 24 age group, from which most applicants to join the services are drawn. The proportion of entrants to the armed services from the ethnic minorities was 1·1 per cent., showing that the success rate of ethnic minority applicants was lower than that for white applicants.

The armed forces share the same problem as the police, to whom the hon. Lady referred. The Metropolitan police find that the number coming forward in the metropolitan area is about 3 per cent., against a total estimated minority population in the London area of 14 per cent., so there seems to be a difficulty in the police as well as in the armed forces.

We were very concerned that the ethnic minorities were under-represented among applicants and entrants to the armed services. In order to help us to improve the position, we commissioned a study by independent consultants into ethnic minority recruitment to the services. The study was mentioned by the hon. Lady and by the hon. Gentleman. I informed the House of the outcome of the study in January 1990, and I made clear at the time that we had accepted all but two of the consultants' 23 recommendations.

Although the consultants found that the attitudes of young people from the ethnic minorities towards employment were not markedly different from those of their white counterparts, they were less likely to consider a career in the armed services. There were a number of reasons but, regrettably, the fear of encountering racial discrimination was cited in many cases.

Clearly, action was needed to improve the image of the armed forces as a career among young people from the ethnic minorities, and many of the consultants' recommendations were directed to that aim. A central feature of their proposals was to give positive encouragement to applications from members of the ethnic minorities. To project a more welcoming image in our recruiting literature and advertisements, we have improved the wording of our equal opportunities statements and have increased the representation of ethnic minority service personnel in our recruiting and advertising literature.

The training courses for recruiting staff now include a session devoted entirely to ethnic minority recruiting. The objectives of those sessions are to promote a more positive attitude towards ethnic minority recruiting, to increase the recruiters' knowledge and awareness of the ethnic minorities by discussing the various cultures, customs and religions, and to act as a forum for discussing problems relating to ethnic minority recruiting that the recruiters may have encountered.

A number of initiatives have been taken to develop contacts with ethnic minority communities. Presentations have been given to ethnic minority community and religious leaders. The Army, in conjunction with the north-east London college, is developing a course which aims to orientate candidates to the Army and improve their chances of passing the necessary tests and interviews. The Army is also taking part in a joint initiative with the Department of Trade and Industry to identify potential candidates and train them up to Army entrance standards.

The consultants found our selection procedures thorough and objective, and fully in conformity with the code of practice of the Commission for Racial Equality —but they recommended that we carry out a more detailed form of ethnic monitoring to help identify any special problems encountered during the selection process. This we are now doing.

We allocated some £600,000 specifically to ethnic minority recruitment in the current financial year. Those funds have been used by the Navy and the Army to purchase mobile career information offices which will be used in areas of high ethnic minority population. They have also been used to advertise in the ethnic minority press, and to produce recruiting leaflets in ethnic minority languages in order to explain the benefits of a service career to the parents of potential recruits. We shall again be allocating funds to ethnic minority recruitment in the next financial year.

The consultants emphasised that a dramatic increase in the number of recruits from the ethnic minorities could not be expected in the short term. We appreciate that it will take a sustained effort on our part, over many years, to achieve a significant increase in ethnic minority applications, but the initiatives that I have described have already done a great deal to start that process moving.

We only monitor the ethnic origins of applicants to the armed forces. That is an anonymous, self-classification system. We do not keep records of the ethnic origins of serving personnel by rank or otherwise. Promotion is by merit regardless of race.

The hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington said that there should be more monitoring of those already in the services. I am sure that she agrees that that would have to be done on a voluntary basis, and one might find that service men and women were not prepared to describe their colour or other characteristics.

Ms. Abbott: I take the hon. Gentleman's point, but in respect of monitoring by regiment, the Select Committee felt strongly that the only way to prove that the Guards were not discriminating was to monitor by cap badge.

Mr. Hamilton: The result is that certain regiments would then be picked upon, and so forth. The difficulty there was mentioned by the hon. Member for Motherwell, North. We want significant numbers of representatives of ethnic minorities going into the brigade of Guards together. It must be very difficult for individuals who end up in a regiment of the brigade. It would be better if we could organise it so that, rather than a lone person, groups went through together so that they could give support to each other.

One of the recommendations of the consultants' report that we did not accept was that ethnic minorities should be guided towards regiments where there were other ethnic minorities already. On the whole, we felt that that was difficult to achieve because we do not know where the numbers are. I suspect that there is, de facto, a tendency for the home county regiments—the Queen's Division, and so on—to have a higher percentage of blacks than other regiments might have, and I suspect that that gives a certain amount of reassurance to those who then join those regiments.

I share the view of the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington about how unsatisfactory the position of the brigade of Guards is. On the other hand, there are great difficulties for people who are in the van of any movement to increase ethnic minority representation in the Household Division.

Dr. Reid: Perhaps I may ask the Minister for clarification, as I think that I agree with what I think he said first—that there are dangers, or at least discomforts and extra stresses, involved in sending isolated people from ethnic minorities to pioneer in particular regiments. I then understood the Minister to say that he also discounted sending them to regiments where there were already a number of members of the ethnic minorities. So where does that leave us? Is the sending of groups of members of ethnic minorities into regiments where there is not a large presence being actively considered?

Mr. Hamilton: Returning to the consultants' recommendations, we did not accept that ethnic minorities should be directed towards regiments which already had a number of blacks within the ranks as we did not know which regiments had. Having said that, what happens de facto is that members of the Queen's Division, for instance, recruit from areas around London where the black population is higher than in other parts of the country, so I suspect that blacks end up going to regiments where there are already a number of them and that is the way it maps out. That is the way it happens naturally, but we are not in a position to know precisely what the numbers are in each regiment.

That brings me back to the matter that I was discussing with the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington. I am not sure that even if one carried out a voluntary census, throughout the ranks of the armed forces, one would get a satisfactory result. If it were done on a voluntary basis, it would depend on people filling in forms, and saying whether they regarded themselves as black, white or whatever.

Ms. Abbott: The Minister is very tall—is he, by any chance, an ex-Guards officer?

Mr. Hamilton: Yes, I certainly am. As I said to the hon. Lady earlier, I am not at all satisfied with the position in the brigade of Guards now. On the other hand, there are great difficulties associated with changing that situation. As I said earlier, in an ideal world—I am not certain in my own mind how one would organise this—we ought to be thinking in terms of a number of blacks going through the training process together, into a brigade of Guards regiment, because it must be hard for individuals. I shall deal with Guardsman Stokes later, if I may.

We have taken the view that in-service monitoring would be damaging and racially divisive among the close-knit communities of the armed forces. The service community is unique in a number of ways, and the practices of other employers are not necessarily relevant; furthermore, there is no evidence of support for ethnic monitoring among ethnic minority service personnel themselves. Those interviewed by the consultants during their study into ethnic minority recruitment were opposed to in-service monitoring, and as a consequence the consultants did not recommend it.

The hon. Lady mentioned the case of Stephen Anderson. Following Lord Justice Taylor's judgment last November, a rehearing of the case is now in hand. A board of inquiry has investigated all the facts relevant to the case, and is expected to report soon. The Army Board will then reconsider the case, taking full account of both the judgment and the board of inquiry report. All factors will be taken into account, and full consideration will be given to the issue of compensation. We are currently considering what changes may be necessary to service procedures for handling redress-of-grievance cases, in the light of Lord Justice Taylor's judgment. No decision has yet been made.

The hon. Lady also mentioned the case of Guardsman Stokes. I find this slightly confusing. The hon. Lady said that Guardsman Stokes was a credit to his family, and indeed he was. He was also a good and enthusiastic soldier and a keen athlete, and he was very well liked in his regiment. The Army would have been delighted if he had decided to sign on for further service, but many soldiers decide to leave after completing a three-year engagement, and that is what Stokes did. Although he was encouraged to reconsider his decision and stay for a further three years, the decision to leave was his alone.

It is important to note that Stokes made no complaint about racial abuse at any time during his service, nor—notwithstanding stories in the press—did he subsequently lodge a formal complaint with the Army authorities. Any such complaint would, of course, be investigated. If there was any question of racial abuse against Stokes, which is what the hon. Lady is now claiming, he has let down all his black colleagues in the armed forces by not registering a complaint. If he wants such complaints to be investigated, he should present them. If he does nothing, nothing can possibly be done to help him, or others who may be suffering from racial abuse. He was popular in his regiment and, as I have said, I am a bit confused about the case—if there was racial abuse, why have we not heard about it before?

It was also suggested that Guardsman Stokes was not allowed to go on a physical training course. He thought that that was evidence of discrimination against him. However, he became eligible to go on the course during the last year of what he had decided would be a three-year term of service. Given the expense involved, the Army is on the whole somewhat reluctant to train people who do not intend to stay in the Army afterwards. By that time, Guardsman Stokes had made it clear that he was in for only three years. If he had said that he would like to stay for six years, the Army would have been more than happy to send him on the course.

It would be naive to suggest that racial prejudice does not exist in the armed forces—just as it does, unfortunately, in other areas of our society. I can assure the House, however, that the services view acts of racial discrimination as intolerable and have worked hard to eliminate such behaviour wherever it occurs. It is important to recognise that the efficiency and effectiveness of the armed forces are founded on teamwork. The trust of each member of the team in his comrades' abilities, loyalty and friendship is vital. Racism, whether institutional or individual, can have no place in the service environment and I join the hon. Lady in condemning it utterly.

I take this opportunity to pay tribute to all the personnel from the ethnic minorities who, with other members of the armed services during the operation to liberate Kuwait, displayed the high standards and professionalism that we have come to expect from the British armed forces.

I hope that I have demonstrated tonight that we are working hard to increase the numbers of recruits from the ethnic minorities to the services. I know that they will be offered full and satisfying careers in a profession where individuals are judged by their performance and not by the colour of their skin.

Share Ownership

3.54 am

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): It is an appropriate time to discuss the path of denationalisation, particularly when manufacturing exports have increased by almost half since 1979. Furthermore, United Kingdom economic growth has been more rapid than it has in either France or West Germany since 1979—and in the previous two decades we had had the slowest growth of the major European Community states. In addition, business investment has risen by two-thirds over the 1980s—by half since 1979 and by three-quarters since 1981. By the end of last year there were nearly 375,000 more businesses in operation than there were a decade ago. So I welcome this morning the opportunity to debate these key matters against such a good and successful economic background, and I welcome my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Front Bench.

As a result of all this, the real take-home pay for a married man on average earnings has increased by a third since 1979. Much of this success lies in taking unnecessary parts of the state out of Government control where it was stifled by red tape and putting it into efficient private hands where proper expansion could apply. The number of shareholders has more than trebled since 1979. A survey in February 1990 showed that 11 million people—one in four of the adult population—owned shares.

Denationalisation subjects companies to the discipline of the market place and forces them to put customers first. A private sector company cannot survive if it does not satisfy its clients. The profit performance of former nationalised industries suggests that denationalisation has helped to improve customer service. Furthermore, employees have a stake in the success of their business, as a glance at the National Freight Corporation alone will show. Denationalised companies allow their full potential to be realised and new customers to be won.

Whenever possible, denationalisation has been accompanied by a policy of increasing competition so as to guarantee customers a wide choice of goods and services at low prices. For example, the United Kingdom has led Europe in liberalising the airways following the denationalisation of British Airways. One can recall a time when, under Labour, that fine airline was ranked lower than Ethiopian Airways.

Another example is the fact that the United Kingdom has led Europe in liberalising the telecommunications market, bringing obvious and large benefits to consumers. The denationalisation of British Telecom was accompanied by the licensing of a direct competitor, Mercury, whose success forced British Telecom to cut the prices of long-distance calls.

A further example is the denationalisation of long-distance coaches. Now such coach travel is enjoying a marked revival. Competition has helped to drive prices down, improve the range and quality of services available and make long-distance travel possible for many people such as pensioners.

Yet denationalisation has not been carried out irresponsibly. Tough regulatory authorities have been established to protect consumers where areas of natural monopoly remain. Oftel, the telecommunications watchdog, has been highly successful in this context. Under terms agreed with British Telecom, prices can now only rise by 4·5 points less than the rate of inflation, and British Telecom has agreed to introduce itemised billing and pay £5 per day for failure to repair faults within two working days. Any such suggestion would have been more appropriate to April fool's day under a Labour Government. What a contrast that is with the bad old socialist days. Similar consumer rights have been enshrined in law for the electricity and water industries.

I will cite some specific examples of improvements. Less than three years ago there was a less than 50 per cent. chance of having a business telephone line installed within six working days; today, the figure is 77 per cent. Some 82 per cent. of residential telephone lines are now installed within eight working days. However, faster installation is only one of the many ways that customer service has improved through denationalisation. Any constituent walking on the street would find it hard to discover a public pay phone that was not working. A survey by the Yorkshire Evening Post in the greater York area examined that only a short time ago. It found an incredibly high proportion of public telephones in good working order. Indeed, nationally the figure is 96 per cent. in perfect working order—yet in December 1987 the figure was as low as 72 per cent.

In the same year, 4·3 per cent. of long-distance calls were not getting through; now it is only 0·7 per cent., and the figure is still improving. Where there was once a one in four chance of finding directory inquiries engaged, there is now only a one in 12 chance. British Telecom engineers are now clearing nine out of 10 faults within a working day. Of course, there is a great deal more to be done, but I wanted to give those specific examples of customer improvement that have resulted directly from denationalisation.

Such a denationalisation programme—so beneficial to manager, employee and customer—has brought benefits to the state purse. The coffers have been increased, so that the Government have been able to cut taxes, increase spending on priority areas and reduce the national debt. Richard Pryke, a specialist in the economics of nationalised industries, undertook a careful comparison in 1982. My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary may be aware of that study, which was entitled, "The comparative performance of public and private enterprise," which was published in the July 1982 edition of Fiscal Studies. His conclusions are worth examination by the House.

Pryke chose three areas for the like-with-like comparisons. First, in civil aviation he compared the performance of British Airways with that of British Caledonian. Of course, his performance comparison pre-dates the turn around in the fortunes of British Airways. Secondly, in short sea ship and hovercraft services he compared the record of Sealink UK with that of European Ferries, as well as comparing the record of BR Hovercraft with that of Hover Lloyd. Thirdly, for the sale of gas and electrical appliances and contracting, he compared the record of the two nationalised concerns—the British Gas Corporation and the electricity boards—with that of private competitors. In each case he concluded that the record of the nationalised concern was worse than that of its private-sector competitor, whether judged by profitability or by productivity indicators. Public enterprise achieved that poor result despite having certain advantages. For example, British Airways operates out of Heathrow, while British Caledonian operates out of Gatwick.

[Mr. Conal Gregory]

Two related aspects of management are criticised. First, the nationalised industries appeared to have been slow in reacting to market developments; secondly, they seem to have been willing to continue running sections of their businesses at a loss, and have been reluctant to rationalise their operations. Pryke does not believe that the unprofitability was caused by nationalised industries having non-commercial objectives, such as running social services.

Those views by a respected international economist place denationalised companies in their rightful context.

What is the range of companies that have been denationalised? The list is a long one, and I shall not tire the House with it at this early hour of the morning. However, I shall name some key companies. We can remember Amersham International, Associated British Ports, British Leyland—in which the Government held 99·7 per cent. of the shares—British Aerospace, British Airways, the British Airports Authority—now known as BAA plc—British Gas, British Shipbuilders, British Telecom, Britoil, Cable and Wireless, Enterprise Oil, Jaguar, National Bus, the National Freight Corporation, which has 10 per cent. of the United Kingdom's road haulage market, Roll-Royce, Royal Ordnance, TSB and the electricty and water authorities.

Clearly some areas have not been denationalised and perhaps this is one of the most pungent political points that I wish to make today. As I represent York, I am bound to say that the most obvious area in which denationalisation has not occurred fully is British Rail. Some parts have been brought into the private sector. Although many people think that British Transport hotels have been completely denationalised, no fewer than 11 hotels remain in state ownership, although I cannot understand why that should be. Sealink was denationalised in 1984, operating 37 ferries and 10 harbours. British Rail Engineering Ltd. is a highly successful, well-geared engineering company. Indeed, it need not necessarily remain a railway engineering company. It now offers over 20 per cent. more in salary terms to its workers in comparison with equivalent jobs in British Rail. It also offers shares in the company.

Why are the Government holding back from selling the rest of British Rail? Why have they not sold British Coal or the Post Office? Why are they holding back as much as 49·8 per cent. of British Telecom? After the successful launch last week of National Power and PowerGen, why are the Government retaining 40 per cent? Following the success of the flotation of subsidiaries such as BREL, it is high time that bodies like BR were split further. For example, the core of British Rail could be split like the Civil Aviation Authority. There could be a signalling and track authority and trains could pay to cross the system in terms of frequency, time and use. I am sure that denationalisation would be in the interests of employees and the freight and passenger customers.

On the other hand, the Opposition are committed to nationalisation. Their industry policy has not moved away from Clause Four. One of the key messages of the debate is that employees in free enterprise, denationalised companies can expect their shares to be snatched away or invalidated and their wages to fall if Labour is ever returned to power. Customers can expect to return to higher prices, less flexibility and less service. People with pensions can expect a fall in the value of their holdings and hence in the dividend or pension. Lovers of state intervention and red tape will have a field day. Labour would fuel inflation with such a strategy and could finance its proposals only by a levy on industry, or by raising taxes disproportionately, or both. That would be a return to the disastrous economics of the 1960s with socialist policies of subsidies, quangos and tax allowances. After 12 years in opposition, one might have expected the Labour party to produce some fresh ideas, but sadly that is not the case.

At the next election the public will remember Labour's pledge to renationalise. Labour's rather inadequate representatives try to sabotage flotations within days and hours of each denationalisation going public. What did the socialists do for the water industry when they were last in power? Did they commit proper resources to that industry? They certinly did not. Under socialist control, investment was cut by half.

It is not surprising that the only Labour Member to attend this debate has only just entered the Chamber. Nevertheless, I welcome him.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): I am here for the next debate.

Mr. Gregory: The socialists may try to dress up their intentions by using a marketing phrase like "social ownership," but the truth is that not one denationalised company will be safe if Labour take power.

Apart from the ballot box, one of the greatest bulwarks in our determination to ensure that Britain goes forward in a spirit of enterprise is a widening of the shareholder base and making share allocations part of the salary package. Such is the interest and enthusiasm of employees that some 84,000 people, plus 21,000 pensioners, from the 12 regional electricity companies, the National Grid Company and the Electricity Association applied for and received shares recently. Between them, they were allocated almost 160 million shares. That is true capitalism at work.

Perhaps the most telling statistic that I could give the House is that a driver or fitter who invested £1,000 in 1982 at the time of the employee buy-out of the National Freight Corporation could be sitting on £70,000 value today. Nothing could be clearer than that message for every trade unionist in the land. A vote for socialism would actually erode common sense and the value of their savings. Those who are worried about taking the plunge into the private sector need look no further.

Britons have invested many times more in their homes than in equities in the post-war era. It is time to redress the balance and encourage greater share participation. It is clearly important to change national attitudes. For example, we need more comprehensive reporting by pension funds and investment schemes. I well appreciate the quip made in some Sunday finance columns that getting information out of the pension funds is almost as difficult as trying to investigate the finances of the Vatican. I shall not encroach upon that, but pension funds are generally a reluctant audience.

The tax treatment of direct share ownership should be changed. It would be apt to give an annual tax-free allowance to those investing directly in a United Kingdom company. The Confederation of British Industry task force suggested that it could be £100 a month—a modest but sensible proposal for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Furthermore, we need to change the personal equity plan regulations to allow more than one plan manager in any one tax year and to increase the annual limit to £10,000. We need to introduce a lump sum PEP scheme to encourage investment of inherited funds and pension lump sums.

We must both reduce the time period before employees can become shareholders in their own right and provide a greater incentive to retain shares once their options have been exercised or transferred to the employee. With respect to profit-sharing schemes, the shares acquired under the Inland Revenue profit-sharing schemes should be transferable into a PEP without having to be sold and repurchased. That would avoid taxes and charges. The period for which the shares are held by the share trust before they are transferred could be reduced from five to three years.

Accounts and other circulars to shareholders should clearly be distributed to all participating employees. It would be helpful if when shares became transferable a statement was sent to all employees of the capital growth and the dividends received on shares since allocation. Furthermore, institutional investment committees should not restrict the numbers of shares purchased for the benefit of employees under profit-sharing schemes. If share purchases are to be made easier for individuals, we need to look at the saving and follow the recommendation of TAURUS, the International Stock Exchange system for electronic recording of ownership and transfer of shares, so that they can be passed on to the private investor.

A share maintenance service is needed for the private investor at no additional cost. At present there is a lack of liquidity in the stocks of smaller companies, which could and should be investigated by the ISE. There should perhaps be separate orders with a driven market for smaller company stocks. We may well see the development of retail stockbrokers closely involved with companies which wish to seek the help of private customers.

As I reach the end of these thoughts, I pay a special tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor), who hoped to participate in the debate but has not been able to do so.

The Government have encouraged employee share ownership in successive Finance Acts and tax reliefs, and with important concessions in the Companies Act 1989. Politically, the value of employee share ownership to the worker, to the company, to the economy and to society is now well established. There is more employee identification with a firm's need for profitability and its return on capital. There is more motivation for the work force to assist the development and efficiency of the company. There is less tendency to engage in labour disputes and more realism about pay negotiations. There is a lower staff turnover through loyalty and a greater sense of involvement of the company in the community in which it operates, as I saw frequently with Rowntree Mackintosh before it became part of Nestlé in York, and as I have seen since then when it has been under Swiss ownership.

It is admitted that many of the benefits will be realised only if the companies concerned adopt participatory management techniques. If not, the sense of involvement that the work force have through shareholding may remain rather latent. That should apply whatever percentage of the company is held by employees.

Clearly, the Treasury is not entirely sympathetic to qualifying ESOPs because of the tax privileges that have occurred in the United States. It could be argued that some have become corporate financing tools. However, I am sure that there are devices that my hon. Friend and his Treasury team could use to ensure a more appropriate way of developing wider share ownership, partly through tax breaks, and to reduce inflation.

If we see in the next pay round of British Rail, for example, not only an increase in wages, but an opportunity for employees to participate in shares, just as was done in British Rail Engineering Ltd., there will be a reduction in the demand on the British Railways Board, a lowering of the increase in ticket prices for passengers, an increase in freight costs that is below inflation and an opportunity for the company gradually to ease its way towards the market.

I have referred to several possible schemes and I have given examples of many companies which have moved into the private sector since 1979. I have been clear and open to the House about the dangers that would occur in the unlikely event of our ever having a socialist Government again. I welcome the opportunity for my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to respond to some of those positive thoughts.

4.17 am

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Francis Maude): I warmly congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) on securing a place in this important debate, if not on securing this place.

It is a pleasure to have the opportunity to debate one of the most important sets of issues on the economic agenda of politics. The importance of this series of issues is unquestioned except, it seems, on the Opposition Benches. One would have expected that on the issues of denationalisation and wider share ownership, on which my hon. Friend has spoken so eloquently and in such an informed way, there would be some interest from the Labour Benches. What do we see? We see the Labour Benches with but a sole occupant, the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer), who was quick to point out that he was present not to have anything to do with this debate, but to secure his position in the subsequent debate. I have the pleasure of also participating in that debate.

It is surprising and disappointing that my hon. Friend and I should be conducting this debate between ourselves because I suspect that we shall find that we agree on most points. It would have been interesting to hear the Labour party's view, or perhaps today's view, on denationalisation and the ownership of shares. Does it think that that is good, worthwhile, helpful activity, as we do? It is disappointing that, when these grave and important issues come before the House, all that we hear from the Labour party is a long and deafening silence. My hon. Friend and I will have to make up the deficit between us and see what we can do to throw light on the issues.

My hon. Friend has spoken in a learned fashion on the subject of privatisation. He has gone through many of the merits of the process and has illustrated his case with a wealth of examples. Privatisation has been one of the many stunning successes of the Government's economic and social policies over the nearly 12 years that they have been in office. The policy was highly controversial at its outset; gradually, as the process has continued, it has become less so. The Labour party has gradually moved away from its root-and-branch opposition to the very idea of denationalisation to something which is at best ambivalent, a sort of muted hostility.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Bradford, South is temporarily leaving his place, because it would be interesting to hear from the sole representative of the Labour party present what the current view of the Labour party is on that great issue.

Since 1979, as my hon. Friend has said, a great many companies have been privatised—transferred from state ownership into what I would call genuine public ownership where the public own the shares in the business. More than 900,000 jobs have been transferred to the private sector. The state-owned sector of industry has fallen by more than 60 per cent. since 1979. Generally, the result has been that the industries have been subjected to much greater competition than hitherto, but even where a monopoly has been privatised, there has been tough and transparent regulation to protect the consumers while allowing private sector standards of efficiency to be injected into the business.

The total proceeds so far are some £28·5 billion before the present sale of the electricity generating companies. The performance of companies that have been transferred back into genuine public ownership has been, as my hon. Friend pointed out, startling. The pre-tax profits of British Aerospace have increased more than fivefold since 1981 when it was privatised. The profits of the National Freight Consortium are up almost 22 times since privatisation and the recent successful flotation on the stock exchange.

As my hon. Friend vividly illustrated, there are benefits to consumers. British Telecom's prices are down 22·5 per cent. in real terms since 1984. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, in his historic statement to the House some two weeks ago in which he announced the end of BT's duopoly, showed how the benefits of competition, of denationalisation, come through so sharply and distinctly to the consumers of the services. He announced further price reductions as a direct result of the benign policy that we have pursued. There are 17 per cent. more pay phones than in 1984—pay phones that work, compared with the position before privatisation when one's chances of finding a pay phone that worked were slight. The domestic prices of British Gas are down 10 per cent. in real terms since privatisation.

Privatisation has made companies that play an important role in the British economy more successful and has contributed substantially to economic growth and the dynamism of the British economy. That process will continue.

My hon. Friend the Member for York referred to some of the candidates for privatisation—the significant businesses still under state ownership on which the spotlight should properly fall. He mentioned British Coal and he will be aware of our pledge to privatise the coal industry.

My hon. Friend referred to British Rail, which he knows extremely well and the interests of which are close to his heart. When he makes the case for privatisation, the Government must listen with much respect because of his close constituency and other interests in the industry. We cannot contemplate privatisaton in this Parliament and no firm decisions have been taken, but it is very much on the agenda.

My hon. Friend also referred to the Post Office, parts of which have been denationalised. Girobank was sold and is operating successfully in the private sector. Further consideration is being given to privatising other parts of the Post Office.

I shall devote a little attention to the share ownership aspects of my hon. Friend's speech. Privatisation and share ownership go closely together but are not dependent on each other. There is no doubt that the flotation of shares in some of the larger previously state-owned companies has given share ownership a huge boost. Share ownership would have increased in any event, but probably not to the extent that it has. In the United States, without the stimulus of privatisation, 25 per cent. of adults own shares. Share ownership in Britain is almost as high. There is not the same depth of share ownership, but I hope that that will develop.

During this Government's period of office there has been an unprecedented rise in the number of shareholders. Share ownership used to be seen as the preserve of the wealthy or the professional classes. Now it is the choice of all classes. Direct ownership of shares in British companies has spread throughout the nation.

In 1979, only 7 per cent. of the adult population owned shares. That figure had been more or less constant for many years. A few companies had been distributing shares to their employees and a few eloquent voices called for wider share ownership. However, the prospects for progress at that stage seemed to be few. Since then, share ownership has spread more widely every year. The growth has been steady, particularly since 1984, and the results have been spectacular.

By January 1990, 24 per cent. of the adult population owned shares. Nearly one in every four adults was by then a share owner. We have long envied such a level of share ownership in other countries such as Japan and the United States. Many people thought that such a level of share ownership was impossible to achieve in the United Kingdom. A great deal of progress has been made as a result of much attention having been paid to this important issue.

My hon. Friend referred to the CBI's task force and its useful and interesting report. Converts to the cause are being made all the time. At last July's meeting of the National Economic Development Council it was a pleasant surprise to find that even the Trades Union Congress was reasonably positive. Its general secretary declared himself to be a "not unsceptical convert" to the cause. I suppose that that is a start. As time goes on and as he begins to understand better what share ownership means, he may become a wholly unsceptical convert. That is a helpful and beneficent development.

Some people—including some hon. Members—may still be doubters. It is worth, therefore, saying a few words about why share ownership is an important objective. A property-owning democracy was advocated as long ago as 1929 by Sir Anthony Eden. Since then we have worked ceaselessly to encourage home ownership. We have been very successful. Capital ownership is the next stage after home ownership. Owning some capital provides a family with the same independence, self-reliance and security as home ownership. That is why we encourage families and individuals to save. We have set out to revive and restore the habit of thrift.

Savings have a double value. They provide security for savers and they also provide funds for investment, which benefits the whole economy. Shares—ordinary equity—form the clearest link between savings and investment. It is the point at which the cultures of thrift and enterprise join. They produce a feeling in shareholders of direct involvement in the affairs of the company in which they have chosen to invest. That is particularly beneficial for employee shareholders. Anyone who owns shares in the company for which he or she works has every incentive to do his or her best for that company and to encourage co-workers also to do their best, since they will all benefit from its success.

The same is true of all shareholders. Ultimately, the future prosperity of everyone in the country depends upon the performance of British companies. Share ownership makes that sometimes harsh fact more obvious. It brings the investor directly into contact with the risks and rewards of capitalism and it is a key element in the culture of enterprise.

My hon. Friend referred to a number of steps that the Government have taken to promote share ownership. It can be fairly said that those steps have been successful. There would in any event have been some development towards the cause of wider share ownership, which we all espouse, but Government stimulus has been helpful to the process.

Some tax benefits have been attached to employee share ownership schemes, for instance. The process has been effected on a strictly voluntary basis; we do not believe in coercing firms into adopting bureaucratic models of employee involvement that may well turn out to be ill-suited to their needs. We believe in fostering employee involvement in the ways judged best for each company and its work force. Share ownership is one of the most valuable methods of promoting involvement. The aim is to produce an identity of interest between the worker and the shareholder. The simplest way of doing that is when they are one and the same person. That provides the strongest possible incentive to work for the prosperity of the company.

To this end, we have established a number of different models of approved employee share schemes, providing different kinds of tax relief to accompany them. Perhaps the two most important of the all-employee share schemes are the profit-sharing scheme and the savings-related share option scheme. I am pleased to say that the latest year for which figures are available, 1989-90, was a record year for all employee schemes: 1·3 million employees were granted shares or options over shares, with a total initial value of £1,370 million. For the holders of options, the value of the shares when they come to exercise their options may be significantly higher, although that depends, as it should, on their companies' performances.

By the end of 1989-90 a total of 890 profit-sharing schemes had been approved, as had 891 savings-related share option schemes. In all, about 2·25 million employees have benefited from these schemes, receiving shares or options worth an initial value of £6·5 billion. New companies continue to introduce such schemes. One hundred and seventy-eight new schemes were approved in 1989-90 and I hope that more companies will open such schemes in future.

We also welcome firms setting up their own employees' share arrangements, which may fall outside tax-relieved approved share schemes under the Finance Act. No company will be forced into the framework of that Act.

I am glad of the opportunity to comment on this important subject. It is delightful to see Opposition Members coming into the Chamber as the debate moves on. I am not sure whether the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith)—it is a great pleasure to see him gracing the Opposition Benches at this time in the morning—is here for this debate or the following one. If he is keeping his powder dry for the next debate, I look forward to discussing that important matter with him.

I must, however, register again my disappointment that the Opposition have not felt this an important enough subject to come to the House and say where they stand on these weighty matters——

Mr. Gregory: Does my hon. Friend share my conclusion that the absence of Labour Members from the debate stems from their embarrassment about their policy? They have not renounced Clause Four and they have tried to dress up renationalisation in marketing jargon as social ownership. My hon. Friend's lucid description of employees participating in such schemes corresponds with a reversal of pay bargaining and the bad old days of the 1960s.

Mr. Maude: My hon. Friend asks a pertinent question. As we have sitting on the Front Bench a senior member of the Opposition's finance team, we may have some elucidation. We may be able to find out whether the Opposition's Front-Bench team stick as closely to Clause Four of the Labour party's constitution, or whether that is to be brushed aside. If it is to be the latter, the hon. Member for Bradford, South may have something to say about that. The world is waiting, with bated breath, to hear the way that the Labour party is moving. Does it remain committed to nationalisation, to re-nationalisation and the appropriation of the shares for which our citizens have paid money, and in which they have taken an interest? What is the Labour party's position on these matters? We ask the question, but all that we hear is silence.

EC (Cost)

4.41 am

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): The rules of the House preclude me from taking part in more than one debate, so the comments of the Minister and of the hon. Member for York (Mr. Gregory) were sadly misplaced. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman attacked British Rail rather than defending it, as he should have done given that he represents an important railway station and rail centre.

My subject for debate is the cost of the EEC to the United Kingdom. Some in the Conservative party believe that the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) has been standing up for the United Kingdom against the encroachments of the Common Market. That simply is not the case. As soon as she came into office in 1979 she abandoned the United Kingdom derogation from the Common Market rules by removing exchange rate controls.

The channel tunnel, which the right hon. Lady agreed with Mr. Mitterrand, is not a transport improvement. It is designed to link us ever more closely to the Common Market. It was clear during the discussions of plans for it, in Strasbourg, that that was its basic purpose. Furthermore, it was as a result of the right hon. Lady's collaboration with the former Chancellor of the Exchequer that we were taken into the exchange rate mechanism with an overvalued pound and without any safeguards. Far from resisting the encroachments of the Common Market, she dug us deeper into it.

As the Minister is in a petulant mood, let me tell him that my criticism of the cost of membership of the Common Market cannot be ascribed to a little Englander view, in case he takes that line or make jokes about not liking foreigners, and that sort of thing. I find that a peculiar attitude, because the Tories are quite happy to bomb millions of Russians. They are foreigners, and I have opposed that so-called defence strategy.

Like the vast majority of Labour Members, I thought that sanctions against Iraq should have been tried for longer. We did not like the idea of engaging in warfare with innocent Iraqi citizens, as well as the troops. We were concerned about the preservation of human life and the resolution of the conflict without warfare. That is because we are concerned on an international basis. I was supporting the United Nations well before the Government's recent enthusiasm for that organisation. As I have said on many occasions, the Government's embarkation on Trident was a breach of the United Nations nuclear non-proliferation treaty. I do not want to hear lectures from the Government about support for internationalism and bodies such as the United Nations. I know that the United Nations is an extremely important body, and it will have my continued support.

Criticism of the Common Market is based on a much wider view than the narrow little Englander outlook. It is based on the claim that the Common Market is not Europe, to take up the Eurospeak of today. Europe is a continent of 41 countries, yet the term "Europe" is bandied about as though it has been appropriated by a tiny group of inward-looking countries that will create a so-called free market. In fact, they will create a protected market with a substantial barrier around it. That barrier has already cost us dear.

The Common Market has been, is and is likely to continue to be a millstone round the United Kingdom's neck. There are those who claim that there is no alternative. They come out with sonorous platitudes such as, "We are in and we cannot change things." The Prime Minister said only a couple of days ago that we must be in the heart of the Common Market.

The Common Market is sometimes linked with growing prosperity. The highest standards of living in the continent of Europe are in Switzerland and Sweden, and neither country is in the EEC. So membership of the EEC is not necessary to achieve a high standard of living. It is claimed that the Common Market is necessary if we are to develop our prosperity because we must have a large domestic market of 350 million people to establish the base of a prosperous and developing manufacturing industry. When I ask how it is that Japan is the most prosperous and successful manufacturing country in relation to its population in the world when it does not have such a large domestic base, it seems that there is difficulty in producing an answer.

Can we change what has been done? Of course. Circumstances have a habit of changing radically from time to time. Who would have said two years ago that East Germany and West Germany would so soon become united? Who would have said that the Soviet Union, that seemingly implacable power, would be facing enormous difficulties and its potential break-up? Only a couple of years ago Conservative Members were arguing that we should spend yet greater sums on armaments because of the imminent invasion of the other part of Europe by the Soviet Union. Who would have said that in two years that would all be swept aside and that the notion that the Soviet Union was about to embark on an attack was absurd?

It is the view of some that the Common Market is quite efficient. It is argued that it employs only about 25,000 bureaucrats to cover 12 nations and that that is a modest number, but the number of people employed in Common Market administration duties does not fall into that pattern. In March 1989, I asked the then Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food:

"what is the number of civil servants in his Ministry whose main work is related wholly or mainly to the European Economic Community?"

The Minister, who is now a Back Bencher, the hon. Member for Calder Valley (Mr. Thompson), replied:

"We estimate that between one quarter and one third of the Department's manpower"—

I think that that should be "staff" at a time of greater egalitarianism between the sexes—

"including common service and support staff, are concerned directly or indirectly with duties arising out of EEC membership. At 31 January 1989 this amounted approximately to between 2,500 and 3,400 staff . . . The 950 staff of the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce are entirely engaged on work related to the European Community."—[Official Report, 15 March 1989; Vol. 149, c. 250.]

It would not be unfair to say that there are 4,000 in the Ministry of Agriculture and the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce engaged in such work. The Ministry contains the largest number of people working for the EEC on EEC matters.

The number employed by other Departments, with the exception of Departments like Education and Science—not as yet covered by the Common Market although it has ambitions in that direction—is considerable. If we tot them all up, it is a very large figure. However, it is not possible to tot them all up because under the Conservative Government some Departments are so concerned with transparency and public accountability that they refuse to answer such questions. I give the illustration to show that the employment of EEC employees is wider than the narrow definition normally used.

I will not give figures for every year on the actual money that is handed over to the Common Market, but I have the figures that were provided on 31 July 1990 of the United Kingdom's net contribution to the EEC budget. Although I asked a question, the facilities of the Government proved inadequate to the task and the then Paymaster General said that it was not possible to provide the answer before the summer recess. Therefore, he later sent me a letter and placed a copy in the Library.

In 1979 the net figure, after all grants and hand-outs from the Common Market, was £947 million. When we see notices saying, "Europe helps Bradford again," "Europe helps Scunthorpe again," or Europe helps wherever again, it means that some of our money is coming back. A laborious and expensive process has been undertaken whereby we hand over billions of pounds and then go as supplicants to get some of it back. Local authorities, strapped of cash by the Conservative Government, are naturally grateful for anything that they can obtain to try to improve their services, which have been lamentably cut by the Government.

By the way, it is worth pointing out that if the Conservative Government restored the rate support grant to the level that it was in 1978-79 under Labour—and they are very fond of making comparisons with Labour—we could have an average poll tax of £152 instead of £353. That shows the way in which the Government are pressing local authorities and why local authorities are naturally looking to the Common Market for all the money that they can get back.

Our net contribution to the European Community budget in 1979 was £947 million; in 1981 it was £397 million, in 1983 it was £647 million, in 1985 it was £1,808 million, in 1987 it was £1,721 million and in 1989 it was £2,315 million. The total sent between 1979 and 1989 was £11,737 million. The Minister's letter concluded with the information that the latest estimate is that the United Kingdom's net contribution for 1990 was £2,175 million, making a total to the end of last year of £13,912 million —and that despite the Government's claim that they secured considerable rebates. They do not seem to have benefited the country very much.

There is an additional cost in jobs. The Government's enterprise culture has failed to penetrate the Community's markets in the way that it is supposed to do. As a result, the United Kingdom has a somewhat lamentable trade in manufactured goods. The Conservative view is that trade between this country and the Common Market is increasing and that, somehow, the bigger the deficit, the more successful the economy.

Figures provided by the Library show that the United Kingdom's trade in cars with the EC for 1990 produced a deficit of £3,898 million; in commercial vehicles, the deficit was £228 million; in parts and accessories, the enterprise culture managed to achieve a shortfall of £1,137 million —a total deficit for our automotive industry of over £5,000 million.

The British textile industry is of particular concern to me, because it employs 14,000 people in Bradford—one third of whose inner-city constituents I represent. That industry shows an EC trade deficit of £1,066 million. If the Minister were minded to argue that if the industry produced the right goods, having the right designs, and at the right price, they would sell, I should have to tell him that life is not quite like that.

Britain's textile industry is modern and well equipped and I imagine that even the Minister accepts that its work force has been highly co-operative in accepting changes in shift and other work patterns, retraining and rescheduling. The Minister can name it, and it has been done. The industry's standards of design, equipment and production are as high as anywhere in the world.

When Labour was in office, a number of Britain's chipboard manufacturers faced closure. Unlike the Government, we did not shrug our shoulders and say that under the enterprise culture, things must take their natural course according to market economics. Instead, we tried to reverse the trend and to maintain jobs. In comparison with the Conservatives, we did so extremely successfully.

We told the Commission that EC chipboard was being dumped in the United Kingdom at below cost and that that practice was causing job losses. The Commission asked why we did not dump chipboard in Belgium—the country whose activities were causing us concern. The Commission did not realise that if British manufacturers had attempted to do that, every chipboard importer in Belgium would have been placed on a hidden, unofficial, unacknowledged black list, which would have prevented them from distributing any British timber in Belgium. There was, in effect, a barrier against United Kingdom imports and I am certain that the same happens today in respect of our textile industry.

I can draw the Minister's attention to the hidden subsidies in the Prato region of Italy, where social security contributions are virtually not paid because of the pattern of payments, which means that they have a 10 per cent. cost advantage in wages straight away. Many difficulties have arisen for the textile industry from such sources, which is extremely unfair.

The clothing industry had a deficit of £548 million; footwear had a deficit of £504 million; generating equipment had a positive balance of £358 million, but specialised machinery again had a deficit of £588 million; metal working equipment had a deficit of £129 million; industrial machinery had a deficit of £637 million; office and data processing equipment had a positive surplus of £674 million; telecommunications and sound equipment had a surplus of £668 million, but electrical machinery had a deficit of £409 million; and machine tools, which are the arbiter of the health of manufacturing industry, had a deficit of £20 million. There was a deficit with the Common Market in 1990 of £9,724 million, and for all goods, a deficit of £10,831 million.

That is an significant deficit, as is demonstrated by the important loss of jobs in manufacturing industry due to a combination of our membership of the Common Market and the policies of the Government—a poisonous combination for the health of our manufacturing and general industry.

I shall quote from an interesting article, which appeared in Public Money and Management magazine for the winter —No. 4, volume 10—written by Dr. Brian Burkitt, senior lecturer in economics at the department of social and economic studies at the university of Bradford, and Mark Baimbridge, who is a lecturer in economics at the same university. Describing our manufacturing industry in that article they say:

[Mr. Bob Cryer]

"the historical record demonstrates the damage caused to Britain by EC membership: between 1957 and accession to the EC in 1973 United Kingdom manufacturing output"— in the 1960s, which the Minister seems so scathing about—

"rose by 67%, but from 1973 to 1988 it rose by only 3%. Britain is therefore in danger of becoming the first 'underdeveloping' nation: in 1970 the value of UK exports of goods, other than oil, fell short of the value of imports, including food and raw materials, by 3%. In 1988 the shortfall was 26%. Most of this decline was caused by trade with the EC in manufactures. In 1970 the value of manufacturing exports, other than precious stones, to EC countries, exceeded manufacturing imports from them by 30%, yet in 1988 they were 31% lower. This major turnround was not accompanied by an equivalent trade imbalance with the rest of the world."

That shows how our decline in manufacturing has been allied to our membership of the Common Market.

Supporters of the Common Market claim that 2·5 million jobs depend on exports to the EEC. However, between 1970, when we had a manufacturing trade surplus of £16·2 billion at 1988 prices, and 1988, when we had a deficit of £15·7 billion, we have lost about 3·75 million jobs in lost manufacturing capacity.

Another cost to our country is the Conservative Government's entry into the exchange rate mechanism. Given the rate that was agreed, our entry was overvalued and imposed a cost on exporters. It was also a blow to our democratic accountability and to economic management by an elected Government. ERM entry cost Belgium 500,000 jobs and cost France cuts in wages; devaluation and interest rates are now determined not by the economic needs of our nation, but by the demands of the exchange rate mechanism.

On 20 February, the Yorkshire Post said:

"Britain's membership of the Exchange Rate Mechanism will cost the country 600,000 jobs over the next five years, the chief economist of the National Westminster Bank claimed yesterday.

And although likely effects on jobs were calculated before the Government decided on ERM entry last year, the Treasury refused yesterday to make them public. It eventually confirmed that jobs would be lost.

Both the Treasury and the Department of Employment said yesterday that the means to avoid huge job losses lay in the hands of employers' and employees' wage negotiators . . . A Department of Employment spokesman said: 'It is not possible to put a figure on the effect of ERM entry on jobs as it will depend on the prices and wage setting behaviour of employers and employees.

The sooner the disciplines of the ERM are accepted and reflected in pay settlements, the smaller will be the effect on jobs'."

The ERM imposed a decade of deflation on Italy and France because it required other members to achieve Germany's abnormally low rate of inflation. Both countries now have substantially higher unemployment rates than Britain, yet Britain must now go through the same process of deflation, but in a much shorter period and without the benefit of the easy American market that we had because of the overvalued dollar.

Tories prefer an overvalued currency, because they represent finance—money, and those who have it. Labour represents unions and workers, who will experience the main impact of deflation. Our view should be different: we cannot accept deflationary economic management and the disciplines of unemployment. When the Government and the National Westminster bank talk about discipline, they do not mean that Ministers will involve themselves in any such discipline; far from it. When the former Chancellor of the Exchequer talks about discipline, he is talking about workers' being disciplined—about their being told by management, "You cannot have a wage increase, and if you don't like it we will close down the factory."

When the former Chancellor—who endorses the use of such discipline against workers and their families—leaves his comfortably paid job as Chancellor, he goes off to the City and receives an outrageous amount of money: some £200,000 a year for two or three days' work a week. Meanwhile, he is still moonlighting here in Parliament, being paid £30,000 a year of taxpayers' money. It is a scandal and a disgrace. Workers outside should know about the double standards that prevail in this place. If the Tories want to encourage workers, they can always set an example by taking wage cuts and making their own sacrifices.

Another cost of our Common Market membership is the cost in food. The common agricultural policy costs around 70 per cent. of all EEC expenditure. On 14 July 1990, the Financial Times gave a figure of around £62 billion—£16 a week for every family in Britain. We impose a tariff on cheap food from outside the European Community, and pay between two and four times the world price for food.

We have been pouring nitrates on our soil year after year. We have ripped out hedges and paid cereal farmers —and other farmers, but particularly cereal farmers—big money to grow food. We pay them to store it and then the EC buys food on world markets if starvation occurs in central Africa, the Sahel and the Sahara, as it frequently does, while EC food rots in stores.

The Government, in order to get rid of these food mountains, have resorted to free hand-outs of food. I welcome that. It is a reflection of the crazy common agricultural policy and the way that huge food mountains are produced which are sold anywhere but inside the Common Market—and if they are sold at rock-bottom prices on world markets they inhibit the development of the indigenous agricultural industry of the developing world.

Even where there is a hand-out of free food from the Common Market surpluses, however, the Government adopt a churlish and mean-minded attitude towards it. They insist that the only people who can receive it must be on either family credit or income support. In Bradford, where there were long queues for the food, to a point where several pensioners fainted because they were outside for long periods in cold weather—over an hour and in some cases two hours—they were deeply offended to be told on reaching the counter that they could not have any food because they were not on family credit or income support.

If this is the result of a recommendation by the European Commission, the Government should stand up to it and insist that the food may be given out to all pensioners, irrespective of whether they are on family credit or income support. After all, since we have been in the Common Market since 1973, the pensioners will have paid for that food. The food is not free: it is bought and paid for by British taxpayers through their contributions to the common agricultural policy.

In that context, in spite of difficult circumstances, the voluntary organisations—because the Government will not allow local authorities to distribute the food—have coped magnificently with the distribution. They are very much to be congratulated on the work that they have done. I hope—and I publicise the fact that applications for distribution must be in by 22 March with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food—that more organisations in Bradford and elsewhere will make those applications.

We are in a balance of trade deficit with the EEC, I fear, for food as well. The information supplied by the Library demonstrates yet again that the benefits from the Common Market are somewhat sparse. I am sorry that the figures are proving somewhat elusive among my papers, but I can assure the House that the Library provided me with figures that demonstrated that our deficit in the balance of trade in food—I now have the figures to hand—is considerable. The figures are in millions of ecu. Our deficit is 11,282 million ecu, roughly about £5,000 million. So the common agricultural policy is expensive and wasteful and it does not help us in our balance of trade with other EC countries.

One last point worth making about the common agricultural policy is that it is an extremely selfish policy, particularly in its link with the Lomé convention and the Lomé countries, which are really the Francophile countries because when the Conservatives negotiated entry in 1973 they excluded the Commonwealth countries from any benefits that might arise. With few exceptions, if the Lomé countries package or process food, a tariff is slapped on it. That means that the developing countries are not given the full access that they should have to the wealthier Common Market countries.

Our textile industry also faces a cost in the Common Market because the Commission has been desultory in its attitude towards the multi-fibre arrangement and the relative failure—we are not quite clear about the true position—of the general agreement on tariffs and trade. The talks are not yet concluded, but the Commission has been pressed on several occasions to ensure that the MFA is extended, pending any outcome from GATT. The MFA regulates the imports of textiles and clothing from 26 developing nations into the United Kingdom and it is vital for the future success of the textile industry. I urge the Minister to make it clear to the Commission that the MFA must be retained if GATT fails.

What is the cost to our environment? Quite apart from the CAP, a directive is floating around the Commission that would increase maximum gross vehicle lorry weights to 44 tonnes, because that is the harmony weight in the Common Market. Our maximum gross vehicle weight is 38 tonnes. When that was agreed in 1983, the then Secretary of State for Transport said that it was the upper limit and that it would not be exceeded. He was pressed by a number of Conservative and Labour Members who were appalled at the thought of even bigger juggernauts going around the narrow lanes and roads of our cities, towns and hamlets.

The then Secretary of State gave an assurance, but the Commission now wants to harmonise road transport throughout the 12 member states and it has produced a directive that will be subject to majority voting. We shall be part of a permanent minority in the Common Market. The directive gives a derogation for the United Kingdom and Ireland, but it also provides that after a given number of years, yet to be decided, that derogation will come to an end. Those 44-tonne vehicles will then be on our roads, unless we take very clear and firm action to oppose that, and even then the directive may be imposed by virtue of our minority position.

There is yet a further pressure for harmonisation, and that is on voting systems. There will be a cost to democracy. There is pressure for the proportional representation system, which is prevalent in every other EEC state, to be introduced in this country. In its proponents' eyes, it has the merit of a rigorous centralised party system of control so that, for example, the members of the EEC assembly in Strasbourg or the other parts of the socialist group dare not give any opinion until they have cleared it with the central apparatus of the political party, in case they are dropped 10, 15 or 20 places on the voting list and essentially removed from office by the party apparatchiks. It is a measure for coalition governments, in which the programme is decided in smoke-filled rooms, rather than on the hustings, as the first-past-the-post system provides. That would destroy the relationship that we enjoy—although I suppose that there may be one or two people who do not enjoy it—between ourselves and our constituents, because all the constituencies would become multi-Member constituencies. It would be yet another example of the Community's diminishing the power of this Parliament. It would also be more difficult for people to gain access to the democratic process if control were transferred from London to Brussels and Strasbourg.

My concern about the cost of the Common Market is shared by the Minister. Yesterday we debated the Court of Auditors report. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), who is present today, contributed to that debate. He expressed great concern because fraud in the Common Market runs into millions of pounds a year. In that debate, the Financial Secretary to the Treasury said:

"There are some consistent and worrying themes. In particular, there is continuing evidence that certain Community programmes lack objectives that are sufficiently precise. In a number of instances the financial controls needed for proper implementation of certain policies are not in place, are not sufficiently rigorous, or are not being observed properly."—[Official Report, 13 March 1991; Vol. 187, c. 1045.]

That has been said in the House year after year. The Government consistently maintain that they have obtained adequate financial safeguards from the Common Market to ensure that expenditure is properly accounted for, accurately undertaken and is subject to rigorous scrutiny and control. However, it is not; year after year the same thing happens.

That situation will continue as a result of the Common Market's sprawling and amorphous bureaucratic nature unless the Government stand up and argue in the Common Market for proper control and so reduce the costs of membership.

We must always reserve the right to withdraw from the Common Market. That is an important lever in negotiations. I do not claim that we should withdraw in the little-Englander sense. We must maintain our trading and social relations with all the countries of Europe, not just the 12. We need not be bound by political union—we should set our faces clearly and solidly against that.

5.22 am

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) has done the House a considerable service by identifying an extremely important issue for us to discuss. I wish to elaborate on several of his points which deserve closer attention.

My hon. Friend referred to the role that had sometimes been claimed by the former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher), and her so-called achievements in securing a better deal for Britain within the Community. My hon. Friend did not make as much of that as he might have done. The record does not bear out much of the rhetoric that we heard from the right hon. Lady at the time or subsequently. My hon. Friend quoted some interesting figures of the fluctuating net contributions that this country has made to Community finances.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South also made a valid point about the need to consider Europe not just in terms of the 12 member countries in the Community, but as a wider entity. He was right to do that.

The Labour party believes that the Community should be widened as soon as possible. Austria has already submitted its application for membership and we believe that it should be accepted readily by the existing members. Sweden is shortly due to submit its application for membership and we hope that Sweden and, indeed, the other remaining European Free Trade Association countries can be brought within the European Community at an early date.

Looking to the medium-term future, we hope that some of the emerging democracies in central and eastern Europe will be able, perhaps initially by means of an association agreement, but eventually by full membership, to play their full part in a wider Europe. On the need to look beyond a little-Englander mentality, my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South and I are on all fours.

My hon. Friend also drew attention in graphic detail, with a sector-by-sector analysis of the trade deficit, to the deficit between Britain and the European Community. He was right to do so. However, I am not sure that he was right to put the lion's share of the blame for that deficit on the Common Market. The lion's share of the blame for our deficit with the European Community, as for that with much of the rest of the world, lies with the Government's policies and inaction on the needs of British industry in the past 12 years.

The Government not only allowed unbridled credit growth in the period from 1986 to 1988, which ensured that consumption grew massively in our domestic economy and inevitably led to substantial levels of imports being drawn in, but they neglected the needs of the supply side of British industry. In his reply to the previous debate, the Financial Secretary made some glancing references to the relationship between the public and private sectors in the economy. I have to tell him that we in the Labour party believe in a constructive and involved relationship between the public sector, the Government and private industry to ensure that the supply side of the economy works properly —exactly the intervention that has produced the most successful economies in the world is rejected by our Government almost alone among the industrialised nations of the 1990s. They do not believe that such intervention is the right approach to running an economy.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South also mentioned environmental issues. Of course, I take his point about the possible draft directives which may be in preparation at present, but we should think about using the instruments of the European Community to our advantage in environmental terms. I want to see a British Government who not only say yes to the provisions of the European Community social charter but put forward a programme for an environmental charter which provides the citizens of Europe with the right to ensure their own environmental protection. If we had a Government who wanted to play an imaginative and constructive role in the European Community, we might be able to achieve that objective. My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South has raised a series of important issues.

Mr. Cryer: When we form a Government, we shall not have to wait for the Community. My hon. Friend suggested that we should have to negotiate to achieve something. It is important to recognise that we can set standards through the work of a Labour Government to which other member states can aspire if they wish. We do not have to go through a long set of complex negotiations to wait for those standards to be achieved in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend is right. There are many policies can can and will be implemented by a Labour Government in Britain without waiting for cross-European action, and the sooner the better. However, although action on environmental rights would be useful if carried out in Britain on its own, it would be even more useful if we could achieve a cross-European approach on these matters, because environmental pollution knows no national boundaries. Action against environmental pollution and the protection of citizens from it should cross national frontiers.

The debate also raises a number of fundamental issues about the way in which the European Community budget is currently used and how it performs. I want to draw the attention of the House briefly to three specific issues. First, there is an absolute need to continue the drive to ensure proper value for money in the spending undertaken by the Commission and by the various funds of the EC. We debated that matter all too briefly yesterday when we had the annual debate on the report of the Court of Auditors. That report reveals that there is a need for constant watchfulness about the way in which some of the programmes of the Community are monitored and undertaken. That is not to say that those programmes are not valuable—many of them are—but we must ensure that we get proper value for money within them.

Secondly, there is undoubtedly a case for looking for and continuing to press within the Community for changes to the balance within the overall Community budget between agricultural support and all other aspects of expenditure. Agriculture still gobbles up the overwhelming proportion of the Community's budget funds and the farmers at the end of the line do not benefit by anything like the amount that goes in at the start of the pipeline. There is undoubtedly a need for reform and change within the expenditure of the Community and especially within the operation of the common agricultural policy. I hope that we shall begin to see some changes, especially with the external pressure from the negotiations on the general agreement on tariffs and trade. The process of the Uruguay round may provide just the extra external stimulus that will provide for some sensible changes in the patterns of expenditure and agricultural support with the Community.

Thirdly, we must acknowledge the growing importance within the EC budget of the regional funds, especially as economic co-operation between the 12 member countries of the Community increases. If we are to move along the road towards greater economic and monetary union within the EC, the regional funds will have a crucial part to play in ensuring that we can still have some mechanisms for addressing the imbalances between different regions of the Community.

The Opposition do not wish to see a European Community divided between its rich and poor citizens and its rich and poor regions. The principal mechanism that can and must be used to ensure that that does not happen has to be a sensible and developing use of the regional funds.

My hon. Friend has rightly and sensibly placed the issues before us. He has considerable experience from his time in Strasbourg and from his distinguished career on the ministerial Benches in the House. He has a fund of experience to bring to bear on the issues. Therefore, I am sure that he will share with me a determination not to rubbish the EC and all that is stands for, but a determination rather to make the EC work successfully and properly for the people of Britain and Europe. Labour Members have a constructive approach to the developing co-operation of Europe—we just wish that Her Majesty's Government would show the same approach, which they have not done in the past.

Mr. Maude rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I take it that the Minister has the leave of the House to speak again.

5.37 am

Mr. Maude: If I had known that this would be such a wide-ranging debate covering almost every aspect of matters falling under the ambit of the EC, I might have been able to arrange for my hon. Friend who succeeded me as Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office to have the pleasure of attending the House to pull together all the multifarious strands. That would have enabled a wider view to be taken than my narrow responsibilities allow and would also have enabled me to get a little more sleep. But such is life.

The hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) has brought an important matter before the House. He has taken his subject in its widest sense—the cost of EC membership to the United Kingdom. He has not adverted to or expatiated on the benefits of membership of the EC, but that is perfectly proper. However, it is always worth remembering that there are two sides to every balance sheet and he has given us only one. He has provided an account which I think it is fair to say is not impartial. He has distinct and definite views on the subject and they happen to be very different from those expounded by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). But that is a matter for them to resolve between themselves.

The Government are committed to membership of the European Community and to making it a success. That does not mean, as the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury seems to believe, that we should roll over and agree to everything proposed by Brussels to appear co-operative, decent, friendly and cuddly. Life is not like that. Proposals are made, we assess our broader interest and argue for it. The fact that sometimes we do so robustly shows that we are committed to membership of the Community.

The hon. Member for Bradford, South cast his net wide and referred at length to our balance of trade with the rest of the European Community. I shall not deal in detail with what he said—this is the last refuge perhaps not of the scoundrel but of Ministers in the middle of the night—as it does not fall within my responsibilities.

The performance of a country's industries in the world marketplace depends on how well they compete. In some circumstances, competition may not be fair, but the European Community has mechanisms to remedy distortions in competition. There are similar mechanisms in the GATT, which is one reason why we are so adamant that it must be improved and enhanced. We are as determined as anyone that it should be successful. An unsuccessful conclusion would strike a savage blow at the economies of the third world. The best service that we can provide is a free and open market for the goods that they are able to produce. The benefits that accrue to their economies from such market access will always vastly outweigh the benefits of direct financial aid. We should never forget that lesson.

The hon. Member for Bradford, South mentioned the effects of our membership of the exchange rate mechanism. I am not surprised that he is not enthusiastic about our membership, unlike the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury who thinks that membership is a good idea at any time, under any conditions and in any circumstances. The Government believed that we should join when the time and conditions were right. Subsequent events have shown that we joined at the right time and at the right rate.

Mr. Chris Smith: Does the hon. Gentleman agree with the Governor of the Bank of England that it was not right for the Government to reduce interest rates at the same time as joining the ERM?

Mr. Maude: That is not what the Governor of the Bank of England said. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister explained at length why we decided to lower interest rates when we joined the mechanism. Experience shows that that was the right decision.

The hon. Member for Bradford, South suggested that we joined the exchange rate mechanism at the wrong rate. I assume he meant that the pound is overvalued against the deutschmark and that United Kingdom businesses that seek to export to the rest of the continent are placed at a huge disadvantage. No dispassionate analysis of the facts bears that out.

The purchasing power parity of sterling against the deutschmark throughout the last decade and more was a little above the central rate at which we joined the exchange rate mechanism, which suggests that the rate we chose was about right. If it is right that that rate places exporters at such a crashing disadvantage, it is odd that when the rate of the pound against the deutschmark last summer was significantly above what it now is exporters were doing very well, particularly in their exports to

[Mr. Maude]

Germany, which were booming. It is wrong to suggest that the pound is cripplingly overvalued against the deutschmark.

The hon. Gentleman disparaged the discipline that flows from membership of the exchange rate mechanism. That discipline would have flowed in any event from a firm monetary policy. He objected to the fact that that discipline applied only to trade unions and workers. It applies, however, to everyone taking decisions about the economy. The traditional soft option that accompanied —I put it no higher than that—the British economy's gradual decline, in relative terms, between the end of the last war and 1979 or thereabouts—the traditional soft option of constant devaluation and a constant decline in the value of the pound against other currencies—has gone. For British businesses to remain competitive and to improve their competitiveness, they have to improve their performance. Consequently, their costs have to be controlled. There is no easy way out. It is uncomfortable. A discipline of that nature is meant to be uncomfortable. Only if we accept and work within such a discipline shall we see sustained growth and prosperity.

May I deal with what I am bound to say I took, in my naivety, to be the main thrust of the debate—the financial cost to the United Kingdom of membership of the European Community. The hon. Member for Bradford, South properly dwelt upon that at some length. I expect our contribution to the Community to be around £1.9 billion in 1990-91 and £1.1 billion in 1991-92. The fall in next year's figure is simply because of a refund of contributions in 1990 and a higher level of abatement, reflecting adjustments to contributions in previous years. The underlying figure is about £2 billion a year. By any standards, these are substantial sums. However, they would have been vastly greater without the abatement of our contributions that my right hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mrs Thatcher) secured under the Fontainebleau abatement mechanism.

By the end of this year, cumulative abatement under the mechanism will have totalled almost £10 billion in addition to the £3.2 billion worth of refunds secured before the mechanism took effect. On that score alone, the United Kingdom is £13 billion better off today than we would have been if the previous contribution arrangements, so skilfully negotiated by the Labour Government in 1975, had continued to apply. A further £7.5 billion worth of abatement is forecast from 1992 to 1994.

We have a well-earned reputation throughout the Community for exercising discipline and restraint on EC budget spending. We have continued to give firm backing to the 1988 measures to set a limit on Community own resources, to exercise budget discipline arrangements on agricultural spending and to fix medium-term expenditure ceilings in the financial perspectives that form part of the inter-institutional agreement. Within that framework, we exercise a rigorous scrutiny of budget spending, looking at it item by item and programme by programme to see where funds can usefully be directed—and where they cannot.

The arrangements negotiated in 1988, taken with our efforts to keep expenditure below the maximum levels that they imply, have so far exercised a firm discipline on Community spending. For example, the 1991 budget sets a level of payment appropriations falling more than 5 billion ecu below the ceiling implied by the own-resources decisions, despite rapidly growing structural fund spending and despite a series of unforeseen demands for expenditure associated with eastern Europe, with German unification and with the Gulf.

It remains of the utmost importance that this discipline continues. Although for a number of reasons agricultural spending since 1988 has been well below the ceiling in the financial perspective, upward pressures are developing, and it will be important to resist them. We shall encourage the Commission to take firm action by using its own management powers to curb expenditure and by a restrictive price-fixing package.

We should not, however, concentrate exclusively on levels of Community expenditure. How the money is spent and accounted for is of great importance, too. As the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury said, we had the chance last night to discuss this matter in the debate on the European Court of Auditors annual report. We have already taken the leading role in seeking quantified objectives for Community programmes and in seeking stringent financial controls to ensure that money is spent properly and is effectively used. Those aims are reflected in the financial regulation of May 1990.

We also aim to underline the Community's commitment to the principles of financial management, to effective accountability and to value for money, by a series of suggested treaty amendments at the intergovernmental conference on so-called political union. These are intended to enhance scrutiny by the European Parliament, to clarify the responsibilities and duties of those concerned with financial control in Community institutions, to develop the responsibilities of the Court of Auditors and to underline member states' obligations to counter fraud.

The Community's financing arrangements are due for review at the end of this year. There will be an important set of negotiations then. In our approach to them we shall continue to be guided by the principles of budget discipline, effective accountability and value for money.

Remand Prisoners (Greater Manchester)

5.53 am

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): By convention, I should say that I am pleased to have the opportunity to raise the question of the use of police cells for remand prisoners in Greater Manchester. I am not pleased, because it should never have occurred. It is my duty to raise it, but I regret that I have to do so.

I put down my name for the debate on Tuesday and on Wednesday was told that I had won a place. Since then, the chief constable of Greater Manchester has announced his retirement. I assume that that is mere coincidence. Many people in Greater Manchester are disappointed that Sir James Anderton, who is a good publicist, has not made rather more fuss about remand prisoners being held in police cells for such a long time. One or two people feel that it is not just coincidence that he got his knighthood this year, and that that has encouraged him to say rather less about the scandal than he might otherwise have done. I wish him well in his retirement, but I hope that by the time he comes to hang up his truncheon and put his whistle away in June he will have sorted out this problem.

The issue has gone on for far too long. I have tabled eight or nine parliamentary questions on the subject and on two occasions I have had private meetings with Ministers to get assurances that something was being done. I am disappointed that those assurances have not been fulfilled. It is a scandal and an outrage that people are being held in the appalling conditions of some of the police cells in Greater Manchester when they have not been convicted of any crime. A lot more should have been done to ensure that this situation did not continue. At least one of the police cells about which I know is no bigger than the Treasury table in the front of the Chamber, and sometimes as many as three prisoners are held in that space.

The whole situation developed out of the Strangeways riot last Easter. The media was concerned about that, but once the rioting stopped they took little trouble to follow up the continuing problems. No one could have complained about the fact that in May, about 1,000 prisoners had to be held either in police cells in Greater Manchester, Cheshire, Lancashire, West Yorkshire, and even one or two places further afield. We all accepted that there was a crisis and that something had to be done about it. What worries me, many people in Greater Manchester and many middle-ranking policemen, is why the Home Office did not take steps at that stage to make sure that the problem was solved within a short time.

If it were possible, with a stroke of the pen, for the Home Office to make arrangements for the internment of Iraqi citizens in an Army camp, why was it not able to take rapid action to assess the problems with the building at Strangeways and the problems that were likely to ensue, and to find temporary accommodation suitable for holding remand prisoners, rather than allowing the situation to continue for months without a satisfactory solution?

It must have been obvious to the Home Office—it certainly was when I spoke to the then Minister with responsibility for prisons, the right hon. and learned Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor) in June—that the situation had to be resolved quickly. He was talking then in terms of about 500 prisoners each week in June being held in police cells. The answer that I got showed that on 1 June there were 505, on 8 June 551, on 15 June 574, on 22 June 569 and on 29 June 581.

So the Minister was aware of the extent to which prisoners were being held. It was perhaps a little disingenuous of him to claim that everything would be all right by September, when the remand wing of Strangeways would be back in operation and the problem of prisoners being held in police cells would disappear. The Minister must have known that at that stage the planned capacity for the remand wing, which was to be reopened, was not sufficient to take away the 500 from police cells. In addition to the 500 in Manchester, others were held in Cheshire, Lancashire and West Yorkshire. The Minister must have known that the police cells would have to be used for much longer.

Police cells are not suitable for remand prisoners. Indeed, some of the cells are appalling. Stockport police station, for example, is an unfortunate building. The old Stockport police force wanted a new police headquarters. It made an application to the Home Office and was told that it could have half a police station as a first phase. Half a new police station was built in Stockport in the 1960s. As the second half was not built, there remains only half a station. It is an extremely cramped building. The charge room and the cells off it are exceptionally small. On a Thursday, Friday or Saturday night, the cells are overcrowded with those who have to be brought in, arrested, charged and held overnight before they can appear in court. In addition to the people brought to the station in those circumstances, it has been necessary to cater for six, seven and—sometimes—up to 10 remand prisoners.

There is a similar situation at Cheadle Hulme, which is the other police station at Stockport. Cheadle Hulme police station would make a good exhibit for a museum, but it is entirely unsuitable for present-day working. To hold prisoners in such cramped conditions is unacceptable.

The cells at Stockport police station are little more than cages. There are two rows of cells facing each other. There is a small square at the end of the rows—it is on the first floor—with a wall around it that is about seven or eight feet high. Over the top of the square there is a wire mesh. That is the exercise area. A prisoner has no opportunity to see the outside area. That provision is entirely unsatisfactory.

Apart from the cramped conditions that apply at Stockport, Cheadle Hulme and many of the other old police stations in Greater Manchester, there is an adverse effect on the police officers who have to work in such conditions. I admit, however, that one or two of the junior officers are rather pleased to get on what they call container duty. They work a 12-hour shift while looking after the prisoners and overtime rates are paid. That helps some of them out considerably with their financial problems. I notice how generous the Home Office is in paying overtime rates in these circumstances. It is a pity that it has been unable to spend the same sort of money on finding a permanent solution to the problem of accommodating remand prisoners.

Although container duty is rather popular with some of the younger officers—they are able to earn overtime rates without having to face a football crowd or to walk around during a cold night on the streets—it is not good for them. First, they get used to spending their overtime payments.

[Mr. Andrew F. Bennett]

Secondly, I suspect that some of them become rather tired and perhaps do not perform the rest of their normal police duties quite as well as they otherwise would.

Container duty in Manchester is taking up the time of senior police officers who are required to organise the activity. It is having a considerable effect on other police activities within Greater Manchester. It is difficult to obtain exact information, but I suspect that on occasions the police have not been able to execute warrants to make arrest with the same vigour that would have been their practice in the past because they know that if they bring someone in on a warrant they will not have the space to accommodate that person. That is disturbing.

During the passage of the Criminal Justice Bill I pressed Ministers for information about how quickly they were chasing up probation defaulters. Again, I suspect that in Greater Manchester there has been a failure to chase some of them up quickly because the police did not feel that they had the necessary prison cell accommodation for the people if they carried out that duty. No police will admit that that is happening, but if the Home Office were to look into it, I think that it would find that that is one unsatisfactory aspect of the overcrowding of cells.

Because of the conditions in the smaller, more cramped police stations, there has not been an opportunity in Greater Manchester to find ways to ease the burden for police officers of all the paperwork that resulted from the passage of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. I am enthusiastic about developments such as the tape recording of interviews, the accurate recording of the entry of prisoners into police stations and quick detailing of charges, but I am amazed that in this modern age police officers still have to type routine charges on old-fashioned typewriters when so much of the work could be done automatically by pressing one key on a good word processor, as would happen in any modern office. Because of the cramped conditions in which the police have to operate, I think that there has been reluctance in Greater Manchester to get on with sensible mechanisation of much of the paperwork.

There is also the problem of what I might describe as the roundabout. Because the police cells are not suitable for people to be kept in them for any length of time, prisoners are continually being moved from one set of cells to another. That is done partly to reduce the chances of their escaping and partly to prevent them from becoming too friendly with people in one police station. When they go to court, they are sent to different police cells, and so it goes on.

It is difficult for the prisoners to cope with being moved around. Probation officers and solicitors have also had trouble in tracking down prisoners in order to carry out visits. The problem has eased slightly as they have gradually learnt to cope with it. Prisoners have very little opportunity to think about the consequences of their actions and to decide whether they will plead guilty or will be able to defend themselves.

It is very difficult for the families and friends of prisoners to visit them. The visiting facilities in Stockport in particular are completely inadequate. Chief Superintendent Whittle, who is in charge at Stockport, does a very good job, but he has admitted to me that the only way that he can make conditions tolerable for the prisoners and their families is by trying to make visits as long as possible. He gives prisoners the advantage of longer visits than they would have in a remand prison to try to compensate them for the difficult conditions. Often the visits have to be interrupted if another prisoner has to be brought in or taken out, or if a solicitor or probation officer wants to see a prisoner.

The position is also unsatisfactory for probation officers and solicitors. Those conditions make it difficult for a solicitor to speak frankly to his client, to persuade him, for example, that it would not be worth while to present a defence, but better to enter a guilty plea. They also make it difficult for a probation officer to obtain all the personal details that he needs to prepare a report for the court.

The Minister will be aware of the escape that was made from one of those police cells. That incident has remained in the minds of the police officers ever since, which has also led to substantial difficulties. There have been other eye-openers, with police officers being surprised at the attempts that even remand prisoners make to get drugs smuggled into their cells.

There has also been a great deal of temporary work undertaken, I make no complaint about that. The installation of a shower at Stockport police station and of toilet screens at Denton was very worth while.

Problems also arise in the provision of meals. The Home Office seems to assume that hot meals are available in all the police stations in Greater Manchester, but even where there are canteens, they are only open during the week, so at weekends it is necessary to send out for meals for Stockport prisoners from one of the Cheadle hospitals —and the meals are anything but hot by the time they arrive.

If those conditions had existed only from May until September, one would be unhappy, but tolerant. The promise was made that as soon as Strangeways remand wing reopened in September, all the problems would go away. Delays in completing the building delayed the reopening, and in October and November there was a dispute between prison officers and the Home Office, causing further delay well into November.

I was pleased to hear eventually during Question Time that the differences between the officers and the Home Office had been resolved, and that the remand wing would soon reopen. Therefore, when I spoke to Chief Superintendent White of Tameside police, in the other half of my constituency, I was horrified to learn that the problem had been only partly solved. The number of prisoners in police cells had fallen from 500 to 200 or 300. I was told that 210 remand prisoners and 73 convicted prisoners were being held in Greater Manchester police cells.

Chief Superintendent White said that the problem was becoming so bad that consideration was being given to bringing back into use the cells at Denton police station, which is a late Victorian or early Edwardian building. Anyone looking for an old police station to feature in a cinema or TV film should given it serious consideration —but it is totally inadeqauate for the purpose of holding prisoners in this day and age. Money is being spent on bringing that station back into use, to hold anything up to 12 prisoners. I am appalled at the prospect that it may have to be deployed for another 12 or 18 months and I hope that the Minister will be able to tell me that its use will be ended quickly.

There is some good news from Stockport, because, as its police station is unsatisfactory in many respects, the Home Office agreed to a major refurbishment. I wish that it would agree to build the second phase or a completely new station. Nevertheless, I understand that from 22 April no remand prisoners will be held at Stockport or Cheadle Hulme because of that refurbishment programme. That simply means that more of those prisoners will have to be held in the rest of the out-of-date, inadequate police cell accommodation within Greater Manchester.

It is not merely a question of people being held for a few hours. They are being held there day and night, seven days a week, and soon they will have been held in those conditions for up to 12 months. We must remember that, sadly, some of those prisoners are on remand for long periods of time. We must also consider that there were more than 70 convicted prisoners. How on earth can anyone be trying to develop some form of plan for those prisoners, so that they serve their imprisonment usefully, if they are being shuttled from one police station to another?

I understand that some of the senior police officers have been trying to do the best by these prisoners. I heard of one prisoner who was skilled in painting and decorating and was allowed to do some painting within the police station. I believe that some of the senior police officers tried to get educational materials for the prisoners, but they are not trained to do that sort of thing. At this stage, we ought to be told that the Home Office will stop it. The overcrowding is unsatisfactory, it is stopping the police from doing their proper work and there is always a risk of escapes.

I am also told that there is still a dispute between the Home Office and the prison officers, who say that because of the state of Strangeways its remand wing is only suitable for what they term "nice" remand prisoners. The difficult remand prisoners, who behave in socially unacceptable ways, are not suitable to be put back in the remand wing at Strangeways and have to be contained in police cells. They are the sort of people who excrete on the floor, pick up the excrement and throw it around. That is totally unsuitable anywhere, but it is especially unsuitable in police cells and it presents major problems for other people who are brought into the cells, some of whom may be detained there not because they have committed any crime, but for their own protection. Visits are extremely difficult if there is an anti-social and disturbed prisoner in one of the cells.

All that is costing the Home Office a fantastic amount of money. I am grateful that the Home Office has agreed to reimburse Greater Manchester police for the extra work. I hope that they are getting the full costs. Why on earth is the Home Office paying out money? Could it not have paid it out for more satisfactory accommodation? There were many prison warders at Strangeways running the old prison and the police keep asking what are they doing now. Why was it not possible for those prison warders to be moved to some other building in Greater Manchester? They could look after a larger proportion of the remand prisoners so that they do not have to be kept in police cells.

One could say, cynically, that one of the good effects is that so far there have not been any suicides. The prisoners are in such cramped conditions that suicide would be virtually impossible. However, the long-term impact on many of those prisoners must be horrendous. There is little or no opportunity for peace and quiet to come to terms with their position.

I believe that one of the other implications is that the police have probably been offering bail to more people because they do not have room to keep them in the police station. If that encourages the issuing of police bail, and if it has encouraged the police not to oppose bail on occasions, perhaps we can reduce the number of people held in custody in police stations.

Will the Minister tell us how long this situation will go on and how much it has cost the public? Perhaps he could also tell us whether the Home Office did an estimate in May of the cost of finding some alternative accommodation then and using prison warders rather than police officers. I hope that the Minister will tell us that, when all this is finished, the Home Office will be able to pay Greater Manchester police enough to refurbish most of the police cells, which have taken quite a hammering. I hope that he will also tell us that he will examine the issues of mechanising, and that of the recording of information under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act, so that many police officers can be relieved of the routine tasks of writing out statements and charge sheets at length and can use modern facilities. I hope that he will say that he is examining the question of breach of probation and that such breaches are being taken up vigorously. It discredits the whole probation service if no enforcement takes place when probation orders are breached. I also hope that the Minister can assure me that the serving of warrants in Greater Manchester is not being delayed because of a lack of cells.

The present position cannot continue. Greater Manchester needs a clear undertaking from the Home Office that by April—or May at the latest—all remand prisoners will be removed from police cells and that no convicted prisoners will be held there. They must be removed not only from police cells in Manchester but from cells belonging to the surrounding police forces. Although I do not know the details, I understand that major problems still exist there.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Peter Lloyd): I well understand why the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) has taken the trouble to raise this important subject, even at such an early hour.

There is no doubt that the continued use of police cells to hold prisoners who should be in prison service accommodation is a continuing source of grave concern. Like the hon. Gentleman, the Government regard the present state of affairs as unacceptable; nor do they rely on police cells as a routine source of extra accommodation. The Imprisonment (Temporary Provisions) Act 1980 was passed by Parliament to cope with the lengthy prison officers' dispute of that year. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Act allows the police to hold prisoners if, for any reason, it is not practicable to secure their admission to an establishment.

Prisoners have frequently had to be held in police cells in recent years, sometimes because of such periods of industrial action by prison officers and at other times because not enough prison spaces have been available. That applied especially in London and the south-east, where the prison estate simply could not cope with the numbers involved. Pressure was particularly great in local prisons and remand centres; but new accommodation began to come onstream as part of the Government's prison-building programme and there was a welcome fall in the number of people in custody. As a result, by the beginning of 1990 police cells were used only in very exceptional circumstances. However, following the disturbance at Manchester last April, more than 1,600 places were lost to the system. It was not possible to accommodate the inmates displaced by that loss of accommodation immediately in other prison service establishments. The situation was made more difficult by action by prison officers at other establishments, who were unwilling to take Manchester inmates because it would lead to overcrowding in their own prisons.

Although the long-term use of police cells now appears endemic, it is not. The Government's investment in new prison accommodation had begun to pay off and, had it not been for the Strangeways incident and the loss of accommodation in the north-west, we would not be in our present position.

It may be helpful if I explain one of the principal constraints. It is certainly one that was implied in the speech of the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish. It is true that during much of the period in question while we have had so many Manchester prison prisoners in police cells there have been spaces elsewwhere in the prison estate. The difficulty that we face is that the loss of accommodation in Manchester was loss of local prison accommodation. Local prisons hold a proportion of sentenced inmates, but their primary function is to service the courts by holding prisoners remanded in custody and those awaiting trial. In order for local prisons to perform this function they must be close to the courts that they serve. It is therefore not possible to use prison places in other parts of the country.

There is, of course, local accommodation available within reasonable travelling distance from the Manchester courts, and it was certainly our intention to use such accommodation, notwithstanding the logistical difficulties that it would pose. It is obviously far better for us to keep inmates in our own accommodation even if that means extensive escorting journeys to and from courts. It is here that the industrial action to which I have referred has obstructed us.

There is no doubt that other local prisons in the vicinity —for example, Liverpool—are overcrowded, but there have been spaces within the operational capacity—that is interpreted as the overcrowded capacity—of such establishments which we have wanted to use.

I do not underestimate in any way the concern to which the April disturbances gave rise and that anxiety is particularly acute in the north-west of England where both Risley and Manchester have seen major disturbances and acts of gross violence and vandalism. But however sympathetic one may be to the concerns of staff, the plain fact of the matter is that their unwillingness to accept Manchester prisoners from outside their court catchment areas has led directly to a large number of remand prisoners being held, as the hon. Gentleman rightly said, in entirely unsatisfactory conditions and to the police being diverted from more productive work.

That inevitable places a considerably burden on police resources and especially manpower, and I quite agree with what the hon. Member said about that. We are determined that the police should not have to shoulder such a burden for longer than is absolutely necessary. I take this opportunity to place on record my sincere appreciation of the work of the police, and that of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, and of the prisons Minister, my right hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs Rumbold), who regrets that she cannot be here this morning to answer the debate as she is in Brussels on ministerial duty.

The hon. Member for Denton and Reddish referred to meetings with the previous prisons Minister, and I say now, on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden, that she would be very pleased to meet the hon. Gentleman to discuss any points that may arise from this debate and which I am not in a position to answer.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: I am grateful for that offer, but I would just like to tell the Minister that what I want now is some action. The trouble with the previous meetings was that I was promised that something would happen, yet it just keeps dragging on. I shall be very pleased to see the Minister next week, but I hope that the Minister here tonight will convey to her that what I want, either now or then, is an assurance that by the end of April this practice will stop.

Mr. Lloyd: I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister wants to see a solution just as much as, if not more than, the hon. Gentleman. Having explained the background and having indicated that one of the major problems is the attitude of prison officers in establishments to which some of these remand prisoners might have been moved, I want to explain what we are doing to solve the problem in a measurable period of time.

We recognise the heavy load that has been placed on the police. We see this is a matter which needs to be dealt with as expeditiously as possible. I will now deal with the remedy for the problem. As I have explained, 1,600 prison places were lost at Strangeways, but an extensive refurbishment programme has been undertaken to bring back quickly as much of that accommodation as we can. As a first step, about 200 refurbished places came on stream in December.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that the prison was picking and choosing which "nice remand prisoners" it should take. There are no constraints on who goes into Strangeways. There were allegations that it was picking and choosing who should go there, but the police are now deciding whom to deliver to the prison. The prison authorities are not selecting; they will take whomever is brought to them.

The prison service took the opportunity of the additional 200 places and the short-term breathing space offered by the pre-Christmas fall in the overall prison population to secure a significant reduction in the numbers in police cells. The prison estate in the north-west was reorganised. Preston prison became a local prison receiving prisoners from all courts in Lancashire. Changes were made at Liverpool so that that prison could take inmates from all courts in Cheshire. As a result, the only prisoners now in police cells are those who have appeared in court in Manchester itself.

The prison service has sought to maximise the use of training prison places, ensuring that closed establishments are not unnecessarily retaining inmates who are appropriate for open conditions, and so freeing closed prison places for those who are being held in police cells.

The effect of all that activity was a significant reduction in police cell remands. At the beginning of November, the number in police cells was more than 1,000; by the end of December, it had fallen to below 500. However, since that time there has been a further difficulty. Although the prison population over the last year or so has been stable, in recent months there has been a surge in the overall level of the population. On 2 January the population stood at 43,458; on 1 March it had grown to 45,356.

Against that background, the prison service is adopting the following strategy. First, and most important, it continues to keep training prisons—that is, prisons holding sentenced prisoners, and which do not serve the courts—at higher levels of occupancy. The training estate is now running at about 97 per cent. occupancy which, given that that figure includes open prisons, is a very high level indeed. Priority is being given to two target groups of prisoners in police cells—sentenced adults and young offenders on remand.

A sizeable proportion of the inmate population in police cells is actually sentenced. In the normal course of events, when a prisoner is tried, found guilty and sentenced to a term of imprisonment, he or she returns to the local prison and is addressed by an observation, categorisation and allocation—OCA—unit. Those prison staff make the difficult decision of the security category that should apply to the inmate and the establishment to which he or she should be allocated to serve the sentence imposed by the court. It has, of course, been necessary for Manchester OCA staff to undertake that work not in one place in Manchester prison, but in numerous police stations across the north of England. That has led to a large backlog of work and some inmates have had to spend a long time in police cells even though they have been sentenced. A prison governor, assisted by two escort teams, is now working with the police to tackle that problem. As far as possible, sentenced inmates are now being concentrated in a few locations so that they can be more readily moved to training prisons.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Can the Minister confirm that currently there are 70 to 80 convicted prisoners in police cells in the Greater Manchester area? How soon will that practice stop?

Mr. Lloyd: I can confirm that there are convicted prisoners, but I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the exact number. As I have said, the problem is to interview, categorise, and then determine the prison to which the prisoners should be sent. That is difficult when they are spread between police cells, rather than concentrated in one remand prison where they would have been had the spaces been available. As a further measure in the light of the recent population surge, the prison service has brought back into use accommodation taken out for non-essential refurbishment.

In the south, we are changing the role of the Mount prison from a young offender institution to a category C adult training prison. I am glad to say that that activity is nearly complete and 484 cellular category C places should shortly be available. Coupled with this, a new local prison in London, Belmarsh, will shortly be coming on stream with 841 new prison places. That should bring considerable relief in the south and, indeed, can be used to have an indirect effect on the north-west. We should be able to achieve this by enabling midlands local prisons to allocate sentenced prisoners to training places in the south. That in turn should enable midlands training prisons to receive inmates from the north.

The top priority in the north of England is to get young men on remand out of police cells. The crucial structural obstacle to this is the lack of capacity in the north-west for young men under the age of 21 remanded in custody or committed for trial. Substantial numbers of these were held in Strangeways, but now it is necessary for us to rely on Hindley, which is simply too small for the task.

The position will be resolved completely when a new young offender institution and remand centre—Brinsford in Staffordshire—comes on stream in October. That will give 475 new places. The task between now and then is to make a temporary arrangement for remand and trial prisoners. Prison service management has explored urgently the possibility of converting other nearby establishments for this use. Both Werrington and Thorn Cross were considered, but it is clear that either of those options would require substantial building work. In any event, Werrington is required for juveniles. For the immediate purpose we have in mind, they are quite simply non-starters.

The only short-term option available, therefore, is to create more space in Hindley. In the time available that could not be achieved by building. Instead, action is in hand to transfer out of Hindley young men who are awaiting trial who do not require the frequent escorting to and from court that is necessary in respect of remand prisoners. We hope to release space by transferring these pre-trial prisoners to another establishment, in the first instance Stoke Heath. Stoke Heath is the establishment which takes from Hindley sentenced inmates and allocates them to the training young offender institutions around the country. In turn, young men in Stoke Heath who are serving sentences will require to be transferred even further afield.

The next priority is the clearing of sentenced adults. New arrangements being made with the police will enable larger numbers of sentenced adults in police cells than before to be available for transfer to training prisons. But the recent surge in population, coupled with the large number of places now out of use for essential refurbishment to provide integral sanitation, has meant that fewer training places are being offered for this purpose than we would wish. That leads to even more emphasis being placed on the need to get nearly 200 new places at Full Sutton on stream as soon as possible, and we are working to do that.

The number of adult prisoners on trial or remanded in custody will reduce considerably when the next phase of accommodation at Manchester comes on stream. Some 140 extra refurbished places will be handed over in May and we want to minimise the commissioning period for that accommodation. I am also pleased to say that following lengthy negotiations with the local branch of the Prison Officers Association, Liverpool prison has agreed to take from the beginning of next week 60 prisoners hitherto held in Manchester police cells. Those will comprise some sentenced prisoners and some prisoners on trial. We greatly welcome this important step.

The effect of these changes should be to achieve a further, very significant reduction in our use of police cells, provided, of course, there is not a further late surge in the overall prison population. The overall picture will in any event change radically later in the year as 2,500 places in new establishments come on stream between April and October. Of course, apart from Brinsford which I have already mentioned, the most significant will be 649 young offender and remand places at Moorland near Doncaster in July.

I hope that it is clear from this complex explanation of our policy that this is far from being a problem that is easy to resolve. I hope also that it is clear that vigorous and ingenious action has been and is being taken to deal with this problem. There is no lack of commitment by the Government and we shall shortly be seeing very significant improvements in the system as a result of the building programme. The problem at Manchester has been so severe because we lost local prison accommodation. Local prisons have for very many years borne the brunt of overcrowding. That situation should be behind us over the next few years when 10 local prisons and remand centres will come on stream, beginning next month with Belmarsh in London. While we wait for these new places to become available the prison service will continue to make the fullest use of the prison estate so as to minimise the use of police cells.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: How much will that cost? Will the Home Office be able to refurbish the police cells in Greater Manchester which have taken such a hammering in the past 12 months?

Mr. Lloyd: I shall have to write to the hon. Gentleman on that question because I do not know what plans my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for giving me the opportunity to put on record the points that I have made. I agree that the problem demands attention, but I hope that he agrees that the permanent solution that he calls for is in train.

Northern Ireland (Political Developments)

6.40 am

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): It is appropriate for us to discuss political developments in Northern Ireland because in parliamentary terms it is still Thursday, so today we have seen the release of the Birmingham Six and an announcement at Question Time by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland about a timetable for talks with the political parties and various other interests. However, I appreciate that the Minister might not wish to go into too much detail on those matters when he replies because they are sensitive and some details cannot be given because some of the talks are behind closed doors. They develop in stages at which something else can be said and the points can be developed.

The two events earlier today raise, as always with Northern Ireland, issues of security, although in this case it is security associated with a miscarriage of justice. They also raise the subject of constitutional reform, as presumably devolved government is on the agenda for the first stage of discussion.

I wish to raise some extra items in this debate and to stress the economic and social background of the conditions in Northern Ireland. The adverse circumstances often act as a breeding ground for sectarianism. I also want to stress the willingness of more and more people in Northern Ireland courageously to stand up against terror and intimidation and the need for Northern Ireland to develop what could be called a more normal political scene based on the politics of class division rather than the current sectarian divisions. I shall develop that point at greater length than the other two points, which I shall touch on later.

Although I argue for the relevance of democratic socialism to Ireland, both north and south, I begin by referring to a definition of democracy which was once often quoted in political theory. It is the definition of Schumpeter in a book that he wrote in 1944 called "Capitalism, Socialism and Democracy." Schumpeter was an advocate of capitalism. He thought that democracy went together with it. He was a pessimist because he thought that socialism would take over. He feared that socialism would be undemocratic, which it does not have to be. Nor does it have to be based on the experiences in eastern Europe.

Schumpeter's definition of democracy is useful as a framework for the debate. He defined democracy as essentially a competitive struggle for people's votes, rather like competition in the marketplace between capitalists in a market economy for goods and services. The classical points used in favour of that system begin to be related to democratic institutions. It is rather cold, mechanistic definition of democracy and it has a bias within it—it is not value free. It stresses points, with which the Government might have sympathy, about democratic capitalism. The definition omits the spirit and norms of democracy in which civil liberties, a concern for others and a collective concern for the public good need to play a considerable part.

Such a form of democracy is very much a part of democratic socialism. Competition for votes works better when there is competition between political organisations. I should hope that they would be socialist parties. Some might argue for centralism and some for decentralisation, but they would share a libertarian and collectivist viewpoint. Those views need not necessarily be incompatible.

We often have to put up with second-best democracy —a halfway house to the democracy that I have described —especially in a capitalist society or in a mixed economy in which the major parties divide essentially on class lines, although there may be a consensus about the democratic methods that should be employed.

The advantage of class divisions within a democratic system is that, at least in theory, they are subject to temporary compromises on divisions of interest, which allow a temporary position to be reached after which the parties can manoeuvre and hassle for their interests at a further stage. If, for example, a trade union puts in a wage demand for £10 a week and the employers do not wish to pay that, a compromise of £5 is often reached. Nobody is especially satisfied with that, but it allows people to keep the game going.

In a book called "In Defence of Politics", Bernard Crick defined such politics as being about the reconciliation of conflicting interests. That form of politics is distorted when topics that are alien to reaching temporary compromises and reconciliation begin to dominate. There have been violent disputes in countries such as Belgium where language division cuts across the normal class divisions.

The problems in Ireland are considerable. The politics of Fianna Fail and of Fine Gael are shaped by the civil war. It is as if an unnatural development has taken place in Northern Ireland. The two parties have emerged, rather than there being a left-right conflict such as we have in the British system. That has been nurtured by continued feelings about Northern Ireland and by articles 2 and 3 of the Irish constitution, which claim that Northern Ireland should be included within Ireland.

In Northern Ireland, those events have led to the classical unionist-nationalist tradition, which distorts class divisions considerably. In the heyday of single-party unionism and nationalism, the dominant body has been the unionists. Class interests and the elite of capitalism have often been associated with unionism rather than with nationalist interests. That has meant that the normal hassle between capital and labour has not emerged fully because, to gain a slightly advantageous position, part of labour has associated itself with the unionists rather than with the nationalists, who do not owe the same loyalty to the Province.

Another distortion of normal politics in capitalist or mixed economies arises when major parties are merely capitalist, as they tend to be in the United States, and as I fear is increasingly the case in Britain, where the distinction tends to be between two varieties of parties which accept general norms and values. I do not think that that is entirely lost in this particular system, but some of my fears are shared by publications such as those by my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer).

If the type of system that is strong in America develops, possessive individualism will dominate, with private affluence on one side and poverty and public squalor on the other. Democratic socialism is particularly appropriate to democratic systems. Nevertheless, some healthy possibilities are developing in Northern Ireland politics —sometimes outside the Province, but nevertheless having an impact on it.

In Ireland there has been the election of Mary Robinson as President. That was partly a fluke, because of some problems that Fianna Fail was having at the time, but it enabled her, at her inaugural address, to talk about a victory and having tackled the faded flags of the civil war. Out of that have come the politics of Fianna Fail and Fianna Gael and the Sinn Fein tradition which is still strong in Northern Ireland.

In addition, there are electoral signs in Ireland of the Irish Labour party and the Workers' party providing the alternative which is healthy and necessary within a democracy. That will have its own impact on the other two political parties, some of whose ground it will have to take if they are to survive. There are also changes in Great Britain. We may be experiencing the death throes of Thatcherism. Certainly some political change is on the horizon, either within the Conservative party or following a general election. A different agenda is developing. All that is healthy for Northern Ireland because of the economic and social consequences that follow from it.

Unfortunately, Northern Ireland is stuck with a divided unionism between the Ulster Unionist party and the Democratic Unionist party—nevertheless a unionism— and a divided nationalism between the Social Democratic and Labour party and Sinn Fein. The SDLP is very much what its name suggests—a social democratic party, not particularly a democratic socialist party, but suggesting slight shifts in the agenda which point in a leftward direction, for too much has been set upon one of the communities in Northern Ireland.

There is little representation, even at local government level, of any other political parties. Both the major groups need to be pulled beyond the sectarian divide that they often fight and struggle within and which, for their own electoral advantage, they are to a large extent bound by.

In Northern Ireland, normal class politics is a minority activity of the Alliance and the Workers' parties, and I do not see that present developments in the Conservative party in Northern Ireland, or the possible future establishment of the Labour party there, would provide any magic answers to overcome the conundrum. There would merely be the extra minor element that they could not get into the political system.

Moves that undermine sectarianism will amend the nature of party politics. They will either change the nature of the current political parties or create opportunities for other parties. On some issues, such as student loans, Ulster Unionists and the SDLP forget their divisions. All the parties in Northern Ireland, except the Conservative party, opposed student loans.

Unionist and SDLP Members complain about the worst effects of the enterprise culture such as the closure of hospitals, yet they often troop through the Lobby with the Government. On the other hand, the speeches of Northern Ireland politicians show that different views are forced on them by their electorate.

The more that change in southern Ireland makes that country less worrying to Northern Ireland Protestants and the more that change in Northern Ireland makes it less worrying to Catholics throughout the island of Ireland, the more the politics of Ireland and Northern Ireland will change. That was probably the aim of the Anglo-Irish Agreement, which mistakenly was concluded without the prior acceptance and involvement of Northern Ireland Protestants.

[Mr. Harry Barnes]

A factor for change in Northern Ireland is the overcoming of the enterprise culture. That must be strongly pursued because Northern Ireland suffers from many problems. The scourge of unemployment is massive and long lingering. Privatisation, which often increases unemployment, is particularly inappropriate for Northern Ireland. The Ports Bill will destroy port trusts such as that in Londonderry. Such ports are held in trust for the community and are part of communal provision that should be allowed to continue.

A further factor for change is the logic of collective cross-party and non-party activity in Northern Ireland. Several groups are challenging the terrorism of extreme Protestant groups, the IRA and other extreme republican groups and the over-reaction of state and security forces. New Consensus has three groups operating in Northern Ireland, Ireland and in this country opposing terror and intimidation. A specific group organised by Nancy Gracey in Downpatrick is called Families Against Intimidation and Terror. It opposes sectarian violence and is concerned about the role of the state. It says that Amnesty International and other civil liberties organisations concentrate on state violence, whereas about 90 per cent. of violence in Northern Ireland is perpetrated by paramilitary organisations which use intimidation and crude devices such as knee capping.

The peace train organisations run trains between Dublin and Belfast to show that the IRA threatens people, as it has in this country in terms of train services, in a quite unreasonable way. Those organisations attract support from a wide spectrum of party-political involvement and from people who have no connection with political parties. The trade unions are attempting to overcome many of the problems and have mounted campaigns such as "Hands off my mate."

Given the long haul before there is any change in Irish politics—there are no easy solutions—and a shift to a normality that has never been known in the democratic era of Irish politics, boundary questions, constitutional issues, terrorism and sectarianism can then be tackled in the best way—democratically. If democracy is to flourish, more than a mechanism is needed; the values and concerns that I have stressed must be nurtured.

No one ought more strongly to urge the need for social conditions for democracy in Northern Ireland than democratic socialists. Terror and intimidation will thereby be undermined. In no way should we condone them.

7.1 am

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): I am sure that we are all grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes) for raising such an important topic at this hour of the morning. Occasionally it is useful to turn away from the immediate problems of a particular sectarian or terrorist outrage, and even from the day-to-day manoeuvrings connected with what is euphemestically known as the Brooke initiative, and to look instead at the longer term and at my hon. Friend's analysis, as he sees it, of the situation in Northern Ireland.

My hon. Friend began by mentioning two particular matters—the Birmingham Six and the Brooke initiative. All of us must welcome the release of the Birmingham Six. My only regret is that no word of compassion was uttered by Government Ministers about what happened to those men over the years. No Minister appeared to be able to say, "I'm sorry." No one on the Government side commended the work done by my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) during his campaign.

As for the Secretary of State's initiative and the statement that he made earlier today, the House will welcome the fact that the Taoiseach of the Republic has accepted the message sent to him and the Secretary of State's document. We must hope that the other parties to the discussions will be able to do so, too. They will have to look carefully at what is involved, but if in holy week the Secretary of State is able to say that all the parties have indicated their acceptance, that will start a new chapter in dealing with some of the problems to which my hon. Friend referred.

I do not intend to deal with all my hon. Friend's analyses. I do not necessarily accept all of them. I understand, however, his interpretation of history and the current situation. I think that he is right to point to some of the important developments in Northern Ireland outside the institutions of political parties and government. Some have been helped by the Government; others have been helped by voluntary organisations within society. The Minister of State is here to deal with a matter concerning which he deserves some praise. I rarely praise Tory Ministers. I hope, therefore, that he will note down the time and the date.

The work that has been done in the education programme for mutual understanding is of the utmost importance, as is the work that has resulted in cross-school relations between the voluntary and state sectors, within the integrated education sector. One of the best ways of overcoming fear is to learn about what the other side stands for and believes in. That does not undercut existing loyalties or threaten previously held positions. It is enriching to learn about those whose opinions one has not really examined before. The experience does not water down people's own beliefs and they should not fear it. It should cause them to re-examine their own positions and to realise that in the island of Ireland there are competing traditions and loyalties.

An important event that has received some recognition in the Republic and in the north, but not here, was the agreement between the two Ministers responsible for education. The glossy document that they launched in Dublin, concerning what was happening in Europe and in Ireland at the time of the battle of the Boyne, and what that battle meant to the different traditions and parties, was significant.

My hon. Friend also mentioned the Anglo-Irish Agreement. This is not the time to attempt a treatise on its origins, but it encompassed an acceptance by the Government and parties of the Republic of the fact that there was a distinct unionist tradition in the north, with a life and origin of its own—separate from this island. That tradition does not exist on the apron strings of successive British Governments; it has a vibrancy and organic growth of its own in the island of Ireland. That recognition, too, was significant.

The agreement also recognised that there is a powerful nationalist tradition in the north which is worthy of respect and encouragement. Whatever else one thinks of the agreement, it signified recognition by the two Governments of the legitimacy of the two separate traditions and of their right to encouragement and respect —another factor of the utmost importance.

Despite the aberrant attitude of the Government to Glor na Gael there has been a recognition of the role of the Irish language as an entity which belongs to both traditions. It should be revered, resuscitated and encouraged. It represents a unifying strand between the two traditions. Old languages under threat contain much human emotion, passion and tradition. They should not be maintained artificially by being rammed down people's throats; they should be kept alive by encouraging those who want to use them to work and be educated in the language, and by assuring them that they will then have a role to play. It is sometimes forgotten that the first major printed book in Irish was issued by the Presbyterians in Belfast.

My hon. Friend spoke about Families Against Intimidation and Terror. Often, the work of the voluntary organisations in Northern Ireland is not recognised here, although they work in our constituencies as well. I pay tribute to the fact that Mr. Quintin Oliver, chairman of the voluntary sector, has been offered, and has accepted, a post on the council of the President of the Republic. That was a tremendous gesture by the President and it showed an understanding of the position of the voluntary sector not just in the north, but throughout the island of Ireland.

This sector is of particular importance in Northern Ireland. It brings together communities from Shankill and the Falls, from the Waterside and the Bogside, from rural Ireland and from urban Ireland. It brings together people from both communities who suffer those afflictions that do not ask what tradition a person belongs to before they strike him. That includes multiple sclerosis among many other diseases. It also brings together people involved in cultural activities—music, literature, history; all matters of great importance. They enrich any society, but in the circumstances of Northern Ireland, they have an even greater role to play. They do not challenge people about whence they came or demand to know what their hopes and aspirations are. They recognise only common humanity.

It would be wrong not to mention a greater voluntary organisation that exists throughout the island of Ireland, but particularly the north—the trade unions. Unfortunately, under the dispensation of the Government, trade unions have not been recognised for the role that they play in our society. They have waged various important campaigns in the north—the most recent called, "Hands off my mate"—to keep sectarianism and terrorism off the factory floor, out of the shops, and out of industry and commerce. They have not always been successful, but they have made tremendous efforts.

My union has seen many casualties. Bus drivers have been killed, shop stewards have been killed for no other reason than that they were Protestant, and some of our members were killed at Enniskillen. These people have sought to do what my hon. Friend has recommended—identify each other by class, so as to defend their interests and enhance opportunities for themselves, their families and their communities. The trade unions in Northern Ireland have played a long, commendable and honourable role in the troubles that have beset the island. They have also sought, through cross-border co-operation and membership of the Irish Congress of Trades Unions, to create an understanding in the Republic of the problems of working people in the north and to make the argument about the future of the island of Ireland on an all-Ireland basis.

The trade unions have also argued the point made by many, including the Labour party, that problems will affect the island of Ireland as a result of 1992, and they have highlighted the need for greater co-operation in a whole range of economic and social issues, if 1992 is not to engulf both parts of Ireland. They must make sure that, as an offshore island which will have none of the so-called benefits of the channel tunnel, they will still be able to play a proper role in the emerging Community.

I am sure that we are all indebted to my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, North-East for the rare opportunity that he has given us to take ourselves away from the day-to-day horrors and incidents of Northern Ireland so that we may try to take a longer look at what is happening and to recognise and pay tribute to the many in Northern Ireland who are doing so much that is unsung, unseen but not unappreciated, at least not by hon. Members.

7.15 am

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Dr. Brian Mawhinney): I entirely agree with the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) in his words of appreciation of the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes). The hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East was fortunate in the ballot and he chose to introduce into our discussions on Northern Ireland matters and issues which are hugely important but which, because of the pressures of security and political development, frequently do not receive the attention that they deserve. I thank the hon. Gentleman for the spirit and the grace with which he introduced the debate.

This is the same parliamentary day on which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made his announcement during Northern Ireland Question Time. As the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East has recognised, there is little that I can add to my right hon. Friend's statement at this time. Like the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North, I welcome the Taoiseach's acceptance of the statement as a basis for moving forward. My right hon. Friend made a significant period available to all the parties precisely because the issues at stake are important. The significance is real and it is right that the parties should have the opportunity to consult and to consider carefully before making a response.

The speech of the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East had the quality of consistency, for the House is aware of his commitment to democratic socialism, which he restated today. I noted en passant his reflections on what is happening within the Labour party, but, in the spirit of bipartisanship that has marked the debate so far, I shall not intrude into those private discussions.

The hon. Gentleman listed three factors that are important to democratic socialists—civil liberties, people working together and concern for the common good—and linked those factors to his broader initial reflections on the concept of democracy. I do not wish to suggest in any way that the three factors are not associated with democratic socialism, but I ask the hon. Gentleman to accept that they are in no sense restricted to it. They are among the pillars on which democracy is based. They are the common aspirations and commitments of all who are committed to democratic institutions and democratic ways of behaving.

The hon. Gentleman talked of wishing to see more class division in the politics of Northern Ireland. I understand what he means, but perhaps it is an unfortunate phrase. He said that one of the problems that has bedevilled the island of Ireland over the centuries is the concept of division. To wish away certain existing divisions and to replace them with class division seems not necessarily to advance things much further.

I understand the spirit of the hon. Gentleman's comment. He was encouraging a reversion to more normal types of political activity, separated from issues of constitutionalism and the overbearing influence that history sometimes has on the conduct of politics in the island of Ireland, as he chose to illustrate his point from the Republic as well as the north.

At the very heart of democracy is the concept that people should freely give their consent to the government of the state and that the will of the majority should prevail, although that will is subject to periodic test on the understanding that the majority can change. It has to change on the basis of persuasion. That has been part of the problem of the island of Ireland and of political developments in Northern Ireland for a long time.

What has been known colloquially as border politics —the constitutional issue—has so overwhelmed the other concepts of politics that, as the hon. Gentleman rightly pointed out, they have tended to be sidelined. In his references to the Anglo-Irish Agreement, he alluded to the importance of article 1 being that it restated the fundamental democratic concept that the status cannot and will not be changed unless consent is freely given by the majority. Of course, article 1 went on to say that if such a change were to take place, Governments would react and respond accordingly.

The affirmation of consent freely given is very important, because it delineates the constitutional framework within which political developments within Northern Ireland will have to be seen for the foreseeable future. I know of no nationalist or republican, no matter how ardent, who believes that the constitutional position is likely to change democratically in the immediate or forseeable future. Therefore, it is important to hold that point in mind when we discuss the broader issues.

The hon. Gentleman was right to draw attention in the first instance to the importance of economic policy to political development in the Province. Unemployment is too high. It is higher than in Great Britain and has been for some time, although the hon. Gentleman will share with me the satisfaction to be derived from the fact that it is running at about 28,000 fewer than it was at its peak in 1986. The hon. Gentleman will have heard the Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Wiltshire, North (Mr. Needham), affirm at Question Time what I affirmed in the Appropriation debate on Monday —that the strength of Northern Ireland's economy is enabling it better to weather the current economic difficulties. That is why Ministers spend much time seeking for Northern Ireland further investment from anywhere in the world, as the hon. Gentleman knows.

Northern Ireland is a place where profitability is possible and is frequently achieved, and which needs jobs. We are more than happy to welcome with open arms all who can contribute to investment and jobs. Getting people off the streets, getting them trained and into employment, and giving them a stake in the Province is an important element of the political development that the hon. Gentleman mentioned.

Having said that, the hon. Gentleman may wish to reflect on his remark about the inappropriateness of privatisation to Northern Ireland—not least in the light of our experience in respect of Shorts, which moved from the public to the private sector comparatively recently, just a couple of years ago. The hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East will be pleased to learn, as I was, that I think probably about 700 more people are employed by Shorts today, as a private sector company, than was the case when it was in the public sector. That improvement is a little difficult to square with what I thought was a touch of the democratic socialism edging its way into the hon. Gentleman's broader argument.

We can make common cause on the hon. Gentleman's point concerning the need to mobilise citizens in resisting terrorism. It is a fallacy in any society that those paid to offer a service of care to the community by upholding the law ought to shoulder full responsibility for the community in discharging that task. All of us have a responsibility, as citizens, for the communities in which we live.

In that regard, I pay tribute to the work of New Consensus, those with whom it is associated, and the various groups that the hon. Gentleman mentioned, for the stand that they have taken, which crosses communities in Northern Ireland and brings people together, in sending the message that the citizens of Northern Ireland are united in rejecting the ways of those who, because they cannot win the argument at the ballot box, resort to terrorism and violence.

Although the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East did not say so, I am sure that he would want all the citizens of Northern Ireland to be reminded that they have a responsibility also to offer their support and encouragement to the security forces and the police, to stand alongside them as they serve the community—frequently in the face of danger—and to make available to them whatever information they have which could lead to the apprehension, arrest, trial, and conviction of those who break the law, not least by committing acts of terrorism.

The fact that we have a good security service and police force does not absolve the public from their responsibilities as citizens and their obligation to observe common standards of decency and humanity.

Mr. Harry Barnes: Families Against Intimidation and Terror has highlighted the case of Mickey Williams, who telephoned 999 after hearing screams which had to do with an incident that apparently involved the IRA. Mickey Williams received a death threat and was forced to flee the country. His home was invaded by people who were even prepared to tell Mr. Williams' eight-year-old child that his father would be killed. Families Against Intimidation and Terror subsequently campaigned widely, with the result that the death threat against Mr. Williams was technically lifted outside Northern Ireland. The IRA member concerned was arrested. The IRA will not allow Mr. Williams to return until that case has been dealt with, but that incident shows the kind of changes that can be made by people standing up for themselves and for the normal processes of law and order, and refusing to be intimidated.

Dr. Mawhinney: The hon. Gentleman offers an example of the more general theme in his speech.

One of the issues that New Consensus has focused on has been integrated education, and its development in our schools. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) for his kind personal comments, and I noted the time and the date. While it would be nice if he were to make it a regular occurrence, I understand why he may not always wish to follow that course. However, he is right to point out the significance of what has been happening in our schools in the past few years.

For the first time, parents have the choice, under statute, of integrated schools as a third option alongside what are colloquially referred to as state schools and Catholic schools in Northern Ireland. It is an option which they ought to have. It is a matter for the parents to decide how they want to have their children educated, but there is no doubt that there is a small but growing movement, and a growing number of parents who wish their children to be educated in the same classroom as children from the other side of the community, in schools that value both traditions equally.

Having said that, it is clear that the number of children in integrated schools for the foreseeable future will be only a small proportion of those in schools. Therefore, it was necessary for us to consider what might be done to bridge the community divide for all the other children.

As the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East knows, we wrote into the Education Reform (Northern Ireland) Order 1989 a number of curriculum changes, and he has highlighted education for mutual understanding. I appreciated his comments, as I appreciated his support in what was seen in some quarters as a reasonably contentious order. Nevertheless, there was support across the Chamber for those aspects of it and I pay tribute to the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues for the support that they gave to education for mutual understanding and the other new course, cultural heritage. It is important for the House to understand that those will be compulsory for all schoolchildren between the ages of five and 16.

The other curriculum development that I think is of special importance is the move to have a common history curriculum taught for the first time in our schools in Northern Ireland. As the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East pointed out, given the influence of history upon the politics and political development of the island of Ireland, that common history curriculum will also make a considerable contribution after a time.

I was also grateful to the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East for what he said about the development under the general title of "Kings in Conflict". I well remember having the pleasure of welcoming Mrs. Mary O'Rourke, the Education Minister from the Republic to the Ulster museum when we both launched that initiative, amid the "Kings in Conflict" exhibition, which ran so successfully at the museum for a number of months. I am pleased that it has moved to fruition and, as the hon. Gentleman said, my right hon. and noble Friend Lord Belstead was able to go to Dublin recently to launch the final video version. Like him, I am impressed by it, and I can say that because I did not have a direct hand in planning it. Like the hon. Gentleman, I believe that as it is used it will influence for good the next generation and the generation after that in Northern Ireland.

Mr. McNamara: And in the Republic.

Dr. Mawhinney: Yes—and in the Republic. I restricted my remarks simply because this is a debate on political development in Northern Ireland, but the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North is right to point out that it will have a significant influence in the Republic, just as it will in the north.

The hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East was also right to stress the importance of the cultural traditions programme. One of the difficulties about the Irish language has been that for whatever reasons—this is not the time or the place to analyse them—it has become politicised over the years. It has been taken out of its cultural context and put into a political context. The Government believe—and as the Minister responsible I strongly believe—that it needs to be redeveloped in its cultural context. As the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East said, in that context it spans the community in Northern Ireland. He will have taken heart from the fact that I was able to announce the prospect of significant Government grants to the Ultach trust, for example, which was set up to develop the Irish language, without any political upset in the Province.

He will also have taken heart from the fact that I was able to announce a grant for an inquiry into the development of an interpretative centre at Dan Winter's cottage, the site of the origins of the Orange order in Northern Ireland—another cultural tradition of the Province involving, again, no political perturbation.

In all those ways, we must try to undermine what the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East has described as sectarian politics. We have had a measure of success, not only in the social, economic and community—relations sphere but in that of elective politics. In some ways, that could be described as the most significant development in the past couple of years.

Of the 26 councils in Northern Ireland, about 10 now have a form of shared leadership: if the mayor or chairman comes from one tradition, his deputy comes from another. That development has been widely welcomed in the Province and, where it has come about, represents a challenge to the other councils that have not yet adopted the practice. Moreover, it has been widely welcomed throughout the community in Northern Ireland. We need only consider the standing and moral influence of councils such as Dungannon to appreciate that the concept of sharing—which does not always run smoothly, but which nevertheless is fundamentally important—is influencing people's attitudes.

Another welcome development is the way in which local politicians are joining forces with Ministers—trying to develop local economic plans with the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State my hon. Friend the Member for Wiltshire, North, or community relations plans with me. It is encouraging to note that, over the past 12 to 18 months, 10 councils have embarked on relationships with the Government that will involve them in employing community relations officers to work together with councillors and local people to bridge the community gap. Eight more councils have agreed to the arrangement and will be appointing community relations officers; we are negotiating with five more. Only three out of the 26 are not either involved in the scheme or seriously considering it. That represents a development in elective politics. One of the requirements is that the programmes cannot proceed unless the elected representatives of the people vote in open council to endorse the scheme, which carries with it the thumbprints of elected politicians from both sides of the community.

All those developments contain a message of hope and encouragement—whether they relate to the fundamentals of democracy which all of us affirm and reaffirm, to the concept of consent freely given and the importance of persuasion rather than threat and intimidation, to the economy, to the social sphere in the commitment to fair employment and the provision of good services, to community relations and education, or to local councils. We are able to send out that message this morning. This measure carries bipartisan support, not in the intricacies of political theory or the details of Government policy, but in the bipartisan commitment to all activities that seek to bring people together—as the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East said, to affirm civil liberties, to encourage working together, to promote the common good—and it will be a measure of agreement widely welcomed in the Province. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving us the opportunity to send that message today.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the important issue of some of the possible consequences of the financial crisis currently facing the Science and Engineering Research Council. May I say, Mr. Speaker, how honoured we are to have you gracing this debate at such an early hour.

There was an important debate, initiated by the Opposition, in the House on 6 February on the funding of science in this country. Not surprisingly, quite a lot of the discussion at that time focused on the position of the Science and Engineering Research Council. I do not wish to repeat much of the argument in that debate on the Government's general record on science funding. I would just like to make one point that was repeated in the debate. I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) the Labour party spokesman on science is here, because he made this point effectively in the debate, as did others.

I very much regret that the Government have not published, as has been the normal practice in recent years, the advice given by the Advisory Board for the Research Councils. Whatever view one takes of the Government's overall funding of science and, in particular, the latest allocations announced to the science budget generally and to individual research councils, there can be no dispute about the funding crisis at SERC.

On 7 February the Science and Engineering Research Council issued a press notice with the heading "SERC's measures to combat shortfall in its funding".

Away back in November, because the level of its funding for the current year was being outstripped by inflation, the council had to implement severe measures to cut back spending, including, I believe, a virtual freeze on recruitment. The announcement about the proposed level of funding for 1991-92 for the research council has aggravated that situation.

We have to understand that SERC has a very important role to play within the general framework of science in this country. I respect the position of the Medical Research Council and am a former employee of the Agricultural and Food Research Council, and I understand that they have problems; but the situation confronting SERC stands out as particularly serious. I very much regret the statements that have appeared of late, some in the quality press, that somehow we should not be involved in big science, that somehow there is a case for retrenchment in, if not actual withdrawal from, British participation in what is loosely described as big science, especially astronomy and nuclear physics, the two areas which are particularly threatened and at risk.

I put it to the Minister that it is the Science and Engineering Research Council's role to support that science, because in practice the huge costs involved in equipment and in international subscriptions are such that no university department will pick up this work. SERC is the only organisation which can sponsor much of this research. That is why it is so crucial that it recognises its responsibility to do so.

I make no bones of the fact that my first reason for raising this subject at this hour concerns my interest, as a former scientist and an Edinburgh Member of Parliament, in the future of the royal observatory, Edinburgh. That observatory and the other SERC observatory, the royal Greenwich observatory at Cambridge are currently the subject of a review. That review was initiated prior to the funding crisis becoming apparent, and certainly prior to any decisions being taken by the council about the funding crisis. However, there is no doubt that the financial crisis puts pressure on that review and makes it more likely that some bad decisions could be taken because of the need to save money in the short term. The review was initiated when Professor Longair accepted another important appointment, and the council decided that that would be an appropriate time to consider the contributions made by the two observatories.

The royal observatory has 122 staff, 20 of whom are based at Hilo in Hawaii. It also funds another 40 local staff in Hawaii. In this modern age, it makes sense for observatories to base their modern telescopes in favourable locations. The real telescope work is carried out at Hawaii.

The royal observatory has a valuable record across the whole spectrum of astronomy. It provides national facilities for astronomers throughout the United Kingdom. Astronomers from a whole range of universities use its facilities. We benefit from the close relationship of the observatory with the astronomy department of Edinburgh university. I emphasise that it is the only SERC laboratory in Scotland. Its director is also the professor of astronomy at Edinburgh and the Astronomer Royal. There is no doubt that that symbiosis between the university department and the SERC staff has created a successful climate for scientific endeavour, which helps to make the observatory such a useful facility for astronomers throughout the country.

I do not want to take too much of the time of the House detailing the achievement of the observatory. I shall concentrate on only a few aspects. What stands out in Edinburgh is the work on instrumentation. It is an important area in astronomy and in the learning of more and more about our planet. The observatory's work is internationally renowned. It has recently delivered a spectrometer to Hawaii which is acknowledged to be three or four years ahead of any of its rivals, including those being developed in the United States. Two large 8m telescopes are to be developed in the late 1990s, one of which is to be based in Hawaii. It is a tribute to the royal observatory staff that they will be managing the 8m telescope in Hawaii. There will be one in the northern hemisphere and one in the southern hemisphere.

The instrumentation department undoubtedly has an exceptional international reputation. Optical engineers, experts in computer software work and scientists in other disciplines work together in that department. Basically, their work is related mainly to telescopes used by astronomers. We should never lose sight of the fact—it was something of which I was very much aware when I worked as a scientist—that the exchange between pure and applied scientists means that the work in some areas of science can be of great benefit to work in other areas. Examples of that relate to work carried out by scientists at the royal observatory in Edinburgh. They analyse slides and pictures of the sky using the sophisticated Cosmos machine which measures the density of photographic emulsion. The pictures are digitised and analysed by computer. Those instruments and that software can be used to improve the detection of cancer cells in cervical smears. This approach can also be used to detect breast cancer at an early stage from X-rays of women's breasts. That is an important collaboration between the Medical Research Council and the scientists at the royal obsdervatory in Edinburgh. That is an important example of the spin-offs that can result from research, particularly when there is such a high-calibre team as that operating in Edinburgh.

The team has also collaborated with the Admiralty in analysing the bubbles that are left by submarines as they move under water. The Admiralty is using some of the team's facilities and techniques to improve submarine detection.

There are other areas of activity at the royal observatory in Edinburgh that I have not had time to mention but which are outstanding by international standards. It would be an act of scientific vandalism if SERC, during its current review, destroyed those teams. That is what is at stake.

There might be a proposal to merge aspects of the work of the royal Greenwich observatory at Cambridge with that in Edinburgh. I can think of nothing more damaging than to transfer the instrumentation work from Edinburgh to Cambridge. If that were proposed, many of the scientists would not move to Cambridge. Such a proposal would destroy one of the jewels of the SERC's effort and that would be nothing short of an act of scientific vandalism.

The threat to the royal observatory in Edinburgh is not a direct consequence of the funding crisis confronting SERC. However, we in Edinburgh fear that the additional pressure that is being brought to bear on the council to make cuts and achieve rationalisations, even when they cannot be justified, could lead to damaging decisions being taken that would seriously affect the long-term contribution that the royal observatory in Edinburgh with its tremendous history, can make in that area.

I want to refer briefly to the threat to nuclear physics, which is another aspect of big science to arise from the crisis facing SERC. A great deal has been made of the fact that about two thirds of the funding of the nuclear physics board within SERC is directed to CERN, the European centre for nuclear research. We must consider these issues objectively. If we examine a graph of CERN's total budget at 1989 prices, between 1980 and 1989 it is clear that the budget has effectively been constant. There was a slight increase, but that was due mainly to new member states joining. Since 1980, the CERN budget has risen in real terms by less than 5 per cent., despite the cost of building the LEP—large electron-position collider. It would be wrong to say that the CERN contribution was a particularly unpredictable element of the nuclear physics board's budget.

The problem is that the nuclear physics board is having to bear the brunt of proposed cuts within SERC. It seems that the council proposes to hit hardest the nuclear structure research as opposed to particle physics.

There is international recognition of the value of the research and the excellence of the British contribution to it. It would be a great setback to not only British science but science throughout the world if some of the proposed cuts were implemented. I shall give only one quotation because I know that there is another debate to follow this one. It is from Claude Detraz the chairman of the European organisation of nuclear physics laboratory heads. With reference to the proposed cuts in nuclear structure research and in particular the proposal to end the support for such research at the Daresbury lab, he said:

"It seems unusual to say the least that such a brutal change should not be accompanied by a detailed evaluation of the anticipated evolution of the field in the next five to ten years."

That is my crucial point on what is happening to nuclear physics research in general and the nuclear structure physics of the Science and Engineering Research Council.

It would be a tragedy if long-term benefits to British science were sacrificed for short-term financial considerations. Undoubtedly, the announced cuts and the further restrictions that they are likely to place on the work, are not the result of a proper objective review of the science and whether it is an area that Britain should be in. I recognise that hard choices have to be made. We cannot give scientists their head simply to carry on working on whatever they want throughout their careers. I respect that. As a former working scientist in my research establishment, I am aware that there were areas in which it was necessary to be fairly ruthless and tell scientists that they had to stop their work because it could not be justified.

I do not dispute that hard decisions have to be taken, but they should be taken on the basis of a proper, objective view of the value of the science and the contribution that it can make.

A supplementary budget for SERC for 1991-92 must be announced before the recess. That is the only way in which we can avoid short-term financial considerations doing long-term damage to British science.

7.57 am

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): rose——

Mr. Speaker: Well——

Dr. Bray: In one sentence.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, in one sentence.

Dr. Bray: We are about to embark on next year's public expenditure increase round and we must find increases for science budgets in the next financial year, whatever happens in this year.

7.58 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Michael Fallon): The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) has done the House a service in raising the importance of science for the second time in six weeks. I begin by informing the House that the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science, my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth), who has direct ministerial responsibility for science cannot be here. He is engaged on scientific work. He is chairing a session of the Engelberg forum on bio-ethics in Switzerland.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East referred to the publication of advice from the Advisory Board for the Research Councils. There has never been any obligation on the Secretary of State to publish that advice. It is confidential advice, and therefore, it is for the Secretary of State to decide whether to publish it.

The core of the debate is the budget of the Science and Engineering Research Council. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East made a good case for big science. Of course, the big international sciences such as astronomy are important, even though they are expensive.

It is equally important that the council's budget be properly balanced to ensure that the key smaller grants around the universities and the smaller scientific institutions are also given sufficient headroom. That is the purpose of the council's current review.

The hon. Gentleman referred specifically to his concern and that of his constituents about the future of the royal observatory in Edinburgh. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State visited the observatory recently and he has seen for himself the high quality of the work there. I can confirm to the hon. Gentleman—and I have the council's agreement to give him this assurance—that the royal observatories in Edinburgh and in Cambridge will continue as separate establishments. There are, therefore, no plans to close either of them.

The review in hand has two purposes. It is intended to ensure that some of the more over-optimistic elements of the council's programme are properly balanced against the need to protect the smaller grants as well as the larger programmes. There should be no doubting the Government's commitment to science. The real-terms increase in the funding for science of 23 per cent. over the past 10 years is a good example of the importance that the Government attach to this area.

It being Eight o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That—

(1) the provisions of the Order [8th November] relating to Business of the House shall be further modified, as follows:

(a) in paragraph (1) shall be inserted the words 'and in paragraph (7) the word 'nine' shall be substituted for the word 'ten' in line 64';

(b) for paragraph (3) there shall be substituted: '(3) Private Members' Bills shall have precedence over Government business on 22nd March, 19th and 26th April, 3rd and 10th May and 5th July; and

(c) for paragraph (4) there shall be substituted: '(4) Private Members' Notices of Motions shall have precedence over Government business on 15th March, 17th May, and 14th, 21st and 28th June, and ballots for these Notices shall be held after Questions on 1st and 15th May, and 5th and 12th June'; and

(2) Orders of the day which have been set down for 12th, 19th and 26th April and 3rd May shall be read and discharged; and the said Orders shall be set down for 19th and 26th April and 3rd and 10th May, respectively.—[Mr. John M. Taylor.]

Sadler's Wells Theatre

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. John M. Taylor.]

8 am

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I should begin by declaring an interest, although it is entirely non-pecuniary, as a director of Sadler's Wells theatre, which lies in my constituency. It is the future funding, survival and continued excellence of the work of that theatre that I wish to raise this morning.

As the Minister will know, Sadler's Wells was founded 300 years ago, and relaunched 60 years ago by Lilian Baylis. In the past nine years, it has presented 124 seasons by British companies and 69 seasons by foreign companies, covering 18 different nations to a total of more than 2 million people. Many of its productions have been financed and presented entirely by Sadler's Wells. Many have won awards. But for Sadler's Wells, we might never have seen, for example, the grace of the Central ballet of China, the excitement of Cumbre Flamenca, the rhythms of the Kodo drummers, the flair of Michael Clark or the innovations of the Paul Taylor dance company.

In 1988, the Lilian Baylis theatre was opened alongside the Sadler's Wells theatre to complement the work of the main theatre and to provide a valuable new venue for small-scale professional and community work.

Since 1981, a community and education project has been in place at Sadler's Wells involving and serving hundreds of local people. I invite the Minister to come with me almost any day to Sadler's Wells to see the pensioners' groups, the tenants' and residents' organisations and the groups of schoolchildren who are enabled by the community programme to see how a theatre works, to learn about dance and drama, to meet performers and often to find out at first hand about the productions taking place on the main stage.

As an exciting possibility for the medium-term future, the theatre, together with Thames Water and the London borough of Islington, has been exploring the idea of achieving an entirely new theatre immediately beside the present site. That could present a wonderful new asset for the performing arts in London. In short, Sadler's Wells has an international reputation and represents one of our capital city's finest artistic assets.

Lilian Baylis refounded Sadler's Wells as a theatre for all the people—accessible to all—and I am proud to say that that remains the theatre's policy to this day. Lest it be thought that I am perhaps a little biased in my appreciation of the work that Sadler's Wells does, I will quote the assessment made by the officers of the London boroughs grants scheme of the theatre's work and standing. Its report to the London boroughs grants committee says:

"Sadler's Wells theatre remains a key venue and one certainly worthy of support. The Lilian Baylis theatre and associated community and education projects underscore the company's unique position and conscious regard for a less exclusive and broader based definition of the arts. The indications are good."

Yet for all that, Sadler's Wells receives only 6 per cent. of its entire annual income from public funds of any kind. By comparison, the Royal Opera house receives 42 per cent., the English National opera, which came into being largely as a result of work undertaken at Sadler's Wells, 56 per cent. and the National theatre, 56 per cent. I do not want to denigrate in any way the work of those three great institutions, but the comparison serves to show how amazingly Sadler's Wells performs on a shoestring of public funding.

The theatre has made strenuous efforts to attract commercial corporate sponsorship. It has received in particular strong support for a five-year period from Digital and it receives 20 per cent of its income from sponsorship sources. But especially in a recession, the scope for increased income of that kind is inevitably limited.

The theatre is thriving artistically. It has had one of its best ever seasons, attracting audiences to a series of excellent productions. But through no fault of its own it finds itself currently facing serious financial difficulties. Just four weeks ago, we had to make painful budget-saving decisions at our theatre board meeting.

There are a number of particular prolems. Sadler's Wells royal ballet has moved to Birmingham, taking substantial rental income with it. The sad ending of the new Sadler's Wells opera caused a one-off financial loss in resolving the immediate problems of cessation. The American financier who had committed himself to the creation of the Lilian Baylis theatre pulled out with massive bills unpaid. As a result, the theatre has a historic debt which it will take several years of frantically hard work to pay off. Therefore, the public subsidy provision for the theatre becomes crucial in determining whether its community and education work can survive, whether its commitment to excellence and innovation can continue, and whether its very survival can be guaranteed.

The position over public subsidy is difficult and uncertain to say the least. First, the Minister will be aware of the division within the London boroughs grants committee and its current failure to agree a budget. He will also be aware of its standstill nature, at very best, even if a budget is agreed. He will be aware of the fact that the arts are listed as the lowest priority within the various categories in that draft budget. Although Sadler's Wells passes the committee's assessment with flying colours, the sheer uncertainty that is affecting the theatre, as with hundreds of other London arts organisations, is inevitably harmful.

Secondly, the transformation of Greater London Arts into the London arts board has created further uncertainty. It is good news that a chairman for that board has now been appointed. But there is still no chief executive and no clear mandate for future policy. It will take time to develop that, but in the meantime there is the danger that new initiatives will suffer. After several years of preparatory work, Sadler's Wells submitted an application for revenue funding to Greater London Arts, just two days before the abolition of Greater London Arts was announced. It was prohibited from entertaining any new applications, and the Sadler's Wells application, sadly, fell foul of that rule.

Thirdly, the theatre's funding from the London borough of Islington is small, as is only appropriate in view of the constrained funds of a relatively small local authority and the regional, if not national, nature of the theatre. Despite poll tax capping, Islington has held its grant for Sadler's Wells more or less steady and I strongly hope that that will continue.

Fourthly, and most important, the major source of public subsidy should be the Arts Council. In 1986, when the GLC was abolished and a funding crisis resulted, an arrangement was reached for Sadler's Wells to receive, albeit indirectly, £100,000 in funding from the Arts Council in the first year. The money was channelled through some of the touring companies appearing at Sadler's Wells, as the Arts Council claimed that Sadler's Wells was a so-called receiving theatre and as such was ineligible for direct support under Arts Council rules. I shall return to this point, which is crucial to any decision on the future funding of the theatre.

None the less, in 1986 that £100,000 was an enormously welcome and essential lifeline. In 1987, funding fell to £90,000 and in 1988 it fell further to £60,000. This year, it has been £53,700. In a recent decision, the touring board of the Arts Council reduced the forthcoming year's funding to £30,000. In other words, within five years, during which the theatre has experienced acute financial difficulty, the Arts Council's grant has been cut by more than two thirds. That is disastrous for the theatre. I urge the Minister as passionately as I can to ensure that the decline in funding is reversed.

Sadler's Wells does not fit into any neat Arts Council category; it is not a normal receiving theatre. It is a unique entity as it carries out a proactive, entrepreneurial and international role in opera, dance and ballet. It frequently selects, finances and presents its productions at its own risk, on its own initiative and with its own style and success. It links its productions with the education and community work that it has built up, and it provides a base from which companies can launch tours throughout the country.

To do that, Sadler's Wells requires public assistance with its programming and infrastructure. It requires substantially more than the £30,000 that has been allocated by the Arts Council. Surely an uprating of the 1986 figure of £100,000 to allow for inflation should be considered. There may not be a ready made pigeon hole for Sadler's Wells in the Arts Council's structure, but it must look only to the Arts Council for the bulk of its public support. I hope, therefore, that the Minister will do what he can to secure better Arts Council support for a theatre that I am sure he, like me, holds in high esteem.

To see the joy on a child's face, transfixed by the performance on stage, to share the delight of a local pensioner in learning the mysteries of theatrical technique, to savour the grace and dignity of dance at its exuberant best—those are what Sadler's Wells is all about and those are what I ask the Minister to help to secure for the future.

8.15 am

The Minister for the Arts (Mr. Tim Renton): The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) has a longstanding and informed interest in the arts. This morning, at 8 o'clock, even after an all-night sitting he has argued his case for the Sadler's Wells theatre with passion, skill and courtesy and, in his final words, with very considerable eloquence.

Just before Christmas I visited Sadler's Wells to see the ballet Cinderella, presented by the London City ballet. As the hon. Gentleman has just described, there were many children in the audience—as there should have been at a performance of Cinderella just before Christmas. The joy to which he has just referred was very evident in their eyes, as was their pleasure in seeing the ballet extremely well danced. Joy was to be seen not only in the eyes of the children; it was in the eyes of the grown-ups, too, including those of my wife and myself. I well understand, therefore, his affection for and pride in this famous theatre—an affection and pride which are felt locally.

I first visited Sadler's Wells when I was 17. The hon. Gentleman reminded us that it has been a place of entertainment for over 300 years. More high jinks than high art went on there during the early part of the theatre's life. It has had its times of success and failure, which is typical of theatres throughout the country and the whole world.

Sadler's Wells's golden period began in 1931 when, against all the odds, Lilian Baylis arranged for the building of the present theatre—"a lyric house" as she saw it, to complement her temple of dramatic arts at the Old Vic. What a delightful phrase that is—"a lyric house." With Dame Ninette de Valois—another quite remarkable woman who is, happily, very much still with us—Baylis proceeded to lay the foundations of what today are our two royal ballet companies and the English National opera. That wonderful and unique achievement is inevitably and indelibly linked with the Wells.

It was very kind of the hon. Gentleman to invite me to attend performances with him at Sadler's Wells. As I have just mentioned, I was there to see Cinderella just before Christmas. I was also there in January when I had the great pleasure of attending the theatre's diamond jubilee celebrations—a memorable occasion indeed which underlined the formative role of Sadler's Wells in the blossoming of ballet and opera in this country, a blossoming which, surprisingly, has happened only recently.

As the hon. Gentleman reminded us, the theatre remains a vibrant force in the cultural life of the capital, presenting the work of a wide range of dance, opera and other companies from home and, with some distinction, from abroad, too. I know that, as the hon. Gentleman told us, the theatre pursues the commendable policy of attracting new audiences and that, in the Baylis tradition, does all that it can to ensure that seat prices are affordable.

I understand, too, that recently the theatre has had a particularly successful year in terms of the quality of its productions, high attendance levels and the balancing of its budget—no mean achievements. In all of that, I am at one with the hon. Gentleman. However, as I think he suspects, that is the easy part of my speech. Now I have to turn to the more difficult area. First, however, may I pick up his point about the possible new development.

I, too, recently met Stephen Remington, the director of Sadler's Wells, primarily in order to learn more about the proposed collaboration with Thames Water to build a new theatre for Sadler's Wells as part of a major redevelopment of the new Riverhead site. That is a serious proposition, and I wish the venture well. It will be a significant and welcome addition to arts facilities in the capital if it succeeds.

Not surprisingly, Mr. Remington took the opportunity to inform me of the theatre's revenue funding position. I listened with great interest, but I had to explain that this was very much a matter for the relevant funding agencies —the Arts Council, Greater London Arts, the London boroughs grants committee and the hon. Gentleman's local authority, Islington borough council. The system that we employ in this country for Government funding of the arts relies in many ways on what in recent weeks I have had to refer to with almost numbing frequency as the application of the arm's-length principle. As the hon. Gentleman well knows, it is not my job to make judgments on artistic policies and priorities. I might often like to do so, but by tradition—a good one—such judgments are a matter for the Arts Council and its advisers, and for the regional arts bodies. I do not fund individual arts organisations directly. I allocate grant-in-aid to the Arts Council and it is for it to decide—in the light of its funding policies and after expert assessments from its panels—the allocation of funds within and between the various art forms. The Arts Council is also responsible for the allocation of funds to the regional arts associations shortly to become the new regional arts boards, which, in turn, decide on the pattern and levels of funding to their clients.

Funding of the arts, as the hon. Gentleman, with all his experience, knows, is always a very sensitive issue. Getting the allocations right between all the bodies with a good claim on public funding is not and never has been easy. This is a task best left to the sort of disinterested but expert advisers on which the Arts Council can call. I suspect that, despite his heartfelt appeals to me today, the hon. Gentleman would agree with me on that basic principle.

It has been an underlying principle of Arts Council policy over the years that it should not fund what are referred to as receiving theatres. The hon. Gentleman used the expression himself. A receiving theatre does not have its own producing companies. It just attracts companies to its house. This decision is based on a judgment of the most effective use of the inevitably finite resources available to the Arts Council.

A proper division of responsibilities is for the Arts Council to support producing companies and for local funding bodies to support the receiving theatres in their areas. That policy has been applied with great success, enabling the growth of a marvellous range of drama, dance and opera companies that tour very extensively. The Birmingham Royal Ballet, London Contemporary Dance, Phoenix Dance, Glyndebourne Touring Opera and Opera 80 are just some of the Arts Council clients that give performances at Sadler's Wells. At the same time, there is a network of receiving theatres, from Bradford to Swindon, from Hull to Plymouth, that are maintained essentially with local support.

Sadler's Wells is regarded by the Arts Council as a receiving theatre and, on that basis, it has specifically declined to accept that it has a funding responsibility to the theatre. I know that Sadler's Wells fiercely argues that it is not simply a receiving house but that it acts in an entrepreneurial capacity in promoting the shows that are presented there. The council has considered that view with great care, but suggests that many receiving theatres act as promoters in the sense that they choose and promote the companies that perform in their theatres; and that by definition Sadler's Wells is not predominantly a producer, or even a commissioner of work.

Mr. Chris Smith: This point gets to the heart of the argument about the Arts Council's approach to Sadler's Wells. Will the Minister answer two questions? First, has the Arts Council, in reaching that decision about Sadler's Wells, taken into account its role in attracting international companies into Britain, and introducing them, for the first time, to British audiences? Secondly, if that is the argument of the Arts Council, why does it provide funding directly to the South Bank Centre?

Mr Renton: The South Bank Centre is different, because it provides a complex of facilities, such as concert halls, and so receives a large grant. As to the hon. Gentleman's first point, the Arts Council has taken into account the fact that Sadler's Wells receives international touring companies. In one or two instances, applications are to be decided on a project basis, which will deal with international touring companies coming to Sadler's Wells in the year immediately ahead.

As a result of the GLC transitional funding arrangement, it was agreed that the theatre would receive financial help, but on a reducing scale for a three-year period, during which time it would negotiate with the local authorities for a replacement of their metropolitan grant. It was on that basis that Sadler's Wells received £100,000 from the Arts Council in 1986-87, reducing to £53,000 in 1988-89.

The hon. Gentleman referred, as I expected him to, to Greater London Arts. That body did not assume any responsibility for funding Sadler's Wells after the abolition of the Greater London council and does not therefore provide core or revenue funding. It does support from time to time specific projects that meet its funding guidelines. Sadler's Wells has applied for project funding and has been invited to apply further when funding guidelines for 1991-92 are published in a few weeks' time.

The new London arts board, to which the hon. Gentleman also referred, will be fully operational on 1 October 1991. Its establishment will provide a new framework for arts funding in London and Sadler's Wells will naturally be at liberty to pursue its case vigorously with the new board. I am glad that the London arts board has a chairman, Clive Priestley, whom I appointed the other day. He is experienced in arts matters in the capital and I think that he will bring a great quality of leadership to the arts board.

I accept that a good deal of uncertainty has been generated as a result of the delay in the London boroughs grant scheme being settled for the fast-approaching new financial year. I have been in touch with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment on this matter. My right hon. Friend prescribed a maximum level of expenditure, at the figure of £30·1 million, which was recommended by the London boroughs grants committee. I share the hon. Gentleman's disappointment that the committee, at its meeting earlier this week, did not agree a budget. However, I was pleased to learn that at that meeting, all-party agreement, in principle, was reached on the grant for Sadler's Wells, and for a number of other arts clients, for 1991-92. I understand that the Sadler's Wells grant is to be maintained at its current year level—£73,000. I am sure that this outcome will be welcome.

I understand that Islington borough council, which this year is funding Sadler's Wells to the extent of £24,000, proposes to maintain its funding in the year just starting, although with a reduction of 4 per cent.

I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman will be disappointed by what I have said. I should have liked to give him more encouragement. However, as I said, I do not become involved in decisions relating to the funding of individual arts organisations. I have great sympathy with any company that seeks to safeguard its financial future and expand its artistic horizons. As the hon. Gentleman will know from his long experience, resources for the arts will always be finite. Fine words butter no parsnips. I suspect that, under a Labour Government, those resources would be even more finite, and therefore more limited, than under a Conservative Government who have increased the grant to the Arts Council by 12·5 per cent in the current year and 11 per cent. in the coming year.

More generally, much of the recent uncertainty about arrangements for the funding of the arts in London has now been removed, with the firm starting date set for the new London arts board. This will create a climate of renewed confidence and an opportunity for comprehensive reappraisal of existing policies. Against that background, Sadler's Wells will wish to consider how best to take this matter forward. I am confident that, given the dedication and talent at its disposal, Sadler's Wells and its board will meet and overcome the challenges of the future with their usual resourcefulness. I wish the hon. Gentleman and the other members of the board every continued success.

Question put and agreed to.

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

The Gulf (Ecology)

9.35 am

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I beg to move,

That this House calls on Her Majesty's Government to display the same effort as they injected into military combat in fighting oil slicks in the Gulf, burning oil fires, and as soon as possible cholera, hepatitis, typhoid and other diseases arising from open sewers and related destruction in Kuwait, Baghdad and other cities; and calls on Her Majesty's Government to send a task force of environmental experts to the Middle East.

Were proof needed of the proposition that "Modern war creates more problems than is solves", the events in the Gulf from 15 January to 15 March 1991 would provide ample evidence. We have opened a Pandora's box without any clear idea of solutions. Yet, however we sleep-walked into war and however that war was conducted, particularly after it was clear that the Iraqi forces in Kuwait had become a rabble of looters on their way north, the necessary parliamentary inquest is more appropriate to a two or three-day mid-week debate than to a private Member's motion on a Friday. [Interruption.] Last night in the debate on the Easter Adjournment, I spoke about the Basra bombing. I do not propose to regurgitate what was said then, but I hope that there will at some time be answers to the serious questions that were raised.

It is profoundly unsatisfactory, to the point of being a cause for shame on us, that the opportunity for the first debate since 21 January—excluding the truncated debate initiated by the Scottish National party in late February—as opposed to ministerial statement, should have had to be as a result of my extraordinary luck in the ballot.

The reality of the human and ecological catastrophe in, let us call it, Mesopotamia is apparent for all who have eyes to watch television. Let me therefore deal with the motion, which concentrates on three problems, in perhaps ascending order of important. The first problem is that of the oil slicks. What is their latest known position? What is their status? What is the forecast about their possible dissipation, given the Nowruz experience during the Iran-Iraq war? What assessment has the Natural Environment Research Council, acting for the Department of the Environment, now made of the biological effects of oil spillage in the Gulf, particularly of the likely effects of oil on the coral ecosystem?

If I ask in particular, as I did on 7 February, about the coral islands of Qarah, Umm Al Maradim and Kubbar, it is because Dr. Nigel Downing—about whose work I contacted the Department of the Environment in late January and whose phone number I gave to the Prime Minister's office nine days ago—told me, speaking from his eight years' experience working for the Kuwait science institute, that they are crucial for the protection of fish larvae and the replenishment of fish throughout the northern Gulf. The islands support the lesser-crested tern, ospreys and many other birds.

I am sure that all hon. Members present understand that we are about to embark on the major fish breeding season, that fish are starting to spawn and that the perturbations caused by oil slicks could break the food chain, perhaps causing famine in fish-dependent communities in the Gulf states and Iran. There is a major concern: what is being done to protect the mud-flats, which affect so much of the primary productivity of the Gulf and the plankton? If the desalination plants constitute an understandable priority, will protective booms for the mud-flats be considered? We must also consider the mangroves and the salt marshes. I understand that in some salt marshes the oil is 2 m thick.

It was extremely courteous of the Minister to send me the Conservative central office brief. The key points on the first page include the following information:

"The Government has ordered 3 oil recovery skimmers worth £300,000 which will be sent to Bahrain.

90 tonnes of anti-pollution equipment—mostly booms—from industry stocks held in Britain were flown out to the Gulf on the 28th, 29th and 30th January."

Is there any shortage of equipment? Mr. David Olsen, the technical adviser on pollution to the Saudi Government, suggests that there is. I refer to my question on 19 February, when I asked:

"Why should Mr. David Olsen, the consultant adviser on the environment to the Saudi Government, complain about a shortage of equipment?"

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces said:

"I cannot answer for Mr. David Olsen. However, we have done our bit by sending about 90 tonnes of equipment which has been held here by the Department of Transport to help clean up the problems in the area."—[Official Report, 19 February 1991; Vol. 186, c. 134.]

That is nothing like the scale of the operation that is clearly needed. Can the Minister persuade the House that the mechanism for getting scientists and experts out to the Gulf to examine the database has been co-ordinated by the United States, Germany, Italy, France, Japan and others who have a contribution to make? What financial support has been given to the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and to the International Council for Bird Preservation? I understand that the Saudis have asked for the team to monitor the spring migration and the numbers of breeding sea birds.

I refer again to the brief from Conservative central office from Rachel Whetstone. It says:

"The Government has supported the RSPCA team which is in the Gulf training volunteers to clean oil drenched birds."

The brief continues:

"Despite international efforts, some 10,000 to 20,000 off shore birds, particularly socotra cormorants and grebes, are thought to have died as a result of oil drenching. In the last week, a number of early migratory birds, for example mallards, have been found covered in oil. These numbers will undoubtedly rise as the migrating season advances. In addition, the livelihood of local communities dependent on the sea has come under threat."

Rachel Whetstone's figures are grossly underestimated.

I should like to refer to the problems of the humped-back dolphin and dugongs, the sea-cow of the Gulf, green turtles and hawksbill turtles, socotra cormorants and a host of other species which are once again the victims of the inconceivable barbarity of the human brain.

I put on record a letter from the Bahraini ambassador, who writes:

[Mr. Tam Dalyell]

"I believe that the serious ecological disasters of the Gulf war need an expert international effort and action to combat the devastating immediate and long term ecological consequences not only in the Gulf region but worldwide. The unprecedented magnitude of the oil slick and burning oil wells will, no doubt, have dangerous consequences on the global environment. Therefore, I whole heartedly support your timely initiative to raise this question with a view to calling on Her Majesty's Government to send a task force of environmental experts to be despatched to the Gulf region to help extinguish the hundreds of fires at oil wells and preserve the human environment in general, and the marine environment in particular."

That was the view of the Bahraini Government.

What recommendations on wildlife have Ministers received from Roy Dennis of the RSPB and from Burr Heneman, the director of the United States section of the International Council for Bird Preservation? There are a number of comparatively small decisions and actions that could save species. For example, the rare bridled tern which breeds at the height of summer needs vegetation or shade to keep cool. I am told that a little provision could be made to create substitutes for destroyed vegetation in the traditional breeding ground.

My experience is that there are officers and other ranks in the services who know and care a great deal about wildlife. At least those who are known to have an interest might be approached to implement the type of recommendation that Roy Dennis and Burr Heneman will almost certainly make. As with every other question, I have given notice of the issue to relevant Ministers.

I refer to a matter that I raised as an example yesterday on the Scottish Natural Heritage Bill. It concerns the red-necked phalarope which nests in Shetland—there are about 30 pairs—and winters in the Indian ocean. It comes to us to breed, but in a few weeks it will be passing through the Gulf. Perhaps none of them will get through if they land in the oil slicks. That is a concrete example that concerns those of us who wish to find an answer.

In their report Roy Dennis and Burr Heneman say that to understand how migrant waders use the coast, detailed counts will be carried out in April and May. Data will be collected on species, numbers and percentages oiled at a selection of sites representing oiled and unoiled areas. Four teams of two ornothologists will undertake field work in four main areas. The daily monitoring will include the mapping of bird distribution through tidal cycles in April and May as well as collecting data on species, numbers and ages and state of migration. If possible, an attempt will be made to catch and ring waders as well as to collect biometric data. The main questions to be dealt with are how many waders use the coast on their spring migration, do different flocks of waders choose particular bays to feed in before making their long flights or do they trickle up the coast, and what percentage of birds get oiled? I have put the Department in touch with Michael Rands, and I hope that some reference will be made to these problems.

Before moving to the next part of the motion which is in ascending order of importance, I must say that I do not wish to give the impression that birds are the most important issue with which we must deal, but that is the way the motion is structured.

Before moving on to the next part of the motion on oil fires, I have one further question and it contains an element of recrimination. Why was little or no thought given to deliberate oil spills by Iraq as an instrument of war? In a 55-minute speech—I shall be briefer today as many colleagues wish to speak—in column 403 of the Official Report of 19 December 1990, I warned of oil spills. It took no great prescience to do so on my part as Saddam Hussein was making precisely those threats. May I ask why, before the war was started—it is not simply a matter of hindsight—booms and other equipment were not in position or at least available?

I refer the House to an answer given by the Secretary of State for the Environment on 7 February 1991 to my question about the islands in column 221 of the Official Report. I challenge whether the scale of the problem was sufficiently understood. In an answer on 11 March 1991, the Secretary of State for the Environment said:

"In my Department, which has had the lead in environmental aspects of the Gulf conflict, around 20 civil servants have been involved to some degree in responding to these issues, including requests for assistance from the Gulf states. For about 5 staff, this has been a major part of their work. In other Departments closely involved the position is similar."—[Official Report, 11 March 1991; Vol. 187, c. 369.]

Does that represent the scale needed to tackle the greatest ecological disaster of our time? Criticism about the oil spillages is as nothing to the anger that some of us feel about the oil wells. We have continued to nag at every parliamentary opportunity—and every other opportunity—on

"flames such as Mother Earth has never witnessed."

We nagged during Prime Minister's questions on 13 November and on 11 December. At the scientists conference we were dismissed and told that we were exaggerating and being alarmist and we were rubbished.

I am especially distressed at the Secretary of State for Energy's response to figures given by the King of Jordan and, subsequently, to the warnings of photo-chemical smog given most prominently by Paul Crutzen of the Max Planck institute. I wish to put on record part of a letter of 23 January from the Secretary of State for Energy. It states:

"Since your letters of 24 December and 6 January, my private office have sent you a copy of the Meteorological Office's report on the possible environmental impacts if Saddam Hussein should set fire to the Kuwaiti oil wells. The report suggests that, in the worst case scenario, there would indeed be environmental harm but that the only possible longterm effect is the impact of carbon dioxide emissions on global warming which would be almost negligible."

It is the word "negligible" that some of us question. The Energy Secretary went on:

"There is no indication of global environmental catastrophe. The Met Office, as you know, have an excellent reputation in this field and their report should now ensure that these issues are seen in a proper perpective."

Who on earth wrote the final draft of the Meteorological Office report? I have given notice of that question, so I hope for an answer. Was it really Dr. Keith Browning FRS, with whom I spoke on the telephone at Christmas, but who was understandably inhibited in what he said to me? It would be one thing to say, "We don't know", but another to play down the worst possible scenario and to write a report that allowed the Secretary of State for Energy to dismiss our fears as "negligible".

If, by chance, the document produced by the Met Office on the possible environmental impacts of burning oil wells, and which I am about to go through, was not Dr. Browning's original report, but doctored by Whitehall, the Commons should be told. The first paragraph of the Met Office document states:

"The Meteorological Office has been asked by the Government to assess the environmental consequences of burning Kuwaiti oil wells. The estimates given below are based on preliminary calculations and on limited information."

That is strange wording for a fellow of the Royal Society. The paragraph continues:

"There are uncertainties due to lack of knowledge in many areas, ranging from the characteristics of the smoke emitted, to the chemical reactions which would take place and the nature of the weather conditions."

If there were uncertainties, how did Dr. Browning reach the conclusions that he did? Paragraph 2 of the report states:

"For the purposes of estimating environmental impacts, the Meteorological Office was advised to take the following worst case scenario: the quantity of oil burnt would be equivalent to one year of Kuwait's pre-invasion production of 80 million tonnes (Mt) per year spread out over one year. This would give rise to approximately 2 Mt of sulphur in the form of sulphur oxides, 0·5 Mt of nitrogen in the form of nitrogen oxides and 60 Mt of carbon as carbon dioxide gas. A further assumption is that 6% of the oil would be converted to black smoke, yielding 5 Mt. Other assumptions could lead to different emissions and the amounts, in particular, of smoke could be significantly less. There are several possible effects, as considered in the following paragraphs."

Paragraph 3 states:

"The only possible long term effect is the impact of carbon dioxide emissions on global warming. This will be almost negligible."

Did Dr. Browning really write about,

"the only possible long term effect"?

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): Can the hon. Gentleman tell us the difference between the emissions and consequences of the flaring of oil and gas in an uncontrolled way and some of the uncontrolled emissions that occur when oil and gas are used commercially? Surely that results in the same combustion. I ask my question in the spirit of genuine inquiry.

Mr. Dalyell: I shall have a go at answering that on another occasion. My blunt answer must be that my speech is long enough and others want to participate——

Mr. Bottomley: It was a genuine question.

Mr. Dalyell: I am sure it was. It is an important question, but I would rather not be diverted.

Paragraph 4 of the Met Office document states:

"Acid deposition from sulphur and nitrogen compounds could be significant close to Kuwait, but would probably not have serious widespread long-term consequences."

Did Dr. Browning write that? The paragraph continues:

"Close to and downwind of Kuwait, the concentrations of ground-level ozone could be comparable with those typical of photochemical smogs in major cities."

If Dr. Browning was talking about photochemical smogs, how do we draw the general conclusion that scientists warnings can be dismissed? Paragraphs 5 and 6 of the Met Office report state:

"Close to Kuwait, the plume could cause a considerable reduction in daylight and daytime temperatures.

Emissions of black smoke could produce effects in areas remote from Kuwait, if the smoke were sufficiently dense and reached the upper atmosphere."

Did Dr. Browning really use the words "if" and "could"? The paragraph continues:

"Whether or not the smoke reached the upper atmosphere would depend critically on the absorption of sunlight by the smoke, which depends on its physical characteristics, and hence on details of the combustion. Other relevant factors are the efficiency with which rain and other processes remove the smoke from the atmosphere."

The effect of the smoke on global temperatures is likely"—I stress "likely"— "to be small. Downwind of Kuwait, the obscuration of sunlight might significantly reduce the surface temperature locally".

Was the word "might" really Dr. Browning's? The paragraph continues:

"This in turn could locally reduce the rainfall over parts of SE Asia during the period of the summer monsoon. The uncertainty of these estimates, and the great natural variability seasonally and locally in the monsoon, are emphasised."

As far as I am concerned, the document has the fingerprints of Whitehall all over it. It has played down the consequences. For 24 years I have been a weekly columnist for the New Scientist and I am used to reading heavyweight articles from scientists. The document does not appear to be the kind of paper to be produced by a scientist. If I am wrong, I shall be told.

Paragraph 8 of the document states:

"If the smoke reaches the ozone layer, the smoke particles and nitrogen oxides could lead to small reductions in ozone concentrations within the northern hemisphere. However, any effects at a given location on the ground would be short lived."

Was that really the considered conclusion of the scientists? I have dwelt on that document at some length because the tragedy is that if the truth, as it was known to many scientists, had been acknowledged, Saddam Hussein—given his knowledge of what might happen to southern Iraq—might not have ordered the ignition of the oil wells. When we were playing down the ecological catastrophe, doubtless, the Iraqis were listening. If we had told the truth about that ecological catastrophe, other events might have been different.

Dr. John Cox, who was the most prominent in his warnings, is the scientific equivalent of the Birmingham Six. John Cox, Tim Eiloart, Penny Kemp and others who campaigned at the conference in time to avoid the ecological disaster are owed a bit of an apology. I hope that the Minister is rather more gracious than the Home Secretary was to my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin).

I must also pay tribute to Mr. Ormerod, Mr. Ron Huzzard and others of Labour Action for Peace. In its most recent pamphlet it stated:

"Scientists at the conference organised by the Medical Campaign Against Nuclear Weapons"—

it has an honourable record in this matter—

"on 14 November estimated that one million civilians could be injured and over 100,000 killed in a Gulf war. A Washington think tank gives a military casualty list of 210,000, with 40,000 dead. Dr. Hugh Middleton, a psychologist said: 'We believe it would be an irrational response, akin to mass mental illness, to go to war in the Gulf, in the face of all these potential casualties'."

It makes no difference that the casualties were mostly on one side because there has been nothing like it in terms of casualty ratios since the Conquistadors. I fear that the numbers, as predicted, have turned out to be true.

One must be fair and I want to draw attention to what the Green party has said about the environmental consequences of the Gulf war. That may or may not meet with the approval of my Chief Whip, who is courteously present. However, in the past few months a number of us have shared platforms with members of the Green party. I quote from a letter by Roger Giles of Exeter:

"As you know the Green Party co-organised the symposium on the environmental consequences of the Gulf war which was held in London on 2 January.

[Mr. Dalyell]

As a result John Wakeham, Energy Secretary, immediately sought to play down the conclusions reached by many eminent people present at the symposium, using the device of writing to John Hannam (Exeter MP and Energy Committee Secretary), and releasing the letter to the media, the purpose being to head off any public opposition to a war which such consequences might prejudice.

I have seen the various papers emanating from the Department of Energy, including the letter from John Wakeham to you dated 7 January in which he refers to 'your anonymous caller'. Presumably this refers to the DoE official who disputed the scientific basis for Mr. Wakeham's attempted put-down.

I should say that I recognise it is not usual to correspond with an MP from another constituency, but I must say that I am unhappy with how Mr. Hannam has dealt with this matter.

Exeter Green Party's Suzanne Dunstan took part in the original symposium on 2nd January (and subsequent gatherings) and was also a member of the Green Party trip to Baghdad in January. The matter is clearly, therefore, one that concerns us greatly.

I am aware of your considerable efforts in this area, and have followed reports of your endeavours in Hansard. I note that you have managed to secure a debate in the House of Commons on Friday 15th March.

Exeter Green Party feels particularly aggrieved about this matter. We warned before the war commenced that environmental catastrophe was probable. The Government disinformation machine sprang into action to counter this. Sadly the predictions have become reality. As I have said I have taken this matter up with John Hannam. The best service he has been able to offer is that of a post office from the Department of Energy. I have enclosed a copy of the correspondence for your information. Remarks such as '. . . any action taken by Saddam Hussein to blow up oil wells in Kuwait will not pose the environmental disaster which your party are forecasting' are a pretty damning indictment. It occurs to me that we have an environmental disaster on a vast scale. Apart from seeing the world's largest ever oil spill, and all the horrific consequences of burning oil wells, we have a Gulf equivalent of Chernobyl and also the unknown effects of bombing chemical plants.

It does concern us greatly that a Government Minister can see it as his duty to distort the facts as Mr. Wakeham has done. I hope that you will manage to expose the untruths that have been promoted during the last few months. Hopefully the truth will out, even if it is only reluctantly, belatedly and as the result of persistence on the part of yourself and other determined individuals.

The priority now, as we see it, is for the co-operation on the part of the allies to conduct a destructive war, to be channelled into making good the environmental catastrophe which has taken place. I made this crucially important argument to Mr. Hannam recently. He was so moved by my arguments and the need for urgent action—that he sent me a standard acknowledgement thanking me for my thoughts!"

I have seen that letter from the secretary of the Conservative party energy committee, in which he says: "the advice is that any action taken by Saddam Hussein to blow up oil wells in Kuwait will not pose the environmental disaster which your Party are forecasting."

The environmental harm is clearly colossal. Vipin Gupta of Imperial college, London, who is the analyst of the images, said that by 21 February black smoke covered 11,000 sq km. Since then, there are pictures of darkness at noon in Kuwait, with 3 million to 6 million barrels a day going up in flames. After 30 days, the area covered by soot cloud could be 4 million sq km. The earth's surface temperature is already 10 deg lower than normal. Kuwait's oil is rich in sulphur and 3 million barrels a day, burning for a year, will pour out about 4 million tonnes of sulphur dioxide into the atmosphere. Together with nitrogen oxides in the smoke, that will produce millions of tonnes of acid rain.

Frank Barnaby says that the smoke cloud seems to be affecting the region's climate, dramatically increasing the amount of rainfall. However, the rain is not the healthy, life-giving rain of Britain but sinister, black and oily—of a kind last seen after the atomic bombing of Hiroshima.

The Minister cannot dispute those facts because the Conservative party brief says:

"Satellites have also detected smoke 750 miles downwind of the war zone in Iran and 'black rain' has been reported as far as away as southern Turkey."

Rachel Whetstone's report also says:

"The fires have resulted in dark, 'twilight' skies at mid-day within a 50 kilometre radius of the burning wells. Temperatures have fallen below the average for this time of year. In the heavily affected areas photochemical smog is developing, which may cause sore eyes and throats and create breathing difficulties for the elderly and newly born."

On 28 February, James Meek, of The Scotsman, wrote:

"The southern Kuwaiti desert was like the day of Judgement. Not a nuclear winter, but a petrochemical autumn. The consequences of the Iraqis burning of the oil wells was tongues of flame all round the compass and the ground vomiting black, stinking smoke. Rain lashed down the faces of the US marines, to make them look like coal miners, and a strong wind rushed across the dunes. Long before the sun went down, its light was soaked up by a dense, unnatural twilight."

On 4 March, Gordon Airs, of the Record, wrote:

"I drove north to the Iraqi border, and saw the price that Kuwait has paid to be freed. It is a ruined land. I passed 50 oil wells blazing fiercely, turning the blue sky into a giant blackness."

What effort has been made to monitor hydrogen sulphide and what can be done? I return, yet again, to Paul Krutyen of the Max Planck Institute for Atmospheric Physics in Mainz, who investigated the North sea potential danger in the early 1980s when there was a possibility of attack. Professor Krutyen told me to contact Russell Seitz. The ever-helpful science section of the Library has provided the following note on the eco-consequences of the Gulf:

"I am now writing to you with the results of my telephone call to Mr. Russell Seitz in Massachusetts.

As you indicated, Mr. Seitz has suggested that measures could be taken to improve the combustion of the oil burning in Kuwaiti wells and installations. Mr. Seitz told me that he has submitted his views in a letter to the journal Nature for publication on 21st March. As you may know, Nature normally insists that ideas and material it has agreed to publish must not be aired elsewhere beforehand. Both Mr. Seitz and the editor of Nature (John Maddox) have agreed that, in this instance, the following information may be used by you in the debate and attributed to Mr. Seitz provided that it is made clear that the full details will subsequently be published in Nature.

The essence of this proposal is that oxygen (in practice, air) could be inserted into the Kuwaiti oil fires in order to aid complete combustion, thereby lowering the volume of carbon (soot) and partially combusted hydrocarbons being released into the atmosphere. Mr. Seitz pointed out the difficulties of fire-fighting under the present conditions in Kuwait, as much of the country's infrastructure has been destroyed and water is in extremely short supply. In particular, he raised the possibility of a shortage of transport for the heavy equipment needed to fight the oil fires, such as earth-moving machinery. Air is obviously not in short supply, but there is the question of how the equipment needed to blast large volumes of air into the fire columns will be moved to the sites of the fires. Finally, Mr. Seitz highlighted that the current situation is unprecedented and that unconventional combustion engineering may therefore be needed to tackle a problem of this scale."

I am in no position to judge whether that is a sensible suggestion. However, if Professor Krutyen, with the backing of the Max Planck institute, says that it is a constructive way to proceed, the Government should consider that constructive suggestion.

The crisis is of such a magnitude that it cannot be left to contracts with firms that operate on the say-so of Red Adair and have never tackled anything on such a scale. I shall not criticise the apparent dependence on a man who is now in his mid-70s, with a stroke behind him, because he is backed by an organisation. Instead, I ask, should the world think it sufficient to leave the problem in the hands of Red Adair, Boots and Coots, the Bowden Wild Well Control, and a Canadian firm, Safety Boss, which are geared through their experience to tackling one or two blow-outs at a time?

The motion calls for a massive multinational civil engineering project on the scale of the military operation. Nothing less will do. There has been no experience of dealing with such a huge conflagration. I do not expect the Minister to dispute that because Rachel Whetstone's brief to the Conservatives concludes:

"Any action is impeded by unexploded mines and booby-traps. Many of the wells in the Saudi/Kuwaiti neutral zone require pumping to bring the oil to the surface, and these fires have, or soon will, die through lack of fuel. The problem lies with the 500 odd wells in northern Kuwait that will produce a self-sustaining fire that could burn indefinitely."

That is the problem that we face.

We must be practical and ask who will clear the mines and booby traps in temperatures of 200 deg C. I heard on the excellent Radio FM coverage, the young Paul Wayne, Mr. Adair's grandson in the firm, state that he needed two dozen water pumps per well and ask where the water was to come from. Raymond Henry, vice-president of Mr. Adair's firm, talked about 10,000 to 15,000 gallons of water being needed per minute on each site. It will take two months to lay pipes to bring sea water 100 miles from the sea. That is absolutely out of the range of firms such as Mr. Adair's, however brave and technically skilled they may be. We need an international operation. I have given Energy Ministers notice of that question, and look forward to hearing their thoughts.

Another related question is how the 0·5 tonne cranes will get near enough to their task in substances where the sand is so hot that it is like melting glass. Hon. Members may have heard Mr. Adair say:

"No one can tell how long it will last—I don't care who it is—if we can do this in three years, we'll be lucky."

It is not known how long it will last and the costs involved are mind-boggling. Each support person is paid $700 a day and the fire fighters receive $1,500 to $1,700 a day.

When the Prime Minister saw what he called

"the depressing and appalling sight of smoke clouds over Kuwait",

I wonder whether he recollected the exchange that we had when I asked oral question 1 on 11 December:

"To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to the answer of the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) of 13 November, Official Report, column 446, if he will specify those figures which he possesses relating to oil stocks, carbon monoxide, carbon dioxide and sulphur dioxide, which differ from those given by the King Hussein, showing in each case the comparable figures and the source for those which he uses."

The present Prime Minister replied:

"No, Sir. The calculations rest on assumptions about the consequences of a conflict in the Gulf which, by nature, are not quantifiable. The best way to avoid any adverse consequences is for Saddam Hussein to comply with the United Nations resolutions in full."

I then asked:

"Is not the spine-chilling truth that no mining engineer, no scientist, and no politician knows for certain what will occur if 300 deep-mined oil wells are detonated?"

My mistake was to suggest that the figure was only 300; it is now 500 or, if the Kuwait Petroleum Company's figure is right, 800. I continued:

"In those circumstances, might not the fires rage for months, if not years, in a fashion quite outside human experience? In view of that, should not the damage to the planet, let alone the human slaughter and the Arab ecological disaster, rule out any talk of a military option?"

The Prime Minister replied:

"As the hon. Gentleman says, no one can be absolutely and precisely certain about the outcome. In so far as it is possible to make an assessment, we see no reason to agree with any of the views put forward thus far as to what the outcome may be."—[Official Report, 11 December 1990; Vol. 182, c. 814.]

On what basis did the Prime Minister say that? The Government had had notice of my question. A month earlier I asked the former Prime Minister to make a statement on her discussions in Geneva with King Hussein of Jordan in relation to the ecological consequences of war in the middle east. The former Prime Minister replied:

"My bilateral discussions with King Hussein did not cover this subject, as I made clear to the hon. Gentleman on 7 November. However, if a tyrant is never to be fought in order that freedom and justice may be restored, tyranny will triumph in all its brutality and the environment of human rights, which we seek to extend, will have received a fatal blow."

I replied:

"If King Hussein is right and 50,000 million barrels of oil equivalent go up in flames, what will be the result in terms of carbon monoxide, carbon dioxide and sulphur dioxide, and what would that do to people and the planet?"—[Official Report, 13 November; Vol. 180, c. 446.]

The former Prime Minister did not answer that question. As I am not making a party political point, I shall add, in candour, that the Labour party leader, my right hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock), saw me courteously and privately at the end of November to discuss the ecological consequences. I am not making a party point, but saying to politicians, my colleagues—for goodness sake, what kind of scientific assessment is made before actions are set in motion that could have the most disastrous consequences? The hell of the matter is that, had politicians been less dismissive of the scientists' warning, Saddam Hussein and Iraq might have taken more notice of the effect on southern Iraq, parts of which are likely to be as badly affected as Kuwait.

The final section of the motion calls on the Government to fight disease in Kuwait and, as far as possible, in Baghdad and other cities. I shall confine myself to one question on Kuwait. I am told by Bill Spiers, of the Scottish Trades Union Congress, who has deep knowledge of the Palestinian problem, that a respectable case can be made for saying that the Palestinians are responsible for much of the prosperity of Kuwait, and that many of them have made their home there for 30 years. Will they be allowed to languish there, uncared for, or simply sent on their way with nowhere to go?

Earlier in the week I telephoned the Foreign Office to ask for Her Majesty's Government's views. I hope that if my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Galloway) has a chance to speak, he will repeat the moving speech that I heard him make in Committee on the problem of what he called the pogroms. His speech contained other powerful sections drawn from his deep knowledge of the Palestinian communities, which he has visited.

During the war, it was reiterated time and again that the coalition had no quarrel with the Iraqi people. If we assume that that is true, do we not have an obligation to offer medical and health-related help? Whatever the recent past, the here-and-now is that more than 4 million people in Baghdad face a public health crisis of vast proportions because of what international health authorities call "grossly inadequate water and sanitation services."

The Red Cross says that, unless Iraq immediately receives massive international relief, the city could soon suffer outbreaks of cholera, typhoid, hepatitis and polio. The drinking water for millions of people comes from the Tigris river, which is being fouled by gushing streams of raw sewage. Water purification plants have been disabled and the electrical generating plants that powered them have been destroyed. Dr. Mohammed Ani, director of immunisation and primary health care for the Iraqi Ministry of Health, said:

"We are being killed indirectly."

I was moved by John Pilger's accounts when he said that the weakest, youngest and oldest would be the first to suffer. Mr. Rojo, the correspondent of El Mundo, said that 50 children a day were dying in Baghdad for want of electricity. He referred to water-borne diseases as "that silent assassin." The water-borne diseases may prove the greatest danger. Dr. Ezio Gianni Murzi, an Italian who represents the United Nations children's fund in Iraq, sees as a major problem the 65 million cubic yards flowing from Baghdad into the Tigris every month. Air raids targeted plants that manufactured purification chemicals such as chlorine. With the pumping stations knocked out, water cannot be pumped from the river to the treatment plants. How are the Government responding to the urgent appeal from UNICEF and the World Health Organisation for water treatment chemicals? What is the supply of chlorine in Baghdad? Have the coalition even asked?

Raymond Naimy, a UNICEF emergency official, said that Baghdad's water supply had been cut by 90 to 95 per cent. at a time when Iraq's brief chilly spring was ending, and the scorching summer was to begin. The risk of disease will increase dramatically as the weather turns hot over the next few weeks. I shall be personal for a moment, though relevant—my father, as a young man before the first world war, was private secretary to Sir William Willcocks. Britain's most famous imperial water engineer, who attempted to recreate the ancient irrigation systems, and thereby fashioned most of Iraq. Central to his scheme, Willcocks completed the Hindaya barrage in 1914. The management of rivers is central to what is a hydraulic civilisation. How can a third world country be expected to repair such damage by its own efforts?

Because of the shortage of time, I will simply say that the same argument applies to Kuwait. There is a desperate need for us to do something about the appalling health problems there. I raised the matter at Scottish Office Question Time on 6 March, and I have been told that a brief has been sent by the Scottish Office to the Minister who will reply to this debate. Meantime, on 13 March, the Minister of State, Scottish Office wrote to me saying:

"Following my answer to your supplementary question on 6 March . . . you asked about the assistance which might be given by the NHS in Scotland to alleviate the problems of communicable diseases in Kuwait and Iraq. I understand that the international arrangements for the provision of emergency medical aid to these countries is being co-ordinated and undertaken by the United Nations and its agencies such as UNICEF. This should helpfully ensure that assistance is fully synchronised and appropriately focused. I can assure you, however, that any specific request for help from the National Health Service in Scotland, which is compatible with these arrangements, would be quickly and sympathetically considered. Moreover, I have no doubt that if a Scottish doctor or other professional wished to participate in the current international response, health boards would look favourably on any such proposal."

What about sanctions? We are left only with our own unproven assessments about whether, given longer, sanctions would have worked. But consider the strength of the United States and British insistence that sanctions must remain in place until Iraq has complied with all the relevant United Nations resolutions. The Foreign Secretary said that sanctions should not be lifted lightly or prematurely, and he claimed that their potency should not be underestimated. In that case, how come that a weapon that was deemed inadequate to dislodge the Iraqis from Kuwait is now deemed too important to surrender, now that they have gone?

In addition to all the other problems, there are the problems created by the thousands of returning troops, maimed and injured to Baghdad.

There should be an urgent response to the UNICEF and WHO requests and requirements. We should go further. Far from acquiescing in President Bush's statement that he would not give a dime to Iraq, we should offer some places in British hospitals that were cleared for our returning wounded to maimed Kuwaitis and Iraqis, be they Shi'ites, Kurds or other injured.

Ambassador von Richthofen understandably sent the Minister of State for the Armed Forces a copy of a letter that he wrote to me following a question that I put to the German ambassador at Lord Kimberley's defence group about provision in Federal Republic hospitals. I hope that the British Government are prepared to have discussions with the EEC countries about that. It might be helpful if I were to read into the record Baron Hermann von Richthofen's letter to me, in which he wrote:

"Thank you very much indeed for your kind letter dated 19 February 1991.

With reference to the matter of German medical support for British forces in the Gulf, I should like to inform you about the whole issue:

Firstly, the Federal German Government has offered facilities in German hospitals including beds for wounded soldiers both for British and American troops. The British authorities have not accepted this offer as yet.

Secondly, there have been flights carried out by the German Armed Forces from Cyprus in support of British forces; casualty evacuation could be part of it.

Thirdly, since the end of last year German medical officers have been working in British Armed Forces hospitals located in Germany in lieu of their British colleagues currently deployed in the Gulf.

In addition to this governmental support also private initiatives are taking place. For example one of the major German Ambulance Organisations (Johanniter Unfall-Hilfe) has offered its full service for British Gulf casualties in close co-operation with St. John's Ambulance.

I felt it appropriate to send a copy of this letter to Mr. Archie Hamilton, MP, Minister of State for the Armed Forces."

On 18 February 1991 I asked the Secretary of State for Defence what facilities were available in Bundeswehr hospitals for Gulf wounded, and the Minister of State for the Armed Forces replied that there were no plans to use Bundeswehr hospitals for the treatment of British personnel wounded in the Gulf.

What is the Minister's response to an article in The Sunday Times by Sean Ryan under the headline:

"Vast Gulf pollution cloud heads towards Europe"?

I am told that that is not true, but perhaps the Minister should comment on it.

Hon. Members will know that I am not emotional about many subjects. But I suggest that, emotionally, we shall be haunted for a long time to come by what has happened in the last few weeks. We shall be haunted in particular by what occurred on the Basra road. That was done in the name of the American Congress and the British House of Commons. It is up to us to establish the truth. I do not know where the truth will lead us, on that and other matters, but for our future relations with the Arab world, we have a solid obligation to get to the truth, wherever it may lead us. What was done will haunt not only those in my age group but those in the age group of my hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor), on the Opposition Front Bench, and that of the Minister.

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and Devon, West): That we should be having this debate at all is a measure of the tragic suffering in the Gulf. I wish at the outset to pay tribute to the great scientific expertise and diligence of the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), to whose speech we listened with the greatest care and attention, as it deserved. Indeed, his ecological warnings have proved all too true.

However, had there been no use of force by us—had we abstained from war—the human, animal and bird suffering would have been infinite. I fear that we see the left wing's failure of perception in large degree. Saddam Hussein's hatred of humans is mirrored only by his equivalent hatred of the world in which we live. As the Secretary of State for the Environment said on 28 January of this year, words are inadequate to describe the callousness and irresponsibility of his action in deliberately unleashing this environmental catastrophe.

Had Saddam Hussein accepted one of the many peace initiatives put forward by the allies, in which Her Majesty's Government were in the forefront, he would have saved not only 140,000 Iraqi lives, his own people, but the physical devastation of the earth and sea. It was unthinkable, but it happened.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow referred to a number of ways in which the west could respond, and has responded; the purpose of this debate must be to look forward. He spoke about the UNICEF paper. I dined last Friday with Dr. Jolly and heard about the awful things that have happened to Baghdad's water supply. The hon. Gentleman castigated the Government for, he claimed, doing nothing, but I am delighted to report that a joint Oxfam-Save the Children Fund team is out there looking at the situation. I have no doubt that when they return with proposals, the Overseas Development Administration will look at them with great sympathy.

At the height of the war, I put to the Foreign Office questions about the sort of actions that the British Government might take to help Iraqi children after the war. The response was good and warm and I have had subsequent correspondence and meetings on the subject. I have no doubt that the Government's response on behalf of the children of our former enemies will not be wanting.

Mr. Dalyell rose——

Miss Nicholson: I must get to Devon urgently to open a new school, so I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not give way.

The response of the British Government was immediate and effective, for example, in offering key expertise and funding from Britain. Our Prime Minister responded immediately, and I have quoted the Secretary of State for the Environment. That came as no surprise to my hon. Friends and it should not have surprised Opposition Members. Our former Prime Minister committed the United Kingdom to an environmental outlook several years ago. Our former United Nations ambassador, Sir Crispin Tickell, is one of the world's leading environmental specialists. He has been committed to the environment since he was a boy and has been at the forefront of Britain's work in this area.

As a result of that great work, we were thus the first country to respond financially to the International Maritime Organisation's appeal for money. We immediately gave £1 million. The Department of the Environment's key experts in pollution control and the ecology went immediately to the Gulf to help. We have ordered three oil recovery skimmers, with a value of £300,000, to go to Bahrain. On 28, 29 and 30 January we sent no fewer than 90 tonnes of anti-pollution equipment to the Gulf by air. We undertook that first-class cluster of important measures at the very height of the war.

What more can we do now, despite the fact, which can be so readily overlooked now that our own forces are not so heavily involved, that the conflict in the Gulf is continuing? We can help more. The United Kingdom has vast knowledge of induced breathing difficulties—a lucky heritage, in terms of knowledge, from London's smog. It is important to work on that, because the incomplete combustion of oil-producing carcinogens may cause cancer. Our medical help might be offered to assess and limit that damage to humans and animals. Perhaps both historically and currently, due to our background, we have more knowledge about the health and welfare of many of the peoples of the Gulf and surrounding countries, including even India, than many other countries. I am sure that our work would be well considered, well respected and well accepted by those nations. I hope that we shall help in that way.

The United Kingdom also has much weather expertise. Indeed, we talk about it all the time. The Meteorological Office has been running special weather models throughout the war. Perhaps it could continue to do so and to offer two-day forecasts of the dispersion and wash-out of pollutants. That would offer valid warnings to people in the Gulf area and beyond. When I use the word "valid", I cannot help but remind the House of the public's disbelief in the validity of the Met Office's forecasts in recent years. Much time has passed since the Met Office could not understand why everybody laughed when its spokesman said plaintively, in a public statement, "We cannot understand why the general public do not believe our forecasts. After all, they are right for 50 per cent. of the time." I could do as well by flipping a coin, but I most certainly do not have its great expertise in matters relating to the Gulf. Perhaps scientific uncertainty over the behaviour of the smoke in certain conditions could be reduced by measurements of smoke plume characteristics by the Met Office's research aircraft. Those investigations are critical to confirm whether climate-effect predictions are valid.

We also have extensive knowledge of acid rain from, for example, the Department of Trade and Industry's Warren Spring laboratory. Perhaps our involvement in such work in the Gulf would also help our long-term understanding of pollution processes that are relevant to acid rain in Europe, which would be of large and continuing importance to our own industrial behaviour patterns and to the measures that the Government have introduced to ensure the best control of such things.

Finally, our expertise in the environmental impact of such incidents is crucial. Environmental impact and environmental assessments lie at the heart of our own Government's policy on the environment. Perhaps the universities, especially Imperial college, could help. Indeed, the Secretary of State for the Environment has suggested that the Meteorological Office and other areas of United Kingdom expertise may well be useful in the next stage of this ghastly tragedy.

The Government, so far, have responded in an appropriately thoughtful, professional and effective manner. I and other colleagues await our next moves as a country and a Government with interest and high expectations.

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Hillhead): To her credit, the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson) may well have listened carefully to the powerful exposition of my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), but sadly the Government Whip did not listen with quite the same respect. The man whose cynicism has deepened with the length of time that he has spent on the Treasury Bench could say only at the close of my hon. Friend's remarks, "The Belgrano revisited".

Before turning to my main points, I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow. I speak on behalf not only of Opposition Members and some Conservative Members, but certainly on behalf of the vast numbers of our fellow citizens whom we represent in the House. His indefatigable energy, remorseless integrity, intelligence and care have sustained him throughout his quest for the truth—yes, I advise the Government Whip that it was the truth—about the Belgrano and about many other issues going back over decades. I pay tribute to him also for his approach now to these important and vital issues when we are attempting to calibrate the true cost of the enterprise in which we have just been involved.

The bitterly hard thing for some of us to accept on the Ides of March is that we have had to listen to the list of the casualties of that enterprise, as given by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow, and who could do so without a deepening sense of foreboding about the true cost of the enterprise? It is vastly greater than the popular media and some of the more gung-ho Conservative Members would have us believe.

There are those of us, such as myself, who have been Saddam Hussein's bitter opponents for as long as he has been in power in Baghdad. There are people, such as myself, who have marched, petitioned, written, railed and ranted at the dictatorship in Baghdad, and it is bitterly difficult for us to see the attitude of those Conservative Members who did not want to hear what we were saying and who wanted to say little and do even less about the bestialities that were committed by the dictatorship in Baghdad. For them, the dictatorship was merely a bloody good customer. That is the truth of the matter.

Those of us who had a track record of opposing the dictatorship argued that if we got into a war of the kind that was being contemplated, the consequences would be so devastating that they would outweigh any good that could be done. No one ever argued that force against a dictator such as Saddam Hussein was not justified. We argued whether such force was wise and whether the cost of the use of that massive force would outweigh the good that it would do. Conservative Members would do themselves some credit by acknowledging that. When we hear from them that it was all a great success and was achieved, to quote the Daily Mail last week, we begin to see the vast gulf—I hope that the House will forgive that unintended pun—between the truth as outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow and that popular perception. The liberation of Kuwait was not achieved at the cost of only a handful of lives.

"at a cost of a handful of lives",

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): Surely the vast gulf, which can be perceived by Conservative Members and by anybody listening to the debate, is between what the hon. Gentleman said at the time of the conflict and his attempt now to rewrite history.

Mr. Galloway: I can be accused of many things, but seeking to distort the truth is not one of them. I am about to say, if the hon. Gentleman will let me, exactly what I said throughout the months after the invasion of Kuwait on 2 August and what I have been saying for 15 years, which is a hell of a lot longer than the hon. Gentleman has been talking about the regime in Baghdad. Perhaps we can consult the record on that.

The true cost has been and will be paid by people in that area, by the ecology and environment of the area, and by all of us on the globe. The true cost is far greater than the straw hats and trumpets brigade—the vulgar triumphalists, some of whom sit on the Conservative Benches—want the country to believe. My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow described the vast environmental and ecological disaster which that enterprise has created. I hope that the Government have something constructive to say, not only about what they will do to try to arrest what is happening. Month after month, hon. Members, in particular my hon. Friend, predicted exactly what has happened on the environmental front. The Government should also say why the same effort that moved half a million men and all their fighting equipment was not expended on simple matters of civil and marine engineering, such as booms and other equipment. They could have been air-lifted with the military equipment and would have obviated some of the difficulties that we now face.

The same mentality that turns a Nelson's eye to environmental costs turns a Nelson's eye to the vast mountain of incinerated human beings who were killed because they had dark faces and because they had the misfortune to have been born in Iraq. The vast majority of human beings who made up that mountain of dead people never supported Saddam Hussein, never voted for Saddam Hussein, never voted for the war, and never in any sense offered any support to the Baathist regime in Baghdad, yet they were shot "like fish in a bowl". They were massacred "like rabbits in a sack". Other disgusting metaphors were plastered across our newspapers over the past few weeks. No one can talk about environmental damage or damage to the atmosphere without coming to terms with the fact that the massacre on the Basra road will haunt the world, as my hon. Friend said, for many decades to come. A Conservative Member smirks. Perhaps it does not haunt him.

No amount of washing of his hands will remove the black spot—[Interruption.] I note that the Government Whip has stopped yawning and is calling for the men in white coats. History will judge who were the lunatics who took control of the asylum over the past few months.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): When will the hon. Gentleman refer to ecological problems in the Gulf and stop playing party politics?

Mr. Galloway: Anyone who knows my opinion of the Labour party's performance over the past few months would not accuse me of playing party politics in this matter. If the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) thinks that the environment includes only oil, ducks, drakes, trees and plants and not human beings, he has a strange idea of the environment.

Mr. Dalyell: Will my hon. Friend explain the powerful analogy about half-drowned men?

Mr. Galloway: I was about to refer to the plight of the Palestinians who are trapped in their ghetto in Kuwait city. A day or perhaps two days after the war, the Prime Minister gave me a courteous answer and has acted on the problem in the intervening days. I referred to the dangers of a new pogrom—a new Sabra and Shatilla-type massacre—occurring in Kuwait city. A couple of days after I raised that matter with the Prime Minister, Robert Fisk and other senior and eminent journalists in this country—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) guffaws his contempt for Robert Fisk, too. Perhaps I should be gratefgul to be included in such company. The hon. Gentleman should save his contempt until he makes his speech. I should not be diverted by such puerility.

Fisk and other journalists from the English-speaking world have written movingly of their sense of foreboding as the witch hunt mentality develops in Kuwait city. For nearly 20 years I have been concerned with Palestine. The people of Dirr Yasshin, the people who have been beseiged and massacred in country after country in the middle east, the people of Sabra and Shatilla this very morning are locked in their homes—when there is a virtual curfew in the area—wondering whether the knock on the door in Kuwait city will be as deadly as the knock on the door has been for Palestinians in countries throughout that area. That is because of a caricature of the position of the Palestinians who opposed the invasion of Kuwait and opposed aggression against Kuwait but could not stand by neutrally when, in their view America transformed it into a war of the big powers against an Arab country.

I was in the occupied territories, in the town of Jericho underneath Mount Temptation, talking to a moderate professor of politics, Sa'eb Erakat. That man has met our Foreign Secretary and his predecessor, and James Baker and his predecessor. He is on the regular circuit of discussion with international leaders. He is currently incarcerated under town arrest in Jericho, many miles from his university in Nablus, which, in any case, has been closed by the military authorities for the past three years. He addressed the Palestinian approach to the Kuwait-Iraqi-American-British conflict, and said, "We Palestinians were a drowning people, adrift on the ocean, with international ships sailing in the opposite direction pretending that they could not hear our call of distress. Along came a ship flying our flag as well as its own, the flag of Iraq. It stopped by us drowning people adrift on the ocean, and offered to lift us on board. What were we to do—ask for the human rights record of the captain or for the bona fides of his ownership of the vessel before we climbed aboard? The ships that sailed in the opposite direction were responsible for our plight." That is part of the environment of the area and it will be part of the history of the events of the past five months.

10.50 am

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): I am sure that the hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Galloway) is passionately sincere, but the somewhat hysterical character of some of his remarks has not made it easier for me to support, as I fully intend to do, the main tenor of the argument of the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). The fact that the Opposition Back Benches are occupied almost entirely by hon. Members who have taken an uncritical attitude of opposition to almost any use of armed force by Her Majesty's Government does not make my task any easier. There is a conspicuous absence of those who may be called moderates on the Labour Back Benches.

I am glad to have the opportunity to make a small contribution to the debate. The hon. Member for Linlithgow has done the House and the nation a service by focusing attention on this issue and by setting out so vividly and in such detail the scale of the ecological and environmental consequences of the Gulf war. He knows the high personal regard which I have for him. I cannot always follow him in his battles—sometimes they seem to be battles against windmills. I usually part company from him sharply when he pursues, as he rather notably did not do today, the conspiracy theory of history. I am a devout believer in the cock-up theory.

As it happens, I believe that the Government have done well in their action to help clear up—perhaps that is not the right expression for putting a sticking-plaster on a gaping arterial wound—after the war. At any rate they have done well by rushing like Mrs. Partington with her mop vigorously pushing back the Atlantic ocean. The Atlantic ocean, as admirers of Sydney Smith will recall, beat Mrs. Partington. If the hon. Gentleman is in the business of blaming the Government for showing less enthusiasm for clearing up the mess than for getting into the war, I am not with him. The action announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment on 28 January was prompt and well judged as a contribution to clearing up the most immediate threat to the environment from the conflict—the spreading oil slicks in the Gulf. The effort, prompt as it was, does not begin to match in scale the effort that we put into the war or the real needs of the truly alarming environmental catastrophe. That, alas, mirrors human attitudes. It is easier to get massive support for a war than for cleaning up its aftermath.

Heaven knows, I did not want to get into the war. Even now I am not finally convinced that it was the lesser of two evils. It is just that I was driven to the conclusion that it was going to happen anyway because Saddam Hussein was determined to have a war so that he could pose as the Arab champion against Israel. If it was going to happen anyway, there was no realistic possibility of making it less awful by delaying it. It was the much criticised last-minute efforts at mediation by France and the Soviet Union which eventually convinced me that war was inevitable.

Just because I have no fault to find with the Government, either in their conduct of the war or in their response to the ecological catastrophe which has, entirely predictably, ensued, it does not mean that any of us can sit back and say, "We have done what needed to be done." Far from it. It is to public opinion in this country and the world outside that we need to address our warnings insistently and stridently.

The damage done by allied air action in Iraq and still more by the Iraqi scorched earth policy in Kuwait is irreparable. The most enormous efforts are called for from the world community even to mitigate the worst effects of that damage. To make matters worse, these efforts are called for at a time when famine once again threatens great swathes of Africa and the many millions of men, women and children who live there. The efforts that must be made to limit the damage in the middle east must be in addition to, not in place of, the efforts that the rich world makes to alleviate famine in Africa.

No hon. Member wants war. I wish I could say the same of the press, but I have found it hard to read The Sunday Times or The Sunday Telegraph, let alone the Sunday Express, The Sun or The Star without sensing a real relish for battle. I cannot avoid the feeling that even among the more responsible people, such as hon. Members who certainly did not want a war, there has been insufficient appreciation of how horrible war is. Because of that insufficient appreciation, I am not sure that in balancing the pros and cons of recourse to armed force, we necessarily came to the right conclusion. Yes, of course war brings out some heroic qualities of courage and self-sacrifice, but so do concentration camps. I hope that we will not start romanticising them.

It is a matter for rejoicing that the casualties on the allied side were so light, but the casualties on the Iraqi side were appalling. As the hon. Member for Linlithgow said, many of us will be haunted for the rest of our lives by the pictures of the carnage on the Basra road. I have no right to condemn the military action which produced that slaughter any more than I had a right to condemn the bombing of Dresden in 1945 or the dropping of the second nuclear bomb on Nagasaki. All three are copybook examples of the senseless butchery which war almost invariably brings in its train. When we weigh up whether in any given situation war is the lesser of two evils, we should recognise that such horrors are inseparable from it.

Mr. Dalyell: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that before we jump to any conclusions about what happened on the Basra road we should have far more facts? May I repeat to him a request that I put to the Leader of the House during business questions and again last night on the motion for the Easter Adjournment, that the Government should give to the House the information that they have about the timing and their state of knowledge of what occurred? Then and only then can we make a judgment.

Sir Anthony Meyer: I have little doubt that those facts will emerge. I have great faith in the persistence of investigative journalists to delve into those matters. It will all emerge in the course of time. One of the troubles was that the war ended so abruptly that public interest switched rapidly from horror at what happened on the Basra road to surging relief that the hostilities had ended. That has been a major factor. I have no doubt that such facts will emerge and I am glad to think that when they do the verdict will remain the same—that the military action probably was justified. That will still not relieve my sense of horror.

We are supposed to be debating environmental consequences, rather than the slaughter of men, women and children. The hon. Member for Hillhead equated the two, but there is a distinction in logic which has to be drawn. There is a danger of overstating the case. The right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) made a number of remarkable interventions during debates on this matter, and laid himself wide open to the charge of overstating his case. But all too often it is the prophets of doom who are nearer the truth in the end than the bland reassurers. We are not yet at the end of the Chernobyl fall-out, and I say that as a supporter of nuclear power.

Clearly, we will all be baffled by science in this matter. The worldwide consequence of the smoke clouds from the burning oil wells and the spreading oil slicks are presumably too dependent on winds and tides and ordinary climatic factors to be safely predictable, but the regional and local consequences are only too predictably dire. The consequences for public health in Iraq of the destruction of the sewers and the water supplies are all too predictable and, of course, disease knows no national frontiers. There is a strong case for a relaxation of sanctions to the extent that is necessary to permit the importation not merely of medical supplies, but of the equipment that is needed to repair the damage to the sewers and the electricity supply. I hope that the Minister will be able to reassure us about that.

I hope that the debate will focus public opinion on the consequences of war—not just on the number of people killed or maimed for the rest of their lives or those left without partners or parents or families whose life is permanently blighted, but on the destruction of cities and the ruination of the countryside. Modern methods of warfare spread such destruction and ruination many hundreds and perhaps thousands of miles from the battlefield.

Anyone who travels around Europe is constantly reminded of the loss of fine buildings and great works of art in earlier wars. This country has also suffered, especially from the destruction in London, Coventry, Liverpool and other great cities. I am not convinced that public opinion or the Government give full weight to such considerations when taking the fateful decisions about whether the need to deter and punish aggression outweighs the predictable consequences of even the most "successful" war.

I think that I am still of the opinion that the decision to go ahead with military action in the Gulf was the lesser of two evils, but I do not by any means rule out the possibility that I may later have to change my mind.

I am certain that I am in no position to condemn Opposition Members, even those whom I have categorised in my speech as extremists, for their opposition to the war. I am still less able to criticise those who, like the hon. Member for Linlithgow, have continually reminded us of the awful consequences.

11.3 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): With two minor exceptions, I agree with every word of the careful and worthwhile speech of the hon. Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer). My two points of dissent are that I hold a different view on nuclear power and I am clear that Governments, both here and in the allied countries, did not take sufficient account of the environmental implications of the Gulf war before they committed us to military activity.

My views differ from those of the majority of Labour Members who are in the Chamber in that, like the hon. Member for Clwyd, North-West, when the French and Russian initiatives failed I came to the view that, irrespective of what had gone before, there was no international alternative to military action. I did not find that view comfortable, because it was not one that I thought I would have reached. It does not change my view or that of all my colleagues, that the war was the result of diplomatic and political failure by world Governments. To reach a point at which there was no alternative to military action meant that we had failed the world community.

I listened with respect to the powerful speech by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Galloway). Like him, I have been to the occupied territories. It is almost irrelevant, but my first intervention in the press was made in my local paper when I was a teenager, and it was in support of the Palestinian cause. One of the failures that Britain has exemplified is the failure to understand exactly what drives people such as the Palestinians to accept support from wherever it comes. They do that because they have been denied support for so long by others. It is the same reason that persuaded Archbishop Tutu and Nelson Mandela to support those who were driven to military action in South Africa. There comes a time when people cannot accept that peaceful passive resignation will lead to a satisfactory and just conclusion.

I entirely endorse the plaudits extended to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). He has persistently sought, as I have done, although I concede that I have probably been less successful, to make sure that the environmental implications of the Gulf war were on the agenda of the House and the country. I agree with the hon. Member for Hillhead that there was and is massive concern in the country that the Government and politicians were not properly addressing that matter.

I and my party agree with every word in the motion. Our party conference started this morning in Nottingham and that is why my colleagues are not present for the debate. I may not be able to stay until 2.30. The hon. Member for Linlithgow has brought to the debate his well-known scientific expertise and his dogged parliamentary perserverence. I hope that the Government will take seriously the widespread support, not just for a proper analysis, requested by the hon. Member for Clywd, North-West, of what has happened in terms of future decisions, but for vigorous action to deal with the consequences of the war and its environmental implications. I hope that we shall show as much determination in that as we showed in our prosecution of the war.

I also reiterate what the hon. Member for Clywd, North-West said about the press and people being jingoistic, aggressive and enthusiastic about things military and suddenly becoming uninterested about their environmental results. The balance is completely wrong.

One of the issues that must now be addressed is the potential implication of what has happened to the environment and the ecology in the middle east. The loss of marine life as a food source will have consequences for subsidence fishermen in the Gulf. That means that they and many others are at risk of becoming poorer and less able to survive than they ever have been in a marginal economy. Unless we have a much more co-ordinated, urgent and more widespread international response than we have seen so far, we shall leave the ravage of the war writ upon the seas and the land of the countries of the middle east and, potentially, condemn a politically very delicately balanced region to further risk of military conflagration.

It was said that the United Nations intervened to bring about a peaceful middle east, but economic and human poverty and degradation as a result of the war could make that peace far less likely, unless, in a different way, we now intervene. Therefore, the ecology and the environment are integrated with the peaceful future of the countries in the Gulf.

I shall deal specifically with two issues, that give us cause for continuing concern. The first is oil fires. I am advised that the figures that I am about to give are not specific, but the numbers are large enough to be able to be generally substantiated whatever their specificity. It is said that there are 650 or 700 oil fires—perhaps 800—burning in Kuwait. That means that between 3 million and 6 million barrels of oil are burning each day. The main economic source of that part of the world is literally going up in smoke. The consequences are widespread and they have been well set out. I hope that the Government will give full credence to the work that has been done at Imperial college by the global environment research centre, to which the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson) and others have referred.

There are consequences for human health that add to the chances of suffering from respiratory disease, infection and discomfort. There is the inevitability of acid deposition that makes those complaints worse.

There are consequences that will lead to the pollution of water, which is the principal source of life and survival. There is the risk of serious pollution of surface water as well as the pollution of underground water supplies as a result of soot and other fall-out from emissions.

Potentially there is a serious threat of a large-scale abuse of salt and polluted fresh water if these materials are used to dampen down temperatures and to put out fires. There are consequences for the soil in the region, the land and, therefore, agriculture. Acidification of the land would have a direct effect on the ability to produce crops and food for animals, upon which the economy depends.

[Mr. Simon Hughes]

Animals may be at risk from unexploded mines. The region is at best economically marginal and we should be keenly aware of the consequences.

There will be a huge consequential effect on marine life. The world often ignores marine pollution even when we take account of land pollution. It is an example of out of sight, out of mind. Wildlife, fish and marine ecosystems will inevitably be damaged and the time scale for their recovery is uncertain. Previous spillages in the Gulf have added to the present problems.

Lastly, there appear to be direct consequences in the form of sand encroachment, not least through sand storms, as a result of the disruption to the ecology of the middle east. That will have an effect on human settlements and agricultural settlements. We must pay full cognisance to that.

It is easy for us, in the comfort of an unaffected western society, to underestimate the consequences of environmental disruption., The results mean literally life or death for those who live much closer to nature than most of us in this society ever do.

Secondly, we need to have equal concern about the consequences of oil spillage and oil slicks. It seems that 3 million to 7 million barrels of oil have been discharged into the Gulf. Minimum bird mortalities are estimated at 10,000; the estimated current maximum is 20,000 birds. These include cormorants, grebes and potentially will include migrants which arrive in due course. There will be an effect on the fishing and shrimp industries as a result of the oil spill. The mud-flats will be affected. A series of beings in the food chain of the marine ecosystem are, without any doubt, affected already as a result of the oil spillages. The results are dramatic.

Desalination plants are at risk. Most importantly, there is unknown damage to the coral reefs in the middle east. Power stations and palaces can be rebuilt but coral reefs cannot. They are the rain forests of the sea. They support hundreds of species. They are a vital link in the food chain. We do not even know the damage that has been wrought to the reefs.

Thirdly, we know that Iraq and Kuwait were effectively a chemical and petrochemical cocktail. It is possible that 26 toxic substances have been released from petrochemical and other industries as a result of the conflict. I, too, pay tribute to the Medical Campaign Against Nuclear Weapons and the work that has been done so far, but we do not know yet how many plants, refineries and storage tanks have been damaged. My right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel), the former leader of the Liberal party, has expressed concern about the damage that would be caused by the release of toxic substances. There has been disruption of low-grade nuclear facilities in Iraq, and it is likely that there is contamination in small areas around those plants. Ground and drinking water must be monitored urgently, especially in Baghdad where the risk to human health is the greatest.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): The rationale for bombing chemical weapon and biological weapon establishments was that the intense fire that ensured would destroy the contents within the establishments. I have always thought that to be an extremely dangerous rationale. There was no guarantee that that would happen. There is no way in which we can monitor the fall-out. The experience of Halabja tells us that fall-out can continue for quite a long time after the event.

Mr. Hughes: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman. It is one of the areas in which the evaluation of the consequences of military activity was never properly undertaken.

That leads me to the political conclusion, which I want to reach in a way that will give support to the motion of the hon. Member for Linlithgow. The Government have given £1 million to the International Maritime Organisation and three oil skimming vessels to the Government of Bahrain. I congratulate them on doing that, but that response was inadequate and belated. When I saw the European Environment Commissioner in Brussels before Christmas I told him of my concern that European governments and the European Community had not considered formally how it might anticipate what might happen to the environment in the middle east. I fear that we did not anticipate what might happen.

On 6 February, the Secretary of State for the Environment wrote a letter entitled to all hon. Members. In it he said:

"Oil spills in the Gulf"

"It is impossible to anticipate or prevent all acts of this kind."

Of course it is impossible to anticipate or prevent all—I stress all—such acts. It may have been impossible to prevent Saddam Hussein spilling the oil. However, it was not impossible to anticipate his doing that, but the international community did not anticipate or prepare for that eventuality.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: The hon. Gentleman said that the Government's contribution to the International Maritime Organisation's international trust fund of £1 million was belated. How can it be belated if we were the first country to make a contribution? It is impossible to get much further up the pecking order than that.

Mr. Hughes: My point is that the Government's response to the possible environmental situation in the middle east was months late. Nothing happened until the oil was spilt and fires occured. Hardly any work had been carried out before.

Mr. Arnold indicated dissent.

Mr. Hughes: It is no good the hon. Gentleman shaking his head. No work was carried out. If he can prove that work occurred, I should be interested to hear the evidence. We reacted after the event when we should have reacted before. I should be happy to let the hon. Gentleman intervene if he can provide the House with evidence that this country reacted and was prepared.

Mr. Arnold: I was responding to the specific point about the IMO and the fact that Britain made the first contribution to the fund.

Mr. Hughes: Our reaction to the environmental catastrophe in the middle east was belated because that catastrophe could and should have been anticipated. We failed in that respect.

Mr. Dalyell: It must also say something about Parliament when, in debates following the Consolidated Fund Bill, hon. Members plead with the Government to act. It is not a matter of hindsight. The matter was foreseeable and foreseen, predictable and predicted. To that extent, a certain amount of recrimination is justified.

Mr. Hughes: I entirely agree. The call for the world to be prepared for the consequences of the political decisions taken last year did not simply come from this House.

There are billions of pounds worth of contracts now up for grabs in the middle east. I do not know how many of them are for environmental improvements. This country leads the world in marine and terrestrial pollution technology. We have the best qualified people to carry out an environmental impact assessment of the damage in the middle east. Such a course was proposed by the global environment research centre at Imperial college, and I invite the Minister to agree that we should make such an offer to provide those people.

When the Secretary of State for the Environment meets Environment Ministers in the Environment Council next week, I suggest that he proposes that such an initiative should be set up, which perhaps Britain could offer to lead, to collaborate on behalf of the European Community with the relevant states in the Gulf and carry out that environmental impact assessment. He should suggest to his European Community partners that in each Community country and in the Community as a whole we should set up a liaison body with the Governments of Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and elsewhere including, if possible, Iraq to facilitate the necessary environmental work. If the City-Kuwait group could be set up in this country to facilitate contracts for rebuilding the physical environment of the middle east, for heaven's sake we should be able to set up a similar body to provide money for the environmental reconstruction of the area.

We can of course use the IMO as a clearing house for anti-pollution advice and for environmental rescue measures. However, we should do more than that. More money is needed and I am not alone in making that statement. It is supported by the world conservation centre, an arm of the United Nations Environmental Programme, which has stated:

"Every effort is being made . . . however lack of available funds, shortage of staff and lack of equipment is limiting progress."

We must all be aware that Kuwait is effectively starting absolutely from scratch.

I also want to repeat a point that I put to the Secretary of State during the war in the Gulf—a point that he was courteous enough to say he would consider. We should stop being reactive and start being pro-active. We should learn from the lesson of our failure to have in place an agency that could be more effective on the environmental issues.

The United Nations Environmental Programme should be strengthened to become the United Nations environmental protection agency. It should, by a further Geneva convention, have the same protection, responsibility and authority as the Red Cross or the Red Crescent. It should be able to enter areas of conflict to protect the environment, just as others go in to protect the injured and the ill. If there has been a sea change in the Conservative party's attitude to Europe, there is an opportunity next week for the Secretary of State for the Environment to make that change clear with his partners in respect of this most important issue on the environmental agenda. Unless we react coherently and immediately, we risk famine as marine and terrestrial food stocks diminish in the middle east. The refugee crisis and the human suffering will be worse.

There should be no argument about the matter. Only when we have acted in such a way shall we be able to answer the question asked by the hon. Member for Clwyd, North-West; only when we have responded to and dealt with the environmental catastrophe shall we be able to judge whether Operation Desert Storm was a success. If we do not follow the military action with environmental rescue, that operation may be a very costly failure.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): The motion moved by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has been helpful. I hope that this debate will have the consequences requested by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), although I do not suppose that that can be said about every debate in which the hon. Member for Linlithgow and I are involved.

Action on the European level is one of the ways in which we can achieve an international grouping. I am sure that the House would agree that such a grouping is necessary. I am touched by the fact that I have a copy of a similar proposal from a committee of experts on road safety led by Mr. Christian Gerondeau and other European experts. This proposal suggests how to reduce the number of road casualties. It is of interest because in the United States and the European Community combined over the next five years we will kill 500,000 people on our roads.

In parenthesis, perhaps I should draw a contrast between the human costs of war and the toll on our roads. During the Falklands conflict in which the hon. Member for Linlithgow was interested, 255 British service men were killed. Over those same weeks, 311 British motor cyclists died. One group received a memorial, but the others did not. In the year before I went to serve in Northern Ireland as a junior Minister, 183 people there were killed on the roads and 63 people lost their lives as a result of bombs and bullets.

If one could wish away war or the loss of life on roads, one would wish away war because it does more than cause loss of life and change to the environment and in this case, sadly, to the ecology. It is also an obstacle to what people in the Catholic Church call the preferential option for the poor, which is that when one has a choice of making life easier for the rich or making it easier for the poor there is an obligation to help those who are worse off. War is an obstacle to prosperity and, by definition, it is the opposite of peace. There will not be justice or development while there is war.

The European Community has taken a useful initiative aimed at reducing road casualties, like the 5 million ecu going towards a similar approach to deal with the environment. It will also be useful. In part, they will be useful because they can bring together the pathfinders and the scouts and enable them to put on the pressure to ensure that we overcome what was described in a recent article in The Financial Times as the biggest plague on this earth. That is AIGS—apathy, ignorance, greed and stupidity.

It is most important that ignorance is overcome, and for that reason I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Minister. As well as being able to answer some of the questions put by the hon. Member for Linlithgow, and those that will no doubt be asked by subsequent speakers, he will be able to tell us how to build on what has been done. It is good to know that Britain has been leading the way within bodies such as the International Maritime Organisation. That does not deal with the query about whether our help was early enough or whether more could have been done by, for example, using booms. These details do not matter as much as raising the awareness of the opportunity to reduce avoidable disadvantage, distress and handicap. That must be what was underlying the interest shown by the hon. Member for Linlithgow.

A long time ago, under a previous Government, the hon. Gentleman and I used to meet occasionally to play tennis. We did not quite get to the point of playing without a net in the way that we did a week or so ago after an intervention of mine. Since my last, somewhat truncated, discussion with him, I have been to El Salvador to observe the elections and to help the country to establish an electoral system. That in turn will help to end the civil war.

El Salvador may not have the ecological problems that have been thrown up by the conflict in the Gulf but in a country with a population smaller than that of London, 75,000 people have been killed since I first went there 13 years ago. That murdering went on without being awarded the attention of the House or other bodies. It has been called the country where Catholics kill priests, such as Archishop Oscar Romero, who was once one of the saints of this world, and the six Jesuits and their two household staff, who were taken out and had their brains blasted out on the lawn of the university that they had set up. That was in the best university in central America.

There is evil in people, and that evil needs to be confronted. We could debate how that could be done, but the important thing is to overcome it. There are good people who are trying to cope with it. That often means saying inconvenient things that are sometimes unpopular and may not even be right. If we all kept quiet until we could be convincing because we had evidence to produce, we should never get anywhere and there would be no need to have a Parliament. Every one of the 160 or 170 countries has a Government. There is no problem with that, but the difficulty is being able to tell one's Government that they have got it wrong and that there is an opportunity to get it right or to suggest that the country goes in for some collaborating, risk taking or co-operation.

In issues such as the environment and the ecology, it is clear that what appear to be simple solutions will not work. When the oil was deliberately being poured into the Gulf, booms around the affected area would not have been of any help because that area was not controlled by the coalition forces, although it was later on. Booms would have been helpful in places such as Bahrain or anywhere with a desalination plant. However, that is only a detail and my contribution will not be valid if I concentrate on picking up such points.

However, perhaps I may be allowed to pick up a possible answer to the question that I put to the hon. Member for Linlithgow. I asked him about the extra consequences of the localised, partial combustion in a concentrated area, as compared with the more complete combustion of the refined product spread around the world in our motor cars, in our power stations or our central heating systems. That is the question that the scientists should address.

Mr. Dalyell: The question is about to what extent the soot rises towards the stratosphere. If it goes high, the monsoons could be affected, with terrible consequences for the food chain for millions of people. If it goes low—nobody knows how it will behave—the regional effect would be concentrated and terrible.

Mr. Bottomley: That is the question. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who allowed me to intervene in his speech to put my question. Others may be able to answer it during the debate.

One of the reasons for reading the New Scientist over the years has been the hon. Gentleman's column. If more people were aware of that column, more people would be willing to hear his unasked-for guidance so that he would have more opportunity for getting allies. He does not need help in getting attention for his views. I had the misfortune, or the fortune, when the Parliamentary Private Secretary to my right hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) when he was a Minister at the Foreign Office after the tragedies in the south Atlantic, of hearing him.

It is not for me, as a junior Member of Parliament, to give the hon. Member for Linlithgow too much gratuitous advice on how to create coalitions and alliances. However, if we more often heard from him speeches that we could support, we would achieve more together than we would by making personal and partisan remarks. Sometimes, those remarks are provoked, but we should not give in to such provocation because there are better ways and higher levels of debate. We could not be criticised as being the members of the awkward squad.

One of my pastimes is buying books written and printed in the middle and late 1930s. It is interesting to read what people were saying in Germany and this country and to see why we allowed ourselves to be treated in the way shown in the Low cartoon of 1936. It showed the League of Nations cowering in the corner away from one, aggressive looking man—Hitler.

The issue that is not at stake in today's debate, but underlines our consideration of the subject, is whether it would have been possible to persuade Saddam Hussein not to invade Kuwait. Although Saddam Hussein has been involved in other activities before that, in Iran, with the Kurds and with the majority of his population, who have never had much opportunity for a say in the political direction of their country, the war started on 2 August with the invasion of Kuwait. We shall never know whether it would have been possible to persuade him to live up to his promise not to invade. The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) went to see Saddam Hussein in the autumn of last year. He could not persuade Saddam to get out of Kuwait. Sadly, that argument did not work, but could we have achieved its purpose in other ways?

Having prevented Saddam Hussein from moving on to take Saudi Arabia after Kuwait and, presumably, moving on to his way of resolving the Palestinian issue—with all that that means for the Israelis' fears about their future—would it have been possible to stop a third world war starting? I believe that there was no prospect of stopping Saddam Hussein's aggression, other than joining the war which he started. I say that with no pleasure.

On Saturday, I was in a village in El Salvador, where I talked to people about their elections. I was there when small arms fire broke out. That reminds me of the newspaper headline, "Small earthquake in Peru—no one hurt." No one was hurt in those 15 minutes at Los Ranchos, near Chalatanango. We crouched on a site near where mortars had fallen two or three days before. The next day, I was with a doctor near another place where a mortar had fallen. The mortars in El Salvador had no more military purpose than the Scuds that were sent to Tel Aviv and Riyadh.

It is frightening to be under fire. It is ghastly for those who have to go through it. It is to be avoided if possible. With Saddam Hussein, it was not possible. I hope that we can now clear up the consequences of his actions. I hope that it is possible for Iraq to reach the stage of choosing its own Government and that there are not the massacres in Iraq, as people fight for political control, that, sadly, have occurred in El Salvador and many other countries. Most hon. Members present are the type of people who are involved in Amnesty International, trying to stop individuals being persecuted, or in aid organisations. There is an hon. Member here who served with Voluntary Service Overseas and one who was a director of a charity involved in such work. I spent six years as a trustee of Christian Aid. None of us is under any illusion about the amount of misery and hardship faced by people because they have not had a chance to have a political system that delivers peace, prosperity and justice.

This is a never-ending quest. I suspect that in 10 or 20 years' time we shall have the same debates about the same problems. We cannot turn our back on what is happening. Every one of us has a responsibility to do as much as any other person. The hon. Member for Linlithgow can be given credit for having done more than any of us for the environment and the ecology.

11.42 am

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): In opening what I hope will be a brief contribution, I put on record my warm tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) for choosing this subject for debate and for his consistent work on the environment in the middle east and the potential catastrophe that a war there would cause. My hon. Friend outlined the matter well in an Adjournment debate before Christmas, detailing the consequences for the environment in the region of oil spillages, burning oil wells and chemical and biological warfare during a conflict. My hon. Friend deserves full credit for doing that.

My hon. Friend has stood out on many issues at many times, often from a lonely position. It is a credit to him that he stood up to much of the nonsense said about him and that he pointed out the truth of many issues, such as that of the Belgrano and what is happening now. I remember standing beside him in Trafalgar square when he said that the words "I told you so" were not very becoming to politicians. In this case, my hon. Friend has a right to use those words. He predicted what would happen if there was a war in the Gulf. He should be applauded, respected and listened to for doing that.

In considering the history of the region and the consequences of the war, we should cast our mind over history, including its more recent history. Only three years ago, the problem of the Kurdish people in northern Iraq was brought to the world's headlines when chemical weapons were used against them in the village of Halabja. That was not the first time that chemical weapons were used against the Kurdish people by Iraq's first army and it was not the last.

Several of us raised protests in the House. The Government protested and raised the issue of chemical weapons at a conference held in Paris in September 1988, but they did not take action on Britain's relationships with Iraq. I clearly recall a delegation of which I was part, with my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen), the then general secretary of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament, Meg Beresford, members of the National Peace Council and several Kurdish people, which went to the Foreign Office to ask exactly what the Government's policy was. We strongly pointed out the carnage that was occurring in Halabja through the use of chemical weapons, the destruction of Kurdish villages in the north of Iraq, and the forcible movement of Kurdish people to the south of Iraq.

To be fair to the Minister, the right hon. Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave), he agreed with us about the horror of the use of chemical and biological weapons and said that they were illegal under the terms of the 1925 Geneva protocol. He did not agree that the British Government should stop supplying trade and credits to Iraq. We believed that the British Government should stop subsidising trade with Iraq and should stop allowing other countries to export weapons to Iraq. There was a ban on the export of weapons from this country, but the funding of trade with Iraq gave that country hard currency with which it could buy weapons elsewhere.

I have a plan, which was produced in the Bangkok Post early in February and which was recently sent to me, showing that weapons came from the USSR, France, China, the United States, West Germany, Brazil, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Chile, Jordan, Spain, Egypt, South Africa, Switzerland, Libya, Austria, Saudia Arabia, Romania and Kuwait, which sold Iraq 50 tanks. Iran has been selling Iraq weapons since the end of the war between those countries. We should think carefully about relationships and the trade between countries. The problems in Iraq are a consequence of those relationships.

The environmental problems to which my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow referred are not new—there have been such problems in Iran and Iraq for a long time, although they are much worse now because of the war. In much of the reporting of and discussions about the war and its consequences, people have deliberately forgotten the role played in modern civilisation by the Mesopotamia valley. In many ways, it is the cradle of civilisation. The Tigris and the Euphrates have brought much learning and much discovery to the world. They brought agriculture to the world when there was no proper agricultural system in this country. There were universities in Baghdad long before they existed in this country. Iraq is a place of enormous civilisation and much learning, but much of that was ignored during the war because it did not fit in with the image presented when some people wanted to go to war against that so-called dangerous regional power.

More recently, there have been environmental problems in the area. There have been endless discussions and disputes about the use of water from the Tigris and Euphrates and about who draws off water at certain places. During September, when I was in eastern Turkey, I travelled to Diyarbakir and down to Cizre, on the frontier with Iraq. I looked at the problems of water supply and at the over-irrigation that occurs in certain parts of south-east Turkey and northern Iraq. The drawing off of too much water leads to problems further down. There will be continual conflict on environmental matters in the region until the problem of water supplies and the sharing of those supplies is resolved. Future wars in the region could be about water, as this war was, I believe, about oil.

We must also recognise that there is fundamental political instability in the region. It stems from the attitude taken at the end of the first world war, at the time of the Versailles conference and the treaty that followed it. The treaty envisaged the right to self-determination for the peoples in the region. I believe that it acknowledged implicitly the rights of the Armenian, Kurdish and Palestinian people to have their own states. Those wishes were denied because of the creation in 1922 of modern Turkey and its frontiers and because of the British operation of the Palestinian mandate. They were denied partly because of British and French political activity in the area and because of the drawing of the modern frontiers. I believe that those frontiers will be a cause of future instability.

We should also remember that the Royal Air Force took part in the bombardment of Kurdish villages in 1922 and used chemical weapons to bomb Kurdish people who were fighting for their liberation in 1922 in northern Iraq. That is not very long ago in the mind of a historian or in the popular memory of the people of Kurdistan, who feel bitter about what the RAF did in 1922 and about the damage caused to their community and their environment. We must recall those issues in our discussions about the war.

I opposed the war, and I continue to do so, because I believe that it was the wrong way to solve the conflict. I regret the consequences that we are now seeing—the loss of life of American and British soldiers, of conscripted soldiers in Iraq, of the Republican Guard and of hundreds of civilians in towns and villages all over Iraq. The latest figure of the total number of dead in Iraq is likely to be more than 140,000. The idea that we should hold a victory parade in the near future is distasteful.

War is a disaster in terms of costs, for the environment, for the people of the region and for the region's political systems. The environmental disaster was predictable. Oil slicks at sea caused by the bombardment of tankers and the deliberate setting off of oil well sluices by Iraqi forces have caused terrible environmental carnage throughout the Gulf, as my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow said. The slicks will destroy sea algae, sea mammals, fish and the ability of sea plants to produce oxygen, which will result in the deoxidation of the sea. It is possible that the sea, or at least a part of it, will be dead.

The burning of the oil wells, which is likely to continue for years, will blot out much of the sun. That will damage the ability of Kuwait—and especially that of southern Iraq—to produce the necessary food. Clearly, that will cause long-term problems. There are already health problems in Kuwait, in Basra, in Baghdad and in other cities in the area. Any community that relies on a centralised water supply and sewage disposal system is vulnerable to air attack. That must have been known when the American and British air forces carried out their bombardments. The destruction of the sewage facilities and of the water system will quickly lead—if it has not already done so—to the growth of cholera and other diseases in the area.

We are dealing with a complete disaster, but our ability to cope with it and to get relief and aid to Iraq and Kuwait is clearly hampered by the lack of a political settlement. I am worried that the political complexion of the area is being decided by the United States on the basis of its own interests rather than according to the needs of the people of the area. Until there is a political solution and the Kurdish and the Palestinian peoples have a right to self-determination, the political conflict will continue.

The environmental destruction will continue as the lack of resources in the area means that oil well fires are not extinguished, water supplies restored and sewage disposal systems repaired. There should be a massive deployment of resources to resolve those problems. From August, however, there was such a massive deployment of resources to the region. To date the conflict has cost Britain £3 billion—it will cost the United States much more. I accept that Kuwait has offered to pay towards the cost, but, in that sense, it all becomes mercenary. Such expenditure is distasteful when millions of people face starvation in Africa. Similar resources have not been deployed to save them.

The middle east is facing an environmental disaster, but countries have been unwilling to offer adequate resources to stem the flow of oil and to put out the fires. There must be a commitment to protect that environment.

People in the poorer countries witness the determination of the west to get involved in military conflicts and to gain commercial advantage from them. That advantage is being gained at this moment in the city where the reconstruction contracts for Kuwait are being shelled out. The victims of Bhopal have been ignored. The landless people of Brazil believe that they have been thrown out of the Amazon rain forest because of the logging operations of multinational corporations. Those people believe that the only thing in which the western industrialised countries is concerned is self-interest and looking after their own political power.

I hope that this debate will draw attention to the deep concern throughout the country that the environmental consequences of the Gulf war will be horrific, not just for the immediate area, its people and wildlife, but for the rest of the world. If the oil-induced cloud continues, the effect on rainfall throughout the region will be considerable—it will have a similar effect on the Indian sub-continent.

Once one starts upsetting a climatic system, the effects know no boundaries. I hope that the Minister will demonstrate a true commitment on the part of the British Government to get resources into the region to resolve some of the environmental disasters we are now witnessing.

11.56 am

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): I am most grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) for initiating the debate. I describe the hon. Gentleman as such advisedly. He has many obsessions, most of which I do not share, but I share his obsession for the tropical rain forests of Latin America and with the ecological consequences of the Gulf war. However, sometimes the hon. Gentleman seems to be an outrider for the Apocalypse. We must put the problems of the Gulf in context and then we must tackle them.

The World Conservation Monitoring Centre has undertaken a useful assessment of the situation in the Gulf. In its briefing paper, prepared a few days ago, it states:

"The smoke cloud is relatively low with a ceiling of 10-15,000 ft. This is not high enough to affect stratospheric climate circulation, so predictions of widescale disruptions of rainfall and monsoon patterns are exaggerated . . . Many of the wells in the Saudi/Kuwait Neutral Zone require pumping to bring the oil to the surface".

It says that the fires that are now disfiguring the middle east will soon die out through lack of fuel. It also states that the soot that has been thrown up by those massive fires is harmless, but "black rain frightens people."

We must assess the problems that we face and we can and must tackle them. It is worth recalling the cause of the ecological disaster in the Gulf. It can be summed up in two words, Saddam Hussein. That brutal and callous President of Iraq is still at large. He caused the ecological disaster because of the way in which he went about his business. We should have known that man for what he was, as he showed no compassion for human life when he gassed the Kurdish people. However, he understands international media and opinion and he knows that we care about the environment. He let loose his dreadful action because he knows that we care about the birds, turtles, dugongs and fish to be found in the Gulf region and he hit us where it hurts.

We must consider, first, the problem of the oil slick caused by Saddam Hussein on Friday 26 January when Iraqi troops deliberately released 300,000 tonnes of oil into the Arabian Gulf in an attempt to contaminate Saudi Arabia's desalination plants and hinder the allied war effort. The damage has been extensive. His action created an oil slick 80 miles long and 14 miles wide—one of the largest ever known. The oil came from the Iraqi shelling of Khafji oil tanks, the deliberate release of oil from tankers and sea terminals at Al Ahmadi and Mina al Bakr, and from the offshore platforms in Iraq and Kuwait, both under his control at that time. Secondly, in the final week of Saddam Hussein's occupation of Kuwait, he set alight the Kuwaiti oil fields and caused 650 separate fires.

Clearly, we must understand the problem and tackle it. In the case of the oil slick, the World Conservation Monitoring Centre boiled the matter down to facing and coping with the scale of the problem. It tells us:

"The slick along the Saudi coast has shown virtually no movement for the last two weeks. It is now packed into Musallamiyah Bay, held by booms and sand barriers to the south of Abu 'Ali—it is present as 'hundreds of acres of solid oil, 5-6 inches deep'".

We must tackle that problem and the problem of the other oil slicks and patches, although those are on a much smaller scale.

The centre's brief on the ecological problems and the oil clean-up is specific about the scale of the problem and what must be done. Its report that very little co-ordinated action is being taken to clean up the area is worrying. It says:

"Every effort is being made by MEPA and volunteers to rescue and clean birds of oil and to clean oil from shores. However lack of available funds, shortage of staff and lack of equipment is limiting the progress. Meanwhile, little is being done other than putting out booms around key industrial sites and desalination plants. Only some 40-50,000 barrels have been recovered. The problem is lack of equipment and lack of cash."

Time and again, it returns to lack of resources. I welcome the International Maritime Organisation's newly established international trust fund to clean up the Gulf.

The House can take pride from the fact that Britain made the first donation of £1 million. We still need instant donations from the undamaged Gulf states—Saudi Arabia, Qatar, Bahrain and the Emirates—which are most concerned with the current problems. Britain has not been backward in coming forward, not only with cash but with technical support. The Department of the Environment has sent pollution control and ecological experts to help in the Gulf. The Government have ordered three oil recovery skimmers, worth £300,000, to be sent to Bahrain, and 90 tonnes of anti-pollution equipment—mostly booms—from industrial stocks held in Britain were flown out at the end of January when the scale of the problem was identified.

We can also take pride from the work of our Meteorological Office, which has adapted its computer models to give the best possible predictions of the likely behaviour of the oil slick. It is also analysing the impact of the oil fires' smoke clouds. Will my hon. Friend the Minister and the Department find ways of assisting the Meterological Office with the practicalities to enable it to observe those filthy clouds? It needs to take measurements on this unprecedented phenomenon.

The Department of Trade and Industry should also be commended for the work that it has done. It has got its act together and produced an admirable publication "Restructuring Kuwait", which is subtitled:

"Proposed United Kingdom contribution to the reconstruction of Kuwait."

I was glad that one section of the publication is devoted to environmental protection and United Kingdom companies' experience and involvement in Kuwait and the Gulf.

The document states:

"UK companies have experience in toxic/flammable gases, clean-up of oil and chemical spills, assessing the stability of sites and structures, determination and monitoring of ecological damage, effluent and groundwater pollution problems, water system sterilisation and requirements for the general decontamination of the site and those parts of the installations that can be salvaged or retained. Effective product management and control are essential factors in the successful execution of these tasks. UK companies with specialists in these fields are ready to respond to Kuwait's needs."

The report gives details of the companies that can help, including the British Oil Spill Control Association, a trade organisation which represents a number of United Kingdom companies and deals with all aspects of marine and industrial pollution. Such organisations should be given every opportunity to get cracking with the job that needs to be done.

Another major problem involves the fires, too many of which still rage out of control. The oil industry is already getting to work on that problem. The Parliamentary Office of Science and Technology has produced a useful briefing note on the subject, which states:

"the oil industry has had much experience in extinguishing fires at well heads using explosives to blow out the fire, after which the well head can be sealed."

It describes how, in more complex cases, the technology in the oil industry exists—through drilling, blocking and other means—to control those dreadful fires.

[Mr. Jacques Arnold]

The Gulf crisis produced some benefits. Out of that tragedy may well have come a new world order. For the first time ever, the five permanent members of the Security Council stood together, despite the stresses and strains of the crisis. No fewer than 30 nations sent armed forces contingents. They were sent from the United States, the old Commonwealth, Canada, Australia and New Zealand, west and east Europe, including Czechoslovakia and Hungary. They were sent from 11 Muslim countries and even from Latin America and black Africa. There were small but significant contingents from Argentina and Niger.

The United Nations has come into its own. It won the war and now it must win the peace—but with that peace, we must link the world environment. Signs are emerging that the same co-ordinated effort towards achieving that peace is not being achieved in coping with environmental tasks. I urge the Government to push for a co-ordinated initiative to be taken, perhaps through the United Nations, rather than to leave this serious problem to individual Gulf states, individual oil companies and individual under-resourced environmental organisations.

12.10 pm

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): If, after the debate, the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) reads the United Nations charter, he may feel that that organisation's commitment to seeking to resolve disputes by negotiation, arbitration, peace and other methods could have been sorely damaged by what has taken place in the Gulf.

On the other hand, there are agencies operating under the aegis of the UN, such as UNICEF and the World Health Organisation which are doing valuable work. The position of the UN cannot easily be judged one way or the other by what has happened in the crisis, for sometimes its right hand is trying to undo what its left hand has achieved.

The oil fires alone in the Gulf represent a massive human catastrophe, despite what the hon. Member for Gravesham said to try to alleviate the nature of that catastrophe. The situation is undoubtedly far worse than the disaster at Chernobyl and it might even be judged to be worse than Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Disastrous though those happenings were in terms of numbers of people killed, we must consider the potential that is beginning to flow from the crisis in the Gulf in terms of climatic conditions and the lives of people in the third world. We must be very concerned indeed if we are facing something that disastrous.

Hon. Members will have received copies of New Arabia, which have been sent out by the Kuwaitis. It includes an article entitled "Fires worse than nightmares" which deals with some of the points referred to in the debate. The nightmare that my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) predicted has probably, in the event, turned out to be even worse than that which he painted today. It is more disastrous and more oil fires are occurring, though perhaps my hon. Friend was deliberately being modest about such matters to give impact to the points that he made.

Mr. Dalyell: I admit freely that I was wrong on two points. There was talk of 346 deep mined oil wells. I thought that more than 20 would ignite—that number would have been bad enough—because of the absence of oxygen. I was profoundly wrong about that. Secondly, although we predicted the obliteration of Kuwait, we said that there would also be effects in Iraq, Iran, the Emirates, Qatar and Bahrain. It did not occur to us that the black acid rain would extend as far as Turkey.

Mr. Barnes: My hon. Friend makes a valuable intervention which reveals the extent of the danger. The best scientific predictions did not reveal the depth of the problem that was to emerge.

New Arabia contains a diagram illustrating many of the issues that hon. Members have raised. Rather than discuss the detail of the article, I will cite the headings to give a flavour of the depth of the problem. The article refers to dramatic falls in temperature that can occur because of the sun being blotted out for long periods; the loss of wildlife; the spread of smoke; the loss of marine life, disease through contamination; soil and water contamination; and massive air pollution. We must not be complacent about those problems.

There are other massive problems. For example, the activities of the tanks on both sides and the general movement of the armies has resulted in small stones and pebbles being dislodged from desert areas. Scientists are claiming that because of that movement, the sands of the desert are unlikely to be contained in winds as readily as they have been in the past. That puts villages, encampments, airstrips, townships and other places in danger, which may be minor when compared with other considerations, but could have serious effects in the future.

The task of dealing with the oil slick is immense. A whole host of problems about how it is to be tackled still remain. There might be the possibility of dropping incendiaries on certain slicks, though the experience of the Torrey Canyon suggests that that is not the most viable method. There are also possibilities of chemical dispersants, booms and skimmers. As the hon. Member for Gravesham said, they are vessels that can begin to take the oil away if the area can be contained. There is also the possibility of using bacteria to break down the oil slicks and to make them more easily tackled.

The problems of disease and refugees have already been stressed. Half the tonnage that was dropped in the European theatre during the second world war was dropped on Iraq in 39 nights of bombing. Although we are talking about a different technology, the consequences are horrendous. We do not yet know the depths of what occurred, but we do know that precision bombing went disastrously wrong at Al Ameriah. As has been said, a 60-mile column of conscripts and Kuwaitis were fleeing along the road from Basra.

We do not yet know all that much about what happened in Basra. We are used to having reports from Baghdad and know a great deal about the Rashid hotel and the area around it, which is not typical of Baghdad, although parts of Baghdad have been built up by Saddam Hussein into a prestige area, with similar complexes. Basra has suffered probably far more than anywhere else. My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow described what occurred in Baghdad and Kuwait. Basra's power supply, water supply, health and emergency services and sewerage systems have been dramatically damaged, causing serious problems, including typhoid, cholera, hepatitis and polio. Those diseases are occurring in Basra as well as in Baghdad.

Basra is a port. It has massive dock facilities, large marshalling yards, a railway complex, an airport and oil installations. It was hit hard. We have had various reports from Basra and some information about what the bombings sounded like from Iran. Basra was hit by B52 carpet bombs and by precision bombing, which may have saved lives in certain circumstances—where it did not go wrong—and which was resorted to in areas other than Basra. There were no journalists or television cameras present to tell us the depths of what happened in Basra.

In the Easter Adjournment debate yesterday, my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) made a moving speech about the situation in Iraq. My hon. Friend quoted two faxed communications that had been received from Iran and which originally emerged from Basra. One was an appeal from the people of Basra, and it stated:

"We are fighting for all Iraqis and for all humanity everywhere. We are in full control of Basra, but your families, children, brothers and sisters, mothers and fathers from Basra —they are in great need for food and medicines."—[Official Report, 14 March 1991; Vol. 187, c. 1140.]

Humanitarian relief in Basra is being initiated on a small scale under United Nations resolution 666, which is about the supply of foodstuffs and medical supplies, initially in connection with sanctions, but it has been reinforced by resolution 678, which was interpreted as being about war, but is also linked with the consequences of the war. That resolution should apply to Baghdad, Kuwait, Basra and other areas.

Mr. Dalyell: It is relevant to recall the moving reference of my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) to the situation in Coventry in the 1940s, and a meeting of the parliamentary Labour party in the 1940s, which my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes) and I attended. Furthermore, it is relevant to recall the impression that was left by people such as Alderman George Hodgkinson of Coventry and what happened during the reconstruction of Coventry after the horror that it endured. I suspect that the horror in Basra was many times worse.

Mr. Barnes: We do not know the number of people who have been killed in Iraq. Reference has been made to 140,000 people, but some will say that a quarter of a million people were killed. Let us say that 180,000 people were killed. That figure represents 1 per cent. of the population of Iraq. Most hon. Members' constituencies contain about 100,000 people, so we are talking about 1,000 deaths, on average, within a constituency. Some areas were barely touched, but Basra must have suffered tremendously.

I have an interest in Basra. A long time ago, I undertook my national service there in 1955-56. Therefore, I have the greatest affinity not only with RAF forces there but with the people with whom I worked. People often worked in abysmal circumstances. It was not unusual to see people working in the marshalling area carrying on their backs goods which no human being should have been asked to carry. That was some time ago and technology there has not advanced much, but I suspect that Iraq has advanced considerably in certain matters to do with prestige, military power and the authority of the Baath party and Saddam Hussein. Masses of people still live in mud huts and reed huts, and in the best of times, there are limited electricity, water and sewerage facilities. People in such conditions may have been affected by the bombing.

It is important to learn lessons from the past. We must ensure that we get full information. In such a debate it is possible to seek common ground between those who supported the war and those, such as myself and my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow, who strongly opposed it and now believe that subsequent events justified our opposition. Nevertheless the question of what we should do remains.

Earlier Tory Members mentioned what the British Government were doing and I, too, shall quote from the Conservative research department brief. It provides the key points to stress in showing what the British Government are doing. We need to consider whether its list of four points is adequate, given the nature of this disaster. The brief states:

"The British have responded quickly to the environmental problems caused by the Gulf War."

It then gives the four key points:

"Britain was the first country to respond to the International Marine Organisation's appeal for a £1 million donation.

The Department of the Environment has sent pollution control and ecological experts to help in the Gulf.

The Government has ordered 3 oil recovery skimmers worth £300,000 which will be sent to Bahrain.

90 tonnes of anti-pollution equipment—mostly booms—from industry stocks held in Britain were flown out to the Gulf on the 28th, 29th and 30th January."

All those items are welcome and I imagine that the list could be longer as those are given as the "Key Points". The Conservative research department has presented those points to save the Government from criticism during the debate, so that they can carry their corner. Those measures are inadequate to meet the scale of the tragedy. They are insignificant compared with the resources that went into the war effort. The consequences of the war are likely to be horrendous.

War is the greatest factor in social change, especially in this century of total war. The greatest changes to this country have not occurred under Thatcherism or even under the Attlee Government. They were set in motion by and occurred during the first and second world wars. They had tremendous consequences not only for this country, but for the world. This war will have the same effect on the Gulf area. The consequences will mainly be disastrous and many of them have already been mentioned.

We, in common with others, may see the need and may be able to take action to improve the position in the middle east. There are the strongest humanitarian reasons, as well as political reasons, for mass assistance. The political reasons include the need to make links with Arabs generally, so that they feel that the rest of the world is helping them overcome their problems. Many issues, such as the Palestinian question, can be considered, but that may go wide of the provisions in the motion.

Certainly there should be the fullest possible support for United Nations resolution 666. We bombed Saddam Hussein in an attempt to make him follow United Nations resolutions, yet resolution 666 provided that the United Nations and its members in certain circumstances should give him aid. The resolution had relatively little to do with Saddam Hussein. It had to do with us and the rest of our world in response to the situation. We should act as quickly as possible to provide the money and the resources that are needed, using the agencies of the World Health Organisation and UNICEF. They could also be provided directly or through links with Europe.

In order to play as full a role as possible in providing assistance, we need to understand the scale of the tragedy. We need as much information as possible from Iraq about what actually occurred, because a full and honest story must be presented and journalists and others must be given the opportunity to do that. The more that Saddam Hussein is allowed to maintain his authority over rebel Kurd and Shi'ite forces the less likely is it that we will be able to obtain information about what he is involved in.

People must fully realise what we were doing and what we were generally supporting. When that is quickly understood we can create pressures in society for humanitarian resources.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): I congratulate the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) on securing the debate. I gather that the Government Chief Whip described the hon. Gentleman's luck as black magic. The hon. Gentleman has extraordinary luck in securing Adjournment debates and debates such as this one, and he often does so at precisely the time that suits him. I make those points out of jealousy.

As usual, most of what the hon. Member for Linlithgow said was most impressive. I had the good fortune to serve until Thursday on the Committee examining the Natural Heritage (Scotland) Bill. In that Committee the hon. Gentleman displayed the enormous array of his interests, talents and expertise on environmental matters. He also gave us the benefit of his specific knowledge on Scottish matters, and in this debate he has shown the same flair in speaking about the Gulf and its wildlife and flora and fauna. I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on that. My only criticism is of his rather endearing habit of reading out almost every letter that he receives to make sure that they get into the record. However, such a habit is valuable.

Mr. Dalyell: If I were to read out all the letters that I receive no hon. Member would get a chance to participate in the debate.

Mr. Hughes: I suppose that I should congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his restraint in reading only a few of the letters.

One general criticism is that the hon. Gentleman has got himself into the position of believing that he was the only one warning about these things at the time and that his warnings should have been a brake upon action by the allied powers. If we allowed the possibility of environmental pollution and destruction to be the paramount argument against military action, there would never be such action. So whatever Saddam Hussein decided he would do—whatever countries he decided that he wanted to invade, whatever control of the area's oil supply and economy, or of the world's economy, he wanted to take for himself—we should take no military action to stop him because of the possibility or likelihood of environmental damage. That is not a view that I can share.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Does my hon. Friend agree that those who drew attention to what Saddam Hussein threatened and then said that we should not take military action to deal with him were, in effect, arguing that we should give in to blackmail? Saddam Hussein was proving that he was a psychopathic, evil and blackmailing character. If we had said that we would give way to him, it would have encouraged him to make even worse threats later and to invade other countries. It was right that we should put an end to a particularly evil man's attempts to blackmail civilisation.

Mr. Hughes: I genuinely respect the sincerity and consistency of the hon. Member for Linlithgow on these matters. I have tried to express my criticism in only one context in as mild a way as I can. I have other things to say about some of his hon. Friends.

Mr. Dalyell: I thank the hon. Gentleman for allowing me to intervene on a matter of fact. The warnings did not appear in my own name. I was careful to go on and on asking whether there had been some response to the King of Jordan's figures, which came from Dr. Abdullah Toucan. They were produced not on the basis of work carried out at the Amman Scientific institute, although I believe that that institute is a serious place, but at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. It was the MIT's findings that I thought deserved a response.

Mr. Hughes: I accept that. I recall the hon. Gentleman advancing that argument. One of the problems with the King of Jordan was that he caused himself to be boxed in to a position in which anything that he said was liable to be sidelined. I am not sure whether it was prudent or logical in the early days of the war for us to sideline King Hussein in the way that both the British Government and the Government of the United States did. The King of Jordan was making claims in many areas that were either irresponsible or unfounded and, therefore, that which he said that had some foundation was liable to be treated in the same way as those claims.

We have not yet explored the issue of war crimes. When we talk about war crimes, we talk normally about the use of unconventional weapons, grave breaches of the Geneva convention, wilful killing, torture or inhuman treatment, including biological experiments, or wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health. In those areas of grave breaches that are set out in the four Geneva conventions of 1949 there is reference to "extensive destruction and appropriation of property not justified by military necessity and carried out unlawfully and wantonly."

There is reference also to

"plunder of public or private property and wanton destruction of cities, towns and villages, or devastation not justified by military necessity."

Part of the war crimes for which Saddam Hussein was responsible was the destruction of the environment. Britain has not committed war crimes, but anyone who listened to some of the speeches of Labour Members who supported the hon. Member for Linlithgow would have thought that the allies, and especially the British Government, had committed such crimes. The war crimes were carried out deliberately by Saddam Hussein. One of the greatest and perhaps most enduring of those war crimes has been the destruction of the environment described today by the hon. Member for Linlithgow. We must not forget what Saddam Hussein has done.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow made the only speech from the Opposition Benches for which I have any time. The speeches of other Labour Members were contemptible. They tried to blame the destruction of the environment and loss of life on the coalition forces. I cannot accept that. To be fair, such a view would not be accepted on the Labour Front Bench.

Mr. Harry Barnes: The hon. Gentleman misunderstands what some of us have beeen arguing. Perhaps I can draw an analogy in the form of a madman or mad organisation conducting a hijack. We have to decide how to respond to the situation. Do we send in troops with hand grenades, or do we try to engage in a much more sophisticated response in an attempt to release the hostages? That is the difference between us in relation to the response. There was no support for the madman engaged in the activities that we have heard described today. He is an evil, totalitarian madman. What did we expect him to do when we responded as we did?

Mr. Hughes: That is not a good analogy. Other methods to stop what eventually happened were pursued. We tried sanctions and appeals to Saddam Hussein. Right hon. and hon. Members went to Bahdad to persuade Saddam Hussein to withdraw. I had the honour to be Parliamentary Private Secretary to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) at the time and I know how hard he tried to persuade Saddam Hussein not to do what he did.

In the end, those methods did not work. Virtually the whole world, like both sides of this House, concluded that the only way to bring the matter to an end was through military force. To place any of the blame for what happened on the coalition countries that were carrying out the United Nations wishes is wrong. Before the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-West (Mr. Barnes) talks about the United Nations again, I wish that he would read the articles in the charter. He would then understand that what was done in the name of the United Nations was entirely proper.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my hon. Friend agree that the events that have unfolded in Kuwait since the successful liberation of that country, the sights that we have seen and the reports of the horrors that took place during the Iraqi invasion and occupation, show that, if anything, it was not a question of our not being patient enough with Saddam Hussein? Rather, we were too patient. We gave him too long and he was able to do worse things than he could have done if we had acted earlier.

Mr. Hughes: I was about to make that point, and it was put very well by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall). Had we delayed, more people would have been killed.

It is all very well to talk about the destruction of Baghdad and Basra and the effect on the Iraqi people. However, such comments should be coupled with reference to the enormous destruction in Kuwait, the effect on Kuwaiti people and the likely effect of further outrages on Kuwaiti people had the Iraqis been allowed to remain.

I want to consider the environmental consequences of what has happened. I want first to consider the oil. The Kuwait Oil Company's damage assessment shows that approximately 950 wells have been sabotaged, of which 550 are burning. The damage has been severe enough to destroy safety and flow limiting devices, and in some cases to allow the oil to flow around the casing, increasing it further still. The KOC estimates that between 5 million and 6 million barrels a day are burning.

In addition, oil refineries and storage facilities have been sabotaged, and that could mean the loss of up to 15 million barrels. The big question this raises is for how long the fires will burn. The fires at the oil refineries and storage facilities are mostly out, so the environmental threat comes mostly from the burning wells. Earlier estimates of the time taken to extinguish fires in those wells ranged from a few months to a year. Many regard that as optimistic because of the logistics involved in putting them out, especially the use of large quantities of water. If I were being generous, I would say that that is the one point on which I agreed with the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn). The estimate is that the fires will take between three and five years to put out. To be any more certain than that would be difficult.

The environmental impact of the fires depends on the behaviour of the smoke. If the smoke stays at a low altitude, it will fall out or be washed out locally or regionally. If the smoke reaches an altitude of 10 km or more, it will remain in the atmosphere for much longer. That could have more widespread effects on the climate. Calculations have been made that smoke from individual oil well fires will rise only 1 km or so, although any large fires at refineries could result in smoke that rises much higher. Therefore, it is a little early to know what the long-term environmental impact of that will be.

Our Meteorological Office has been looking in some detail at the global effects of these fires. Carbon dioxide emissions could add about 3 per cent. to the global emissions from other activities in the first year and 1 per cent. in the second. The ozone layer is unlikely to be affected, provided that the majority view that the gases capable of destroying ozone are unlikely to reach the stratosphere in significant quantities is correct.

Earlier analyses examined the possibility that smoke could trigger the climate effects forecast in the nuclear winter, including failure of the Asian monsoon. This is an interesting analogy because of the many predictions made about the Asian monsoon, what has actually happened, and the detailed modelling that has been done. The work done by the Meteorological Office and others claims that the effect on the monsoon would be negligible, and probably much less than the year-to-year variability. Therefore, whatever might happen to the monsoon, that may have nothing to do with the oil fires, or their effect on the monsoon may be relatively small and not one that could be put down simply to that cause.

I shall deal now with sanctions, which have a bearing on the situation on the people inside Iraq. There has been much talk about sanctions on both sides of the House. One point has either not been appreciated or has not been fully explained. It is that sanctions have not at any time, and do not now, prohibit medicines from being taken into Iraq. If children have been denied medicines, it is entirely because the Iraqi Government refuse to allow them to come in. That has to be understood and appreciated.

Mr. Harry Barnes: The hon. Gentleman is wrong about sanctions on foodstuffs and medical supplies. The resolutions state that in certain circumstances, when there are serious problems in providing foodstuffs and medical supplies, action can be taken to supply them. A host of sanctions on air and sea movement obviously affect the ability of people to send foodstuffs and medical supplies to Iraq. Special action must be taken to supply those goods.

Mr. Hughes: If the Iraqi Government had made it clear to the Red Cross that they needed medical supplies, they could have been taken in, and could still be taken in, despite sanctions. At any stage, essential medical supplies could have been taken to Iraq. The fact that the Iraqi people have been denied them is entirely down to the Iraqi Government, and that should not be forgotten.

One of the friends of the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East who consistently voted with the hon. Gentleman against the Gulf war suggested on a platform that we shared that we were too soft and that we should not have allowed medical supplies or foodstuffs to go to Iraq. There are different views on this matter.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Galloway) spoke about the Palestinians, and some tributes have been paid to his speech. I do not join them. As usual, the hon. Gentleman spoke as though he were the only person who had ever had any experience of visiting Palestinian refugee camps. He implied that the problems of the Palestinians were caused by the war. That is a new twist on the old chestnut that the Palestinians' problems were caused by the Israelis. That historical and factual nonsense must be put down at once.

I visited one Palestinian refugee camp outside Tripoli in Lebanon three times within a week. On the second occasion, the camp was controlled by a different Palestinian faction from the one that controlled it the other times—there had been enormous battles between my visits. On each occasion, bodies lay around and enormous suffering was experienced by the people. Palestinians were causing immense suffering to fellow Palestinians. The suffering of the Palestinians and the fact that their problems have not been solved cannot again be laid at the door of the coalition or Israel; they must be laid at the door of the Arab people in general and the so-called Palestinian leadership.

If the Arab countries around Israel wanted seriously to do something about the appalling living conditions and suffering of the Palestinian people, they would read resolution 242, recognise Israel's borders and give guarantees about their security and ensure that they gave space, help and housing to the Palestinian refugees, even if only temporarily. None of those things has happened. To bring the Palestinians into the debate as the hon. Member for Hillhead did is to do no justice to their cause and is to hide behind the facts.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my hon. Friend agree that one consequence of the invasion of Kuwait was that many thousands of Palestinians lost their jobs? Does he agree that many thousands of Palestinians had to leave Kuwait quickly because of the invasion? Does my hon. Friend remember meeting the mayor of Bethlehem, who said that 5,000 Palestinians from Bethlehem who had been working in Kuwait could no longer do so and that those who had been sending remittancee from Kuwait to Bethlehem suddenly found that, because of the equalisation of the Iraqi and the Kuwaiti dinar, their bank accounts were worthless and those remittances stopped? The Palestinian people were one of the main victims of the invasion of Kuwait and the folly of the Palestine Liberation Organisation in supporting Saddam Hussein has made peace in the middle east much more difficult.

Mr. Hughes: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. He and I and some Opposition Members met the mayor of Bethlehem who expressed those worries. He said that he had a hospital paid for by the Kuwaitis. It was not yet finished, but in the parts that were open the doctors and nurses had been paid for by the Kuwaitis. He wondered who would fund the hospital now. The way in which the Palestinian people—and especially their leadership—welcomed the invasion of Kuwait and cheered when Scud missiles were launched against defenceless Israeli people has put back their cause. The Palestinian issue may be tangential to the debate, but as it has been introduced, it must be recognised that the person who has done most harm to the Palestinian cause is Saddam Hussein. He must bear a terrible responsibility for that.

The hon. Members for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), and for Derbyshire, North-East and others said that the Government have done too little. They said that the Government should have acted sooner and that people should have been sent to the Gulf to solve the environmental problems. However, there was a war on, and anyone who has been in an area where bullets, grenades and missiles are flying about knows that it is not easy to do one's job in such circumstances. It would have been impossible for the Government to act sooner. They were the first to give money to the International Maritime Organisation and have taken the problems seriously, which should be welcomed.

Mr. Dalyell: That is an extremely important point. Before anybody can start tackling the oil fires, something must be done about mines and booby traps.

Mr. Hughes: That is a fair point. The criticism was not made by the hon. Gentleman, who has been fair. Anyone who quotes from a Conservative research department document must be making a fair speech.

Mr. Harry Barnes: Well, I did then.

Mr. Hughes: There are exceptions to everything.

The Government should be congratulated on the speed and nature of their response and on the way in which expert help has been offered, not to take over, but to give aid to the people trying to tackle the problems. I congratulate the Government on what they have done. I shall finish where I started—by congratulating the hon. Member for Linlithgow on bringing these matters to our attention once again, and on giving us such a detailed insight into his knowledge. That has been valuable for the House, for the nation and for the region in question.

Mrs. Ann Taylor (Dewsbury): I agree with the last comment made by the hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes). We should all congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) on what he described as his good fortune in having secured this debate. The hon. Member for Harrow, West said that it was possibly black magic. If my hon. Friend had not won the ballot for the debate, I am sure that his ingenuity, which knows no bounds, would have enabled him to find another suitable occasion to raise these issues at length. As you know, Madam Deputy Speaker, his persistence is well known and well respected by many hon. Members, as the debate has proved.

I also congratulate my hon. Friend on his campaign to raise awareness of the difficulties and problems that have arisen as a result of the conflict in the Gulf. He said that he was not the only person to give warnings and advice about what might happen. I must say, however, that his extremely high profile on this issue has meant that a great deal of attention has been paid to the problems. We are grateful to him for choosing this subject for debate and for the information he has given to the House on other occasions.

We have had some interesting speeches from both sides of the House. I agreed with much of the measured and sensitive speech of the hon. Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer) who outlined the difficulties that have arisen. I also agreed with much of the speech of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). The speeches from other hon. Members have ranged somewhat wider than the narrow confines of the motion tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow. Although those hon. Members raised genuine concerns and issues relevant to the wider context, I want to keep my remarks to the issues raised by my hon. Friend.

There is no doubt that the ecological consequences of the Gulf war have been extremely serious. As with any environmental incident, the impact and consequences of what has happened in the Gulf will be felt for many years to come. In some respects some of the damage caused may never be reversed—damage to the local environment, certain species of wildlife and the potential damage to the health of many individuals and, possibly, future generations.

Today there has been some discussion of the scale of that damage and the problems that we face. Given the different types of damage, its total scale is unknown, but it is clear that it is enormous. In some respects it is difficult to comprehend fully the enormity of the problems that we now face. Experts and laymen alike are extremely worried about what has already happened and what will happen in the next months and years.

Several different types of damage have been caused, but I first want to discuss the oil slicks and the difficulties that have arisen since the end of January. We were all shocked, although some people may not have been surprised, at the deliberate release of oil from the Sea island oil terminal and the subsequent releases from elsewhere. At the time it was suggested that that slick might be due to the military activities of the allied forces. The scale of that original oil slick made that unlikely, however, and shortly after we had the statement from the Secretary of State for the Environment on 28 January, Saddam Hussein acknowledged that he had deliberately released oil into the Gulf.

The consequences of that slick have been severe and they have brought home to many people the horror and potential for environmental damage posed by such pollution. We have seen horrific sights in the past, for example, that caused by Exxon Valdez and other tankers. The consequences resulting from those slicks, however, have been far outweighed by the disaster that has hit the Gulf as a result of the deliberate release of oil in January.

We are aware from reports in yesterday's newspapers that the Exxon corporation has agreed to pay $900 million, about £500 million, to complete the clean-up in Alaska. That gives us some idea of the magnitude of the task that we shall face in the Gulf. We should not forget that the problems relating to the Gulf oil spillage are far worse than those encountered in Alsaka, because of the nature of the Gulf. The sea in that region is shallow—110ft on average—and it lies in an enclosed area. Although the coast of Alaska was devastated, at least the sea cleaned the shore every few days. It takes 200 years for the Gulf waters to be renewed, which shows just how serious the problems are and will remain for a long time to come.

Many species and habitats have been threatened by the consequences of the oil slick. The most endangered habitats are the sea grass beds, which cover 46 per cent. of the seabed in the shallow coastal waters and are home to a rich variety of marine vertebrates and invertebrates. They are nursery grounds for commercial shrimps and fish, which provide an important livelihood for local people and much of their available food.

The oil slick has endangered species and hit the food and employment potential of people in the region, as well as the oil industry and other local industry. Some people would say that the only other viable industry in the region, apart from oil, is the fishing industry.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow said, coral reef habitats have also been affected. They, too, are extremely valuable—especially to the fishing industry—and vulnerable, not least because the Gulf is the northern extremity of their range. Therefore, they can be easily damaged but will not recover easily from that damage. My hon. Friend and other hon. Members mentioned bird and marine life and the difficulties experienced by some species of cormorant. The impact on some mammals has, thankfully, been relatively light—there was a report of one dolphin and two green turtles being lost, so casualties at this stage are not thought to be fantastically high.

On the other hand, bird mortalities are significant. They are estimated at between 10,000 and 20,000. In recent days, many migratory species have been found oiled. They are early spring migrants, and as the migration increases so does their prospect of even greater damage.

Clearly, the west possesses significant expertise in dealing with such problems. Unfortunately, there have been many instances of oil slicks causing damage and we have had to learn quickly and take good advice about what action to take. I am sorry to say that the most recent report that I have seen on the oil slick in the Gulf from a group of experts from the World Conservation Monitoring Centre, made up of the World Conservation Unit, the United Nations Environmental Programme and the World Wide Fund for Nature. The centre has been providing significant briefings in the past few weeks on current events in the Gulf. Its most recent report, issued on 12 March, says:

> "Very little co-ordinated clean up is being done.
> Some 40 specialist companies are touting for clean-up work, but lack of available funds means that very little is actually happening".

When such a report is issued this week from people in the area, it is extremely worrying. I hope that the Minister will deal with that report and give us an update of events. More urgent action is needed because we have been discussing the problem for about six weeks and those in the Gulf still say that there is a lack of co-ordination and unified effort, so clearly, everything possible is not yet being done. May we have an update on the protection of the desalination plants, which are critical to the people in the region? There is scope for protecting the plants with booms, but the dangers that would arise were oil to enter the water treatment plants would be severe and the impact would last for many years. It is important to mention what has been happening in the Gulf, not just in the past few weeks, but over recent years. It is right that we should be desperately concerned about the impact of the present oil slicks caused by the conflict in the Gulf over recent weeks. But we should not ignore the significant long-term damage caused in the region even before the Gulf war started. From reports that I have seen, it is clear that much damage was being done to the environment by many of those involved in the oil industry in that region.

Pollution in the Gulf did not start in January 1991, but has been going on for many years due to leakages from oil terminals, tankers being washed out in the Gulf and a generally casual attitude by many of those responsible for the oil industry. If there is one other lesson to be learnt from the oil slick, it may be that the whole of the oil industry must be more cautious, careful and strict in its general attitude.

Mr. Lewis Stevens (Nuneaton): Does the hon. Lady agree that not just the oil industry, but some of the Governments in the Gulf should take responsibility for what has happened over recent years?

Mrs. Taylor: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. It is unfortunate that it has taken an incident of this sort and of such severity to bring home to people in the region, as well as outside it, the significant dangers of such a casual attitude towards pollution. Perhaps now, people in other districts will learn from this lesson before a crisis arises near them. If so, some good may come for other regions and lessons may be learnt.

Another problem that has been devastating the region, particularly Kuwait, in the past few weeks has been that of oil fires. That deliberate act by Saddam Hussein has created senseless damage. It was a vindictive act because it gave Saddam Hussein no military advantage during the conflict. The immediate impact on the people of Kuwait of setting fire to oil has been seen by all of us on our television screens, where there have been pictures of daylight scenes, with cars needing to have their headlights on full in the near darkness.

Estimates of the damage done by oil wells being deliberately set alight and the oil being ignited, and the amount of smoke generated, vary considerably. However, whatever estimates we make, none of the news is good. The estimates vary only in terms of just how desperate the position will be and how long it will remain a critical problem. From information that I have it seems that about 950 wells have been sabotaged, of which 550 are thought to be burning at present. The Kuwait Petroleum Company estimates that between 5 million and 6 million barrels per day of oil are burning at present. That estimate exceeds most of the worst case scenarios given before the incident took place. How long the fires will last is equally uncertain.

We have heard again about the problems of booby traps and the difficulties of getting equipment to the scene. In recent days we have been told that some fires were started and mines detonated in ways that were not predicted at earlier times in the crisis. In other words, those concerned are learning day by day about new developments and problems that must be taken on board.

It is estimated that those problems will be with Kuwait—and, I would add, with the whole of the world's environment—for between one and three years. Clearly, there is a global impact. Carbon dioxide emissions, I am told, could increase by 3 per cent. on a global basis in the first year and by 1 per cent. on the same basis in the second year.

It seems unlikely that the ozone layer will be affected, but significant climatic changes are taking place in the region. Black rain has been experienced in Kuwait, Iran, Iraq, and even in Turkey, over 600 miles away. We are learning of reductions in daytime temperatures and of increased rainfall acidity, which is now four times the normal rate. That makes the rates about as bad as those in the worst parts of Europe. We must not lose sight of the fact that certain parts of the world are living with these problems daily.

The combination of factors raises questions about the health of the people in the area, particularly in Kuwait, where families must fear for the long-term welfare of their children. That particularly applies to those susceptible to respiratory diseases, although it is known that some pollutants resulting from burning oil can be carcinogenic.

The third part of the motion deals with the health crisis that is being observed in Kuwait and Iraq. Conservative Members have mentioned that aspect during the debate, but have not gone into the detail of it. Indeed, the Secretary of State for the Environment, when speaking in Nottingham last night, mentioned oil slicks and burning oil wells, but did not deal with the problems facing the innocent civilian populations of Kuwait and Iraq.

Damage has been caused to water supplies and the sewerage infrastructure of both countries. There are problems from the contamination of fisheries and the possible long-term impact on agriculture. There is also the danger of sulphur from acid rain entering the food chain. The situation is critical and continued fighting in parts of Iraq is making the problem worse. Innocent civilians in both countries are suffering and are likely to suffer for a long time to come.

Agencies, such as the joint mission of the WHO and UNICEF which visited the area in recent days, have confirmed fears about immediate and potentially severe risks resulting from problems including water-related epidemics. The International Committee of the Red Cross and Oxfam have been active in attempting to repair water treatment systems and provide emergency supplies of chlorine for disinfecting water supplies.

I hope that, internationally, the Government are doing more to co-operate with the efforts of the various agencies. That must be the way forward if we are to bring immediate relief to the people of Kuwait and the innocent civilians of Iraq.

The World Health Organisation/UNICEF report states that there are many problems, including—I hope that the Minister will address this one particularly—the fact that

"The chemical plants which used to supply the main treatment elements, aluminium sulphate . . . and chlorine, have been destroyed by bombing".

That means that there is a basic incapacity to purify the water in the area, and that means that the problems will continue for some time. In many areas of Iraq, the water supply is extremely and seriously restricted. There is clearly an urgent need in both Kuwait and Iraq for water supply treatment chemicals, spare parts of the distribution network, and pumping stations and treatment facilities.

Will the Minister clarify the position on sanctions on those items? If we are saying that medical supplies should be allowed through because of the needs of innocent civilians, we must also address the question of the essential but otherwise harmless chemicals that are so clearly required to prevent epidemics spreading in the area.

I hope that the Minister will be able to tell us that he has had discussions with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and that the Government will do their utmost and maximise everyone's efforts to ensure that all the agencies involved are given the fullest possible help when combating the real, serious and life-threatening dangers that now exist for the people of the Gulf.

It is difficult to see how anything constructive or beneficial could come out of the Gulf conflict, but certain ideas that have been mentioned could be utilised to minimise the danger of such problems occurring in the future. There have been discussions of late about whether the Geneva convention should be strengthened to provide greater protection for the environment. Article 55 of the convention deals with the protection of the natural environment. However, in view of all that has happened in recent weeks, I believe that it is right to look at that article again to see whether that protection needs updating. I hope that the Minister will convey that message to his right hon. and hon. Friends.

We now need to direct our efforts towards the environmental construction of the whole of the Gulf area. We must use the knowledge, monitoring procedures and expertise of the west to ensure that everything possible is done to reconstruct the Gulf area environmentally and to protect that part of the environment and the eco-system that is so far surviving all the devastation that has taken place there. Western countries, including our own, should be taking a lead. We need integrated environmental monitoring. We need a new approach to the problem of water management in the Gulf area, as was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn). The Tigris and the Euphrates are being over-abstracted. The potential for conflict will arise again if we do not have better management of such resources, which should be agreed internationally.

If we are to talk about planning the peace and about building more stability into the region, we must ensure that we tackle the problems of the area, such as water management, and seek some co-operation over the development of Gulf fisheries. We must also tackle the problems of irrigation, agriculture and of resources generally.

Mr. Dalyell: My hon. Friend has given much of her parliamentary time to water-related issues. May I emphasise once again that this is a hydraulic civilisation and quote the phrase of Senor Rojo, which was quoted by John Pilger? Water-borne diseases could be the silent assassin.

Mrs. Taylor: I agree with my hon. Friend. His point has already been made clear in reports from people in the Gulf. Water-borne diseases are already increasing. The incidence of water-borne diseases such as diarrhoea is four or five times what would normally be expected. There is a real danger of epidemics sweeping through parts of that area.

If we can do anything to prevent that, we should do it on humanitarian grounds through international agencies such as the World Health Organisation and the Red Cross, which have a positive role to play. I hope that the Minister will tell us that he and the Government will support the efforts of those international agencies. If there is to be lasting peace in the area, we must take all those factors into consideration. If we are to protect the environment in that area in future, we must build on that peace or not only the people but the environment in that area will be threatened even further.

1.25 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Tony Baldry): The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has done us a service by using his good fortune in winning the ballot to introduce a serious debate on the ecological consequences of the Gulf war. In the past few weeks we have witnessed an unprecedented sequence of environmental catastrophies as a consequence of the illegal occupation of Kuwait and the actions of Saddam Hussein. Let us be clear that the cause of the environmental disasters that we are concerned about have arisen from deliberate and culpable actions by Saddam Hussein to violate the environment. No one ever underestimated the risk of serious environmental terrorism by Saddam Hussein, and the fact that Saddam Hussein was capable of such environmental terrorism underlines how important it was to free Kuwait from his grasp.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher), the former Prime Minister, said:

"if a tyrant is never to be fought in order that freedom and justice may be restored, tyranny will triumph with all its brutality and the environment of human rights, which we seek to extend, will have received a fatal blow."—[Official Report, 13 November 1990; Vol. 180, c. 446.]

On 21 January, the House debated and voted on the motion that hon. Members should express their

"full support for British forces in the Gulf and their contribution to the implementation of United Nations resolutions by the multinational forces, as authorised by United Nations Security Council Resolution 678."—[Official Report, 21 January 1991; vol. 184, c. 24.]

The House divided and voted: 563 hon. Members supported the action of British forces in the Gulf, and 34 were against. All Back-Bench Labour Members who have spoken today were among the 34 who voted against British action in support of the United Nations in the Gulf. It may be appropriate to recall the observations of the Leader of the Opposition in that debate. He said:

"there can be absolutely no doubt about the legitimacy of the military action against the Iraqi dictator.

Our forces are now engaged in fighting for the lawful purposes set out in the resolutions of the United Nations Security Council."

Mrs. Ann Taylor: The Minister quotes my right hon. Friend perfectly accurately, and we all stand by what my right hon. Friend said. However, I hope that the Minister will not be churlish in denigrating some of my hon. Friends' comments because some of them took a different attitude to the conduct of the war. Many of them made constructive and informed comments about the environment, about which they have every right to be concerned, regardless of their attitude to the war.

Mr. Baldry: I have no intention of being churlish. I intend to put on the record that every Labour Member who has spoken today was among the 34 who voted against the British action in the Gulf. It is right also to remind the House of the stand that the hon. Lady and the Leader of the Opposition took.

Sir Anthony Meyer: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Baldry: In a moment.

The Leader of the Opposition said:

"We consider the fulfilment of those resolutions to be critical to the future authority of the United Nations, and British forces—along with others in the coalition—are being used for the precise purpose of maintaining international law and sustaining the authority of the United Nations . . . it must be said that, by withdrawing from Kuwait, Saddam could have prevented any possibility of war. Even now, he can stop the war immediately by withdrawing from Kuwait and laying down his arms. Whatever else may be said or thought about the Iraqi dictator, some things are obvious: he wilfully refused to follow a course that guaranteed no war; he does not as yet want peace, and he will not as yet allow peace."—[Official Report, 21 January 1991; Vol. 184, c. 31-33.]

I do not want there to be a shadow of a scintilla of a suggestion that anything that has happened in the Gulf has happened other than as a consequence of the actions of Saddam Hussein.

Today we have had some thoughtful and informed speeches. I hope that in my comments I can respond fully to the questions and concerns raised. My hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson) rightly castigated Saddam Hussein for what she described as unleashing this environmental catastrophy. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) asked for a co-ordinated and urgent international response. I can assure him that at all times our response has been prompt and positive and that it will continue to be so. We shall at all times seek to promote the best possible co-ordinated international response.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) rightly drew attention to the leading role that Britain has been taking in responding to requests from international agencies, such as the International Maritime Organisation. My hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) sensibly observed that the two main challenges are the consequences of the oil slick and the consequences of the smoke plume over the Gulf region. My hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) underlined the scale of the challenge of the burning oil wells.

The first manifestation of Saddam Hussein's environmental terrorism was in the disastrous series of oil spills, of which the largest took place at Mina al-Ahmadi and was first identified on 24 January. There have been at least three major spills in the Gulf war.

The oil spills have been assessed at about 300,000 tonnes—somewhat less than the original estimate, but still the largest marine spills ever recorded and nearly 10 times the size of the Exxon Valdez spill of 38,000 tonnes. By reference to the costs of clearing up the Exxon Valdez spill, the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) made a telling point about the possible long-term costs of the spills. The oil has been carried by wind and tide south along the coast of Saudi Arabia, with considerable quantities coming ashore along the 200 km coastline between Khafji and the island of Abu Ali. Although some oil has evaporated, considerable quantities remain afloat and were recently estimated at 50,000 tonnes. Easterly winds have helped to pen this oil in the large bay to the west of Abu Ali, but changes in weather could bring it offshore with the potential to damage large areas to the south, including Bahrain and Qatar. I spoke this week to the co-ordination centre of the International Maritime Organisation and my latest information is that there is unlikely to be much movement of this oil in the next few days.

Smaller quantities of oil have been observed further offshore, probably from Mina al Bakr, and they are mostly patches of light oil or sheen with an estimated 2,000 tonnes remaining afloat. Meanwhile, damage in the war zone is generating several small continuing oil spills in the northern head of the Gulf, whose combined total has been estimated at 100 tonnes per day.

The impact on wildlife and ecological resources in the coastline affected has been extensive, affecting mangroves, seagrass beds and seabirds. On one 8 km stretch of coast it is reported that of 1,500 birds counted, some 80 per cent. were oiled. The shallow seas and seagrass beds of the western gulf are particularly important for biological productivity as nursery grounds for fish and shrimps. It is this area, which has been badly hit by the oil slick, that is particularly vulnerable to damage due to its shallow water and slow circulation. But the Gulf as a whole is particularly vulnerable ecologically due to such features as its semi-enclosed nature, in which the renewal of its waters from the open sea takes two and a half years.

We cannot know for certain how serious the long-term effects of the damage are likely to be until much more detailed assessments have been carried out, but it is already clear that major damage has been caused. Shortly after the slick occurred we were able to send to the Gulf states an assessment of the possible biological effects of the oil spill carried out by the Plymouth marine laboratory of the Natural Environment Research Council and this has proved very useful in monitoring the subsequent effects. I also pay tribute here to the work of the world conservation monitoring centre in Cambridge, whose regular assessments of the ecological resources of the Gulf states and how these disasters are likely to affect them have been of enormous value to all who are closely concerned with these issues.

The initial response action on oil pollution by the Gulf states has focused primarily on defending key industrial sites and desalination plants where blocking of water intakes would have serious consequences for drinking water, industry and many other activities. Some of this work has been carried out by the Saudi oil company, Aramco, while the protection of other areas, including ecological sites, has been tackled by the Saudi Meteorological and Environment Protection Agency. In addition to the oil-spill resources already available locally, Saudi Arabi was able to draw on the worldwide industry stockpile at Southampton, while a number of countries donated equipment such as defensive booms. However, that equipment has been more than fully deployed in protecting key sites such as desalination plants. Last week I saw some of the work that has been carried out to protect those plants using booms and other methods, and so far those measures appear to be effective. Meanwhile, the Saudi authorities have constructed barriers and trenches——

Mrs. Ann Taylor: I am glad to hear that the booms are proving effective. Can the Minister give us an update on the monitoring of water supplies? I understand that some of the water treatment and desalination plants may not be equipped with facilities to monitor some of the dangers that could arise from oil pollution. Has he further information on that, or is he confident that the booms will prevent such problems?

Mr. Baldry: We have been responding positively to any request made to us by the Saudi Government, the Government of Bahrain or any other Government in the Gulf region, and we shall continue to do so. When I was in the region last weekend and speaking to Ministers and others, they seemed reasonably confident that the booms and protective measures for desalination plants would be effective. As I have made clear, much of the equipment has been deployed in protecting those key sites. If requests are made to us for monitoring equipment, we shall deal positively with them, as we have reacted to other requests that we have received from the area for equipment and expertise.

While the barriers and trenches have started to be constructed to deflect and contain oil—in a few locations recovery operations have begun—it is clear that there is an urgent need for large-scale recovery operations to begin if further damage is to be avoided in other ecologically sensitive areas. Although there are important practical problems to be overcome, such as hazards from mines and other war debris, it is clear that additional resources are and will be needed to deal effectively with a continuing threat, not least as oil is continuing to leak into the northern Gulf. This is where the international community must help.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow asked a specific question about the condition of Kuwait's coral islands. We are aware of Dr. Downing's representation. We were glad to have his assessment, and we have passed on his advice on protective measures to authorities in the Gulf. We are happy also to pass on to the Kuwaiti Government Dr. Downing's proposals for assessment. It is clear that a great deal of work must be carried out in assessing the ecological damage to the area. We are keen to see how British science can help. We need to bear in mind, however, that in this, as in everything, the Gulf states must be in the lead in responding to the problems. We need to take into account their assessment of needs and priorities in offering United Kingdom science expertise. None the less, we shall be making it clear to all the Gulf states that are affected what we can offer. Our approach throughout has been to seek to be prompt, positive and practical.

The primary responsibility for action rests with the Gulf states that are directly affected, but we have made it clear throughout that we shall react promptly to any request for assistance that we receive. We shall react positively, whether it be requests for financial aid, equipment or expertise. After the first major spill was reported, we immediately organised a military airlift of oil pollution response equipment from Southampton. We sent out experts from the marine pollution control unit, which deals with oil spills in our own waters. We commissioned science assessments for Gulf states on the biological effects of slicks on the modelling of slick movements, which were carried out by the Natural Environment Research Council. We assisted an RSPCA team to train local volunteers in the cleaning of oiled birds in Saudi Arabia, Bahrain and Qatar. Since that first phase, it has become clear that more needs to be done.

Last week, as I have told the House, I visited Bahrain in response to a request from the Government of Bahrain for assistance with pollution control equipment, and to see for myself the progress of counter-pollution operations. I presented to the Bahrain Government from the United Kingdom the first of a consignment of six oil recovery skimmers at a total cost of £300,000. Although the oil slick still has a potential to reach and damage Bahrain, the Government there made it clear to me that they would hope to use that equipment in the meantime further north to assist the Saudi counter-pollution operations. The Government of Bahrain are very appreciative of the actions taken by Her Majesty's Government. They recognise that there are environmental challenges that will require regional co-ordination and an international response.

It is increasingly clear that an effective response to those crises requires a global international response co-ordinated by the international agencies. The first task is to extend and intensify oil recovery and clean-up operations. For that purpose, Britain was the first nation to make a donation to the special fund established by the International Maritime Organisation to assist the Gulf states' counter-pollution operations and to act quickly where the need was greatest. The secretary general of the IMO is very grateful for the positive lead that the United Kingdom has taken in that matter. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has written to colleagues in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development to enlist and encourage their support for the IMO initiative.

The hon. Member for Dewsbury referred to a lack of co-ordination and funds in the clean-up operation. That is precisely why we are supporting the IMO. It is clearly the responsibility of lead international United Nations organisations to co-ordinate such activities and that is why we were the first nation to provide funds for the special fund set up specifically to assist that purpose. We want to ensure that the IMO has adequate resources for the clean-up operations that it must undertake. We hope that other countries will follow our lead.

It may be useful at this point if I briefly summarise for hon. Members what the international organisations are doing and how we are supporting their efforts. The International Maritime Organisation is the specialised agency of the United Nations concerned with shipping and oil pollution at sea. After the first spill, the IMO was asked by the Gulf states to co-ordinate offers of assistance from Governments of equipment and expertise. It has had a team of experts from member states co-ordinating information here in its London headquarters and in the Gulf and, in the light of their reports, it launched its special fund, to which I have already referred, on 5 March.

Another United Nations organisation, the United Nations Environmental Programme, which has the principal responsibility for co-ordinating the response to the consequences of the conflict, has subsequently given expert assistance to the regional forum of the Gulf states which met on 27 February in Bahrain—the regional organisation for protection of the marine environment. This week at the informal Environment Ministers' conference in Nairobi, my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Countryside has called for UNEP to be recognised as the international body best able to co-ordinate the international effort on environmental emergencies. He called on UNEP to maintain standing registers of environment science and international expertise for disaster response and for member states to assist with that by developing and keeping up to date their own registers.

The European Community has also contributed to the teams of experts advising the Gulf states, including a coastal ecologist from the United Kingdom's oil pollution research centre. In the Gulf, the Community has liaised between member states, and I believe that it can continue to play a valuable part in co-ordinating the scientific assistance that we might offer. One example would be to build on the work of the EC team already in the Gulf which has prepared a plan for detailed assessment of the ecological damage to coastal habitats caused by the oil slick.

I want now to consider the problems generated by the burning of Kuwaiti oil wells and the smoke plume. Here again, we are dealing with an appalling act of economic and environmental sabotage. Several hundred oil well fires —possibly as many as 700—were started, in most cases long after they could have served any conceivable military purpose. That was a dreadful act by Saddam Hussein. Nor was that the work of ignorant men. Those who destroyed the well-heads seem to have known exactly what they were about. In their own perverse terms, they did a very effective job. While we are a very long way yet from certainty, there are indications that the damage, and the quantity of oil being burnt, may be well above even our worst earlier fears. A week ago, standing in Bahrain and looking south, I could see sunny blue skies. Looking north to Kuwait, I could see grey skies, overcast like the skies of an October afternoon.

Estimates of the rate of oil burn, how quickly this might be reduced, and the time that it will take to extinguish the fires must still be highly uncertain. However, we know that the Kuwaiti Petroleum Company believes that the current rate of burn is about 5 million to 6 million barrels a day, compared with our previous worst case assumption of 1·5 million barrels a day. If so, that would be serious news. The impact would be more severe and more widespread even than we had previously feared. On present information, it seems unlikely to be different in its nature. According to the best scientific evidence, there is no reason to think that stratospheric ozone concentrations will be significantly affected.

Throughout all this, we have relied on the best scientific advice available to us, whether that advice be from the Meteorological Office or the World Meteorological Organisation. There has been no suggestion of playing down any environmental consequences of what might have occurred in the Gulf. I make it clear that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State did not dismiss the risk of oil fires. He made available the advice that he had received on the environmental implications of such fires, which has since been followed by the Meterological Office study.

Mr. Dalyell: This is a direct question: was the paper that I went through at some length in my opening speech the paper that Dr. Keith Browing submitted?

Mr. Baldry: I had intended to deal with that point later, but I am glad to tell the hon. Gentleman that it was the paper that Dr. Keith Browning presented. I make it clear that, throughout all this, Ministers and officials within the Department of the Environment want to rely on best science. Ministers and officials do not believe that they are possessors of all the knowledge on this wide area of environmental challenges. For that reason, we always search out the best scientific advice that can be made available to us by the best possible agencies. Sometimes, they will be our own agencies, such as the Meteorological Office, and on other occasions they will be international agencies, frequently United Nations agencies.

The problems caused by burning oil wells are unprecedented. The valuation of the possible effects remains difficult. However, notwithstanding the much-increased estimates of oil burn over the past few days, the best scientific advice is that the plume is thought to be unlikely to have reached the stratosphere in significant amounts, save occasionally as the result of thunderstorms. Most of the smoke will stay within a few kilometres of the atmosphere. When one is flying around the Gulf, one flies above the worst of the smoke plume. Our view remains that we are not facing a serious threat to the global climate.

The Parliamentary Office of Science and Technology has just published a study on oil fires in Kuwait and provided a commentary for hon. Members. It emphasises that the effects are likely to be local. It says:

"The reason that regional climatic impacts are not predicted is that much of the pollution falls out or is washed out of the atmosphere in a relatively short time. It is precisely this behaviour which will seriously affect the local environment. Models predict that the worst fallout will be within 2000 km—i.e. primarily over Kuwait, the Gulf, Iraq, Iran, eastern Turkey, and Saudi Arabia. But irregular fallout could occur as far away as Pakistan and northern India to the east and Greece, the Balkans and northeast Africa (e.g. Ethiopia) to the west. Fallout of soot is already widespread locally, and the large amounts of sulpher (and nitrogen) oxides cause rain to be highly acidic. 'Black rain' has been reported in Iran, Iraq and Kuwait, and given recent weather patterns, 'black' snow in the mountains of Iraq and Iran may have fallen. Smoke has reduced daytime temperatures through shading, but will also reduce nightime cooling through its blanketing effect."

Mr. Dalyell: It is a bit of a distortion of the English language to use the word "local" about effects felt as far away as Turkey, the Balkans, north Africa and Pakistan. Pakistan and the Balkans are not exactly, by any stretch of the English language, local to Kuwait.

Mr. Baldry: I think that the hon. Gentleman misunderstood my point. There has been understandable worry about whether the impact of the smoke plume will have an effect on the global atmosphere and global temperatures. My point is reinforced by the Parliamentary Office of Science and Technology. The best advice that we have to date is that the smoke plume is unlikely to have a global impact, although no one denies that it will have an impact on the region.

Our view remains that we are not facing a serious threat to the global climate. We expect, however, acid rain and photochemical smog episodes, comparable with the worst encountered around major industrial areas, over possibly as much as 2,000 km downwind of the source; "black rain" and "black snow" over a similar distance from the source, leaving layers of soot; and, under the plume, daylight almost obliterated and daytime temperatures reduced by between 10 and 20 deg C possibly up to 100 km from the source. To respond to the point made by the hon. Member for Linlithgow, let me say that those facts speak for themselves. I hope that the hon. Gentleman understands my point.

Immediate impacts of this sort clearly constitute unimaginably grim news for the people of the Gulf and neighbouring areas. There must, too, be real concerns about the health effects, particularly on the old, the very young and those with breathing difficulties, and about damage to crops. Serious long-lasting environmental damage, however, seems rather less likely. The familiar effects of acid rain on sensitive ecosystems in parts of Europe, for example, are the result of cumulative exposure over many years and of geology very different from the norm for the Gulf region. Our hope must be—at this early stage, it can be little more than hope—that the impact of the oil fires, horrifying though it will undoubtedly be, will be relatively short lived. Throughout, we shall always rely on the best scientific advice available to us and act promptly on it.

It was suggested last week in The Sunday Times that the plume from the Gulf oil fires could reach Europe. Satellite photographs clearly reveal the location of the smoke plume, which currently extends over Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and Iran. It is unlikely that the plume could reach Europe, although, with extremely sensitive analytical equipment, some remnants of the fires may be detectable outside the Gulf region.

As to effects on health, as with everything else, our assessment of the potential health impacts of the smoke can be only tentative at present. Clearly the situation has much in common with the notorious London smogs of the 1950s—heavy concentrations of sulphur dioxide and carbon particles—but there are important differences, too. There will be less tar and ash than in the London smogs and the climate is completely different. We should not therefore assume too readily that the toll on health will be comparable.

Mr. Dalyell: Is the Minister monitoring the hydrogen sulphide?

Mr. Baldry: It may be for the convenience of the House if, when I draw near the end of my speech, I turn to the hon. Gentleman and ensure that, as far as possible, I have answered all his questions. Almost everything that the hon. Gentleman has asked me will be dealt with, and it may be more convenient for the House if I tell him what we are going to do.

Traces of polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons are also likely to be present, on the carbon particles. Some of them have carcinogenic properties. Again, however, amounts are likely to be less than in London's old coal-related smogs, and I am advised that any increased risk of cancer should be low. Dioxins are less likely to be involved, as crude oil does not normally contain halogens in any quantity. This, however, still needs to be confirmed on the ground.

Clearly, in periods of heavy smoke pollution, the best thing for people to do is to stay indoors as much as possible. That is particularly important for babies, young children and people with respiratory disorders. Anyone exposed to a serious smoke episode will need careful watching.

There is no obvious cure for the pollution arising from the fires. It follows that the absolute priority must be to tackle the fires. Hon. Members rightly drew attention to the huge and unprecedented scale of the problem, which is seriously complicated by the destruction of so much of the Kuwaiti infrastructure, by the difficulty of getting water to the well-heads, and by the presence of mines and booby-traps. Western Governments are not unaware of these problems. The question is how we may be best able to help.

We must recognise that the Kuwaiti Petroleum Company already has under contract the world's leading international oil well fire-fighting companies, including that of Red Adair. There is no question of the fire-fighting efforts being hampered by failure to bring the best available expertise to bear on the problem and the international community—including the United Kingdom—is determined to bring that expertise to bear. A formidable amount of equipment will no doubt be required. However, the company is still in the process of assessing just what is needed. That is not merely a matter of extinguishing the fires. It is also crucial that the well-head must be adequately controlled to prevent oil from spreading on the ground. When that assessment is complete, it will be easier to see what sorts of help may be most appropriate. Meanwhile, the Offshore Supplies Office of the Department of Energy is already trying hard to ensure that Britain makes the best contribution that it can. The United Kingdom office of Bechtel is expected to have a key role in the first phase of managing the damage assessment, repair and reconstruction.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment will visit the Gulf next month further to assess the environmental effects of the war and the way in which they are being dealt with. He has made it clear that we are anxious to make available to the Gulf states bilaterally or through international organisations—or both—any and all United Kingdom scientific expertise that would be genuinely helpful to them in assessing the current and potential impact of the fires and in devising follow-up action.

I would not, however, claim for a moment either that Britain has a monopoly of wisdom in this area or that the Gulf states do not have highly qualified experts of their own. We shall be anxious rather to identify any particular areas of expertise that the Gulf Goverments feel that they lack, or in which their own experts are overwhelmed by the amount of work to be done.

The Secretary of State, however, announced yesterday three specific offers of help. We will send the Gulf states very shortly the best assessment that we can compile, from United Kingdom knowledge and expertise, of the nature and extent of the plumes, their likely evolution and their possible impact on the environment and on human health. As my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham urged, we shall supply the Gulf states on a regular basis with interpreted satellite data. We shall arrange for a Meteorological Office research aircraft to study the composition and behaviour of the smoke plumes. Information from these flights will be made available to states in the region to help them to evaluate the likely impact of the smoke. If we are asked for any further monitoring or research assistance that we feel we have the expertise to give, I have no doubt that we shall try to respond positively.

In all this we shall rely in particular, although not exclusively, on the outstanding expertise of the Met Office. I was sorry that the hon. Member for Linlithgow criticised the brief assessment of the situation produced by that office, which was placed in the Library on 17 January. Obviously, it was a preliminary report undertaken at a stage when little firm information was to hand. It was, none the less, a useful paper, particularly because it was so concise.

I make it clear to the hon. Member for Linlithgow that the Met Office report—indeed every Met Office report—is its report. There is no suggestion of its being "doctored" in Whitehall. That report, in common with all reports produced by that office, reflects the genuine concerns and uncertainties of Dr. Keith Browning and his colleagues. They consulted widely among the United Kingdom scientific community before they wrote their report. That report may contain some uncertainties, but they reflect the best estimates and the best scientific appraisals of the best scientific brains available to give advice at that time.

The hon. Member for Dewsbury asked about our attitude towards helping the suffering people in Kuwait and Iraq. There is now a United Nations mission in Iraq to assess humanitarian needs. We fully support humanitarian assistance to Iraq channelled through the International Committee of the Red Cross—CRC—provided it is given in accordance with the relevant United Nations resolutions.

Britain has committed $1 million to UNDRO—the United Nations disaster relief co-ordinator—for the Gulf region and £2·5 million to the ICRC appeal for the Gulf. In addition, European Community assistance—of course we contribute to that budget—to the Red Cross Gulf appeal for specific sanitation and water purification work, much of it in Iraq, amounts to 3 million ecu. A large proportion of those funds will, of course, go to Iraq.

My hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West mentioned a current mission to Iraq by representatives of Oxfam and Save the Children Fund. I have no doubt that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development will give careful consideration to any suggestions that they may make to her in due course.

As for Palestinians in Kuwait, we have repeatedly made it clear to the Kuwaiti Government, at a senior level, that alleged collaborators should be dealt with under the rule of law. The Prime Minister repeated that message a short time ago when he met the Crown Prince of Kuwait.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: The Minister talked about humanitarian aid and the need for it to get through as required. Can he specifically clarify whether that humanitarian aid will cover the chemicals required for water purification, such as chlorine and aluminium sulphate, which were produced by the plants that have been bombed? The hon. Gentleman has spoken about the need to do something about the problems in the region. Can he confirm that such items will not be blocked by any sanctions?

Mr. Baldry: I have no doubt that the international community will wish to do everything possible to bring the necessary humanitarian aid to Iraq and the rest of the region. However, the extent of such humanitarian aid needs to be assessed.

Several hon. Members, including the Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes), made the telling point that we know little about what has taken place in some parts of Iraq because it has been difficult for people to go there. I assure the hon. Member for Dewsbury that the United Nations and the international community will not want to cavil over which line various matters fall. Once an assessment is made, the United Nations relief organisations and others will want to see how best to respond to those needs. Clearly, it is in the interests of the whole of the international community that humanitarian needs be met as speedily as possible and by the best means.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow mentioned birds. We welcome the work of the International Council for Bird Preservation, which has sent two experts for a short visit to the Gulf in the past 10 days to assess the effects of the oil spill on bird life. The region is an important staging post for spring migration and is home to some endangered species, such as the socotra cormorant. Further study in the region will be beneficial. Reports by ICBP experts give a mixed picture. They say that some offshore islands have escaped the oil and, in some areas, comparatively few badly oiled birds have escaped. In one case, in a flock of 3,000 birds, about 1,000 were estimated to be oiled to some degree, while about 250 were heavily oiled.

In the ICBP's view, the slow clean-up and lack of local monitoring information available strongly support the case for a study of species, movement, feeding patterns and oil damage. The ICBP is the recognised international federation of bird preservation groups and, in the United Kingdom, is strongly supported by the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds. It is funded by private and other donations and sponsorship. Details of its new proposal were faxed to my Department only yesterday, so we must consider its request for support. As with every other request that we have received, we shall consider it carefully.

I hope that I have responded comprehensively to the issues that have been raised. The bull point of my remarks is that, in all of these matters, we must rely on the best scientific information. Environmental science and the international community face an unprecedented challenge in responding to those problems and we must act quickly if we are to prevent an enduring legacy of ecological ruin in the areas most affected. One way that we can assist is by targeting United Kingdom science on those problems and offering our expertise to the Gulf states.

As I said, science can help directly in monitoring the scale of the damage from smoke plumes, oil slicks and hazardous material, in using computer models to predict how it will spread and in advising on its likely consequences for human health, agriculture and all aspects of the environment. We need science to advise on the best way of disposing of the vast quantities of war debris, much of which will be contaminated with hazardous chemicals. We also need to be ready to assist the Gulf states to develop further their own environmental protection agencies.

On my visit to Bahrain last weekend I discussed with the Government of Bahrain, at their request, the possible assistance we can offer in building up environmental protection machinery and expertise and we are preparing to send out a United Kingdom team to assist in this field.

All hon. Members will agree that the terrible environmental problems generated in the Gulf and caused by the actions of Saddam Hussein remain considerable and can be tackled only by a collective international effort to assist the Gulf states. The United Kingdom has led the way by responding promptly and positively to calls for assistance, and we shall continue to consider how we can contribute to the long-term recovery of that fragile but highly distinctive environment which is important to so many millions of people. We have been prompt and positive in our actions, and shall continue to tackle the ecological challenges in the Gulf region.

2.16 pm

Mr. Dalyell: Although the proposer has a right of reply, in the knowledge that the hon. Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Stevens) has been waiting, in the belief that those who are drawn second in the ballot should have an opportunity to introduce their motion, and in the hope that the Seitz Crutzen proposals will be looked at, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Materials Recycling

2.17 pm

Mr. Lewis Stevens (Nuneaton): I beg to move,

That this House welcomes the Government's commitment to recycling of materials which reduces waste and conserves energy and raw materials; notes the important steps which this Government is taking towards reaching its target of recycling 50 per cent. of all reusable household waste by the year 2000 and that the £40 million being made available over the next three years will help boost recycling projects recognises the need for the Government to encourage research into greater use of recycling and for initiatives to encourage industry, commerce and the general public in the use of recycling; further recognises that recycling helps to reduce litter and generally improve the environment and that the Tidy Britain Group's National Spring Clean campaign will be a helpful contribution to public participation; and believes that the Environmental Protection Act 1990 will encourage recycling by introducing recycling credits and by forcing local authorities to publish recycling plans.

May I first thank the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) for his courtesy in giving me quarter of an hour for my motion. I congratulate him on the manner in which he moved his motion and on his diligent research to provide the facts that he presented to the House. Regardless of whether we agree with every point he makes, we can always be sure that whatever motion he proposes, it will have been thoroughly research, will be informative to the House and will justify the case that he puts with great expertise.

My motion is designed to bring to the attention of the House the importance of the recycling of materials. In the United Kingdom today we are aware of the importance to the environment of many different aspects of what have, in the past, been accepted as processes that are merely part of our daily lives, with no real impact on us. We have become more and more conscious of the need to deal properly with the waste that we produce, both in our homes and in industry. We have also become aware of how it affects our daily lives if we do not treat it properly. Some of the tips and other means of disposal show us how dangerous waste disposal can be to our health.

Recycling has distinct advantages because it not only protects the raw material resources, but gives an important economic boost to industry allowing it to reduce the price of products. It also encourages all of us to keep our environment in a better state.

Energy—about which we talked in the previous debate, particularly oil—is something we greatly need to conserve and of which we should reduce our intake. Through the use of resources and through recycling, particularly of aluminium, we can produce great savings in energy. We can save on the cost of transporting new raw materials if we can reuse materials, particularly in their own localities. In so doing, we also save disposal costs. If we can properly dispose of and recycle some of those materials we reduce the risk of pollution as we prevent them from being destroyed or being released into the atmosphere and soil. We also reduce the demand for landfill space. In constituencies such as mine there is no shortage of holes in which to put waste, though the decision in which holes to put the waste is not always popular.

Mr. John Bowis (Battersea): Does my hon. Friend agree that protection is required for our rivers? As a patron of the Thames clean-up campaign, I assure my hon. Friend that all too often we find that items that could be recycled are dumped in the Thames, creating a messy and dangerous environment that is unpleasant for humans, swans, fish and associated life in and around our rivers.

Mr. Stevens: I agree with my hon. Friend. There is in my constituency a small river which, although it could not compete with the Thames, is the recipient of rubbish, even supermarket trolleys, creating an unsightly and dangerous area. I recall that when, 30 years ago, I worked in London, the state of the Thames was decidedly worse. There is much less floating debris now.

It would be wrong to imply that a great deal of British industry does not recycle waste. Indeed, in many ways our record is good. The latest figures that I have, though they are somewhat out of date, show that in 1986, British industry recovered 27 million tonnes of reusable material worth over £2 billion, including exports worth £700 million. With ferrous metals, copper and lead there has traditionally been much recycling and some of the amounts processed—82 per cent. of ferrous metals and 74 per cent. of copper—are high.

That has been done as a matter of economic necessity. In other areas, where the same economic necessity does not exist, the percentages are lower. In some cases reclamation is not economical. There is a temptation to think that all household and industrial waste can be recycled at reasonable cost. That is not so.

The Government are to be congratulated on financing research into ways of recycling materials, in particular materials that are difficult to get rid of without the possibility of toxins and other by-products being created. The Government devoted £10 million in 1990-91 into researching the recycling of waste products.

Recycling was not considered an important aspect of life 10 or 15 years ago. Mostly it was left to the rag and bone man, with newspapers and other waste paper being given to the boy scouts and others as a semi-charitable enterprise. We now recognise that recycling has an important part to play in the use and conservation of materials and for the good of the environment.

Much needs to be done to make the public aware of the importance of recycling. Bottle banks are common and "recycling cities" such as Sheffield have done much, with the help of the Department of the Environment. It is important to create such initiatives and people should be given the opportunity to separate and dispose of various waste materials that can be recycled.

There is still reluctance among the public which needs to be addressed. Trying to locate bottle banks is not always the easiest thing in the world, desirable as they are. It seems all right for them to be located in the car park of a large supermarket, but that can mean people travelling quite large distances. If one suggests that the bottle banks should be located in more residential areas, one finds that there is not the same welcome for or acceptance of those receptacles. That is also true of metal disposal——

Mr. Bowis: Does my hon. Friend agree that if the bottle bank is too far away, the owner of the bottles may spend more money in petrol and emit greater pollution into the atmosphere when getting to the bottle bank than the amount that is saved by preserving the glass?

Mr. Stevens: I very much agree with my hon. Friend. That is also true of collecting waste paper and newspapers for various charities. By the time people have got all the paper together, with all the money that that may entail, they could have given a bigger donation to the organisation concerned than the amount that the organisation can get from the waste paper.

The difficulty is to find the best form of recycling provision. Under the Environmental Protection Act 1990, local authorities will consider responsibility for organising recycling plans and for deciding on the methods of waste disposal in their area. However, if the public do not have ready access to the recycling receptacles, we will not move on from the situation with which we have all grown too familiar. I refer to our hedgerows and any piece of ground being littered with various things, which are costly to get rid of. Clearing waste from such areas is far more expensive than picking up refuse from one site. In many cities and towns, however, the disposal sites, such as the local tips, are not readily accessible. As my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) pointed out, people have to travel considerable distances and there is therefore the temptation not to recycle, but to put the rubbish in a dustbin or to get rid of it in some other way.

As I have said, we need to carry out research into the best ways of disposing of waste and of separating one type of waste from another. We must also consider the best and most economic way of recycling our waste.

Plastics have proved particularly difficult to get rid of. We are now talking about biodegradable plastics which, if they can be developed to the right extent, will mean that we do not have to face the worry of something that will not break down for many years. The incineration of plastics also causes great difficulties, unless it can be carried out at high temperatures. Plastic that is not destructible causes a general mess.

Litter is another important issue. It is important that we solve the problems caused by packaging. We are better off not producing the waste and the litter in the first place than having to recycle it. We need to design our products so that unnecessary waste does not automatically accompany them. That would mean that we could start to reduce not only the initial product cost, but the cost of reclamation and disposal. Although a lot of work has been carried out on packaging, even today it is still possible to buy many things that come with plastic or even small amounts of metal packaging which could be reduced. The packaging could be replaced with a biodegradable material or with paper that could be reused.

We have moved a long way in our acceptance of and approach to the importance of recycling and I congratulate the Government on the initiatives they have taken. As the motion states, there is still a need "to encourage research into greater use of recycling and for initiatives to encourage industry, commerce and the general public in the use of recycling".

We must do all that we can to encourage people to be aware of the need for recycling.

The Tidy Britain Group has a part to play, and I hope that its national spring clean campaign will make the public aware of the importance of getting rid of litter and of the importance of recycling, encourage public participation in improving our environment and make products cheaper through encouraging recycling.

It being half past Two o'clock. MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER interrupted the proceedings.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Monday 18th March, the Motions in the name of Sir Marcus Fox, on behalf of the Committee of Selection, relating to changes in the membership of Select Committees, may be proceeded with, though opposed, for one and half hours after the first of them has been entered upon; and, if proceedings thereon have not been disposed of at that hour, Mr. Speaker shall then put successively the Questions necessary to dispose of them, including the Questions on any Amendments to the said Motions which he may have selected; and, notwithstanding the practice of the House, the Motion relating to Environment shall be regarded as a single Motion. —[Mr. David Davis.]

Dental Services

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. David Davis.]

2.32 pm

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for Health for coming to the House for this brief debate on dental services. I am well aware that the Department of Health is one of the most demanding Departments, and its workload is even greater at present because of the reforms that are taking place in hospital services

Going to the dentist these days, Madam Deputy Speaker, which I hope you have not experienced recently, seems to be so expensive that many people must think that the fees that we pay cover all dental costs and that the taxpayer's contribution must be limited. The maximum charge for a course is now £200, and that must appear to be substantial in relation to the costs of the service. However, the truth is about a mile away.

In 1989, payments made to dentists in England were recorded in table 5.1 of the practitioner committee service publication as being about £927 million, of which the patient paid £361 million, and public funds contributed £565 million. The reason for that huge gap is simply that 41 per cent. of the population are wholly exempt from charges, and the remaining 59 per cent. pay three quarters of fees paid to dentists for care and treatment. To those who would understandably complain about the level of dental charges we must point out that the money they pay covers a lot less than half of that excellent service.

In other aspects of social services we are always conscious of the poor take-up of benefits, but, on the basis of simple statistics and of my own observations of dental clinics, dental staff go out of their way to ensure that those entitled to exemption actually receive it. A considerable part of dental work relates to the provision of synthetic dentures. Since being appointed adviser to the Association of Denture Prosthesis—that interest is recorded in the Register of Members' Interests—I have acquired a multitude of facts, figures and arguments to support a view that I have held for a long time, which is that the patients, the service and the taxpayer could benefit if the public were able to go directly to fully trained and qualified denturists for the fitting and manufacture of dentures. As a patient, I have always felt that there is something rather strange in a dentist examining the mouth, taking impressions, and trying and adjusting models constructed by dental technicians, when the technicians are often working in a laboratory far removed from the surgery, knowing little or nothing about the patient for whom the dentures are intended. A more meaningful relationship could be established between the patient and the technician if there were direct contact and if the technician could be readily available to patients for any adjustments or special needs. There could be considerable savings to the patient and the taxpayer if the work were undertaken directly and if there were at least an element of competition in service and costs.

After making contact with the association, I was heartened to find that this view was not just an unusual idea, but that a host of nations, aware of high medical and dental standards, had taken steps in law to ensure that dentures could be supplied to patients without the involvement of a dentist. Holland, New Zealand, Spain, Portugal, Canada, Finland and Australia have that practice and a host of states in the United States have taken similar steps. It appears to work well and effectively in the patients' interests. My first request to the Minister is that she makes inquiries in those countries to find out whether the arrangement is working well.

My next request is that the Minister makes specific inquiries to establish whether it is true that considerable savings can accrue to the public purse by adopting direct access to dental technicians. There is considerable evidence available from the United Kingdom, because I understand that, sadly, a considerable amount of direct work is being done, although it would appear to be conducted illegally. I have no idea of the savings that could accrue, but, according to careful estimates by the association, on the assumption that 60 per cent. of national health service dentures are supplied direct, the savings to the state could be more than £11 million. That is a great deal of money which could be used in other areas of medical or dental work. The figures are based on fittings supplied to dentists in the 1988-89 financial year.

Would such a change in practice shock the public? Strange to say, it appears that the public is way ahead of us. A MORI poll taken in November last year showed that no fewer than 60 per cent. of denture wearers would prefer to obtain them direct from a denturist. There appears to be support in, of all places, the so-called European Parliament. I would not wish to place any undue emphasis on that, but, as its public health committee has unanimously recommended that denturists should be introduced in every member state, the Minister might just wake up some morning to find that Jacques Delors has been to work and that a reform has been imposed on Britain by majority vote. Therefore, it would be wise to get down to work now, so that this can be properly planned and considered.

Would it cost a fortune to pay for the training and education of denturists? I doubt whether there is a real problem, because the training would be on a fee-paying basis. Again the Minister may inquire.

Would we be creating an entirely new principle in medicine? I cannot see how that would be the case. For the fitting of artificial limbs, eyes and hearing aids, there is no question of the profession having a monopoly. The one obvious worry that the public may have is whether when, having dentures fitted, there may be a medical problem. Might a qualified denturist not see or identify serious medical problems that a fully trained dentist could identify? The issue worries me, but countries that have studied this carefully do not appear to come to that conclusion. The general view appears to be that if a denturist is trained to identify conditions of the mouth, his professional duty will be to refer the patient to another professional for a proper diagnosis. Again, I hope that the Minister will consider that matter. What has happened in other countries? Have serious problems arisen? Or can the problem be overcome with proper training on the identification of mouth and gum problems?

The time has come for proper and serious inquiries to be made. We are not talking about a minor problem, affecting a small minority. Believe it or not, Madam Deputy Speaker, more than 1 million synthetic dentures are supplied yearly to our population of more than 50 million. If we could provide savings for patients and for the public purse, and ensure a more direct relationship between the patient and the person supplying and manufacturing dentures, we could initiate real and meaningful inquiries about future legislative reform.

I thank the Minister for coming here on a Friday afternoon after she has had such a busy week. I hope that she can give me some assurances.

2.39 pm

The Minister for Health (Mrs. Virginia Bottomley): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) on raising this subject on behalf of denturists who, through the Association of Denture Prosthesis, have for some time been seeking a change in legislation to enable them to provide dentures directly to the public.

My hon. Friend said that the denturists' campaign has been such that in a few countries legislation has been amended to allow individuals with limited, but clearly defined, clinical training to undertake certain types of prosthetic treatment. The scope of the treatment that they can provide varies widely from one country to another.

It is perhaps more relevant, although perhaps somewhat invidious of my hon. Friend, to compare the United Kingdom position with that of other countries in the European Community. My hon. Friend will know that the Department has already sought to obtain information about practices in other member states. I am happy to reassure my hon. Friend that our inquiries about those countries in which denturists are permitted to practice will be extended to determine how those arrangements are working.

My hon. Friend raised a number of important points about which further information will help to inform our policy. We need to ask ourselves whether any relaxation in the Dentists Act 1984 to allow denturists to deal directly with patients would improve the quality of service to the public. Patients should quite rightly be able to expect to obtain dentures which are comfortable and functional. They should also be able to obtain dentures at reasonable cost under the NHS.

My hon. Friend referred to the increase to £200 of the maximum charge for dental treatment which I announced to the House earlier this week. He is quite right to say that some 41 per cent. of the population pay no charges at all. We estimate that very few people will be affected by the increase in the maximum charge For those adults who pay charges, the average amount paid for a course of treatment in 1989-90 was £25. That is nowhere near the present maximum or the new maximum from 1 April. We estimate that under 1 per cent. of all courses of treatment will be affected by this change.

My hon. Friend, who rightly seeks savings for the health service where they are possible, argued that considerable savings could accrue to the public purse if denturists were allowed to provide dentures directly to patients, thus cutting out the dentist middleman.

My hon. Friend will be fully aware that the Association of Denture Prosthesis made a complaint to the Office of Fair Trading in 1985 on the ground that dentists were abusing their monopoly through high prices and profits from the supply of private dentures. Following his investigation of the complaint, the Director General of Fair Trading concluded that the NHS provided a competitive alternative to private treatment, and saw little justification for the introduction of denturism on economic grounds.

I should explain how fees to dentists are calculated. Fees paid to dentists for NHS treatment, including those for the provision and fitting of dentures where laboratory work is involved, are set by the dental rates study group. This is a non-departmental public body comprising representatives of the health departments and the dental profession under an independent chairman.

The laboratory components of these fees are based on an average cost calculated separately for each item using a representative sample of current trade catalogues. There are no arrangements to ensure that dental laboratories actually receive the calculated average amount. The relationship between dentists and the laboratories whose services they employ is one of free-market economics.

The fees that dentists receive include an allowance sufficient to ensure that they can use the services of reputable laboratories and so purchase services of the required quality. Clearly, where expenses are reimbursed on an average basis through the fee scale, all dentists have a powerful incentive to shop around laboratories for the best price while, of course, maintaining professional and quality standards. This incentive to search out value for money helps the Government to contain the costs of the general dental service. Dentists must decide for themselves which laboratories they use and the Government would certainly not wish to interfere in what is an entirely private transaction between dentists and dental laboratories, but dentists must not lose sight of the fact that under their terms of service with the NHS they are made personally responsible for ensuring products supplied by the laboratory and fitted in their patients' mouths are of a quality fit for the purpose for which they are used.

Dental service committees of family health services authorities may investigate complaints about alleged use of substandard materials in the same way as any other complaint that a dentist has not provided the proper standard of care.

Fees set for any particular item of treatment partly reflect the laboratory and material costs involved in that particular item of treatment, but also serve as a means of helping to deliver the target average net income, as recommended by the Doctors and Dentists Remuneration Review Body, and practice expenses due to the average dentist.

At a time when the number of dentures provided is declining—in 1988-89, for example, 461,950 complete dentures were provided in England and Wales, whereas only a year later only 369,370 were provided, and dentists' work load is shifting more towards preventive treatment and continuing care—it does not follow that a further reduction in denture work would necessarily lead to a proportionate reduction in their practice expenses or justify under the present arrangements a significant reduction in their net income target. Some of their standing costs might simply have to be redistributed to other fees.

It is in that context that the effect on dental remuneration as a whole of any reduction in denture work undertaken by dentists would need to be considered. It is not at all certain that the Doctors' and Dentists Remuneration Review Body would reduce the target average net income were dentists not to do this work. In those circumstances, as my hon. Friend will readily appreciate, there would be no reduction of costs; on the contrary, any payments to denturists for providing dentures would be an additional cost. Essentially the changes that my hon. Friend is advocating would have substantial implications for the way in which dental services would be financed.

I mentioned that patients have a right to expect that their dentures should be functional and comfortable, and my hon. Friend has suggested that an opinion poll last year indicated that many denture wearers would prefer to obtain them direct from a denturist. Until now there has been little quantifiable evidence to enable us to measure patient satisfaction. We saw, in 1987, a report from the National Consumer Council which showed that patients did not generally complain about the cost of dentures, but, rather, they were more likely to be dissatisfied over the quality and final fit. At the same time Age Concern, which my hon. Friend will know is particularly interested in problems of the elderly, was unequivocal that the responsibility for fitting dentures should remain with dentists and should not be passed to dental technicians.

In that same year, the then president of the General Dental Council conceded that the council continued to receive "a steady flow of complaints from patients about unsatisfactory dentures".

We have recently received the final draft of a study carried out by the dental practice board into the provision of complete dentures in the general dental services. Patient satisfaction was the major area of interest in the study and three different aspects were addressed. These were the level of satisfaction with the course of treatment, whether the new dentures met the patient's expectations and whether the dentures were being used and found satisfactory for the purposes for which they had been provided. The study suggests areas where improvements are necessary. In the meantime, the Department is already preparing a training package that is directed at improving the dentist-dental technician interface. We hope that that in turn will lead to an improved service for the patient. Clearly it is the relative contribution of the dentist and the technician that is of great importance in achieving a quality service for the patient.

A further important argument concerns the availability of the service. Dental auxiliaries are, in general, of great use where demand for dental treatment is high and manpower is insufficient to meet the needs. The General Dental Council may, by statutory instrument, make regulations for the establishment of classes of dental auxiliaries who may undertake dental work.

The number of dentists has been increasing substantially. In 1979, there were 13,993 dentists providing general dental services. However, that figure had risen substantially by 1990 to 18,011. Some have tried quite irresponsibly to argue that because of the new dental contract introduced on 1 October, dentists might withdraw from the NHS. I hope that my hon. Friend and others concerned about the matter will be aware that that is not the case. Soon after the new dental contract was introduced, the British Dental Association conducted a survey of dentists which showed that 96 per cent. were still treating child patients, 90 per cent. were still treating adult patients and 85 per cent. were also accepting new adult patients for continuing care. Altogether more than 12 million patients have signed on under the new arrangements which, as my hon. Friend will be well aware, place the emphasis on prevention and continuing care instead of on the old drill-and-fill ethos.

I have mentioned the supply of dentists; we should also not lose sight of the possible demand for treatment—particularly dentures—in the future. My hon. Friend will be aware of the survey of adult dental health carried out in 1988 by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys, the results of which were published on 12 February 1991. This clearly illustrates a continuing trend of improving dental health.

One of the most encouraging features of the report is the confirmation that more and more people can look forward to keeping their natural teeth. The 1988 survey showed that only 21 per cent. of the adult population was edentulous compared with 30 per cent. in 1978. It is confidently predicted that the number of complete denture wearers will continue to fall until by the year 2028 only 6 per cent. of the population will be wearing complete dentures. There is hope for us all! Those will be the more elderly of the population whose treatment is likely to require considerable skill and experience, perhaps requiring treatment by restorative consultants in hospitals.

Against that background we must consider very carefully before deciding that there should be any diminution of the work undertaken by dentists. I should add that the Department is undertaking a survey of dental manpower later this year and we shall have a clearer picture of future manpower needs when it is completed.

However, the Dentists Act 1984 specifically prohibits dental auxiliaries of any class from fitting, inserting or fixing dentures or artificial teeth for a good reason. It protects the public by restricting dental practice to those who are properly trained and qualified. The provision of dentures cannot be considered in isolation from the total oral and general health care of patients. The insertion of a denture significantly changes the oral environment and this may have harmful effects on any remaining teeth, the gums and oral mucous membranes or the whole of the masticatory apparatus.

In the Department of Health, we are convinced that a patient's oral health will be better served if, when dentures are required, that function is carried out by a person who is trained to prescribe and fit dentures; can recognise pathological conditions which may be caused or exacerbated by dentures; and can at the same time advise the patient—particularly where partial dentures are being fitted—of any other dental treatment which should be carried out.

I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware that about 2,000 new cases of oral cancer are reported each year, most in the 50 to 70 age group. It is vital that early diagnosis is made and any precancerous conditions recognised, and dental surgeons are uniquely placed and qualified to undertake that work. There are many other conditions in the mouth that are markers of systemic disease, such as diabetes, anaemias and malabsorption syndrome, as well as numerous mucosal conditions which require treatment before dentures are constructed—indeed it is estimated that approximately half of all persons with dentures show evidence of some form of oral pathological condition.

My hon. Friend will appreciate that while we welcome the contributions made by dental technicians, we believe that they should work with dental practitioners as part of a team to ensure that patients receive a quality service that protects their oral health and general well-being.

I thank my hon. Friend for this debate, which has provided me with the opportunity to give an overview of the way that we see dental technicians and denturists working in the provision of dentures, ensuring that we all have the services that we require. My hon. Friend has identified a number of areas that will benefit from further examination. I have given an undertaking to secure further information. I appreciate his contribution in ensuring that, as we carry forward our policies of evaluating the way in which our dental surgeries are provided, the role and contribution of denturists is thoroughly and properly examined. We want the benefit of their contribution as well as that of other practitioners in this sector.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at five minutes to Three o'clock.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Mortgage Repossessions

Mr. Battle: To ask the Attorney-General how many court actions relating to mortgage repossessions there were in the Leeds county court in each year since 1982.

The Attorney-General: The number of mortgage actions for possession in Leeds county court were:

	Number
1982	803
1983	508
1984	558
1985	800
1986	773
1987	492
1988	807
1989	903
1990	1,068

Maintenance Enforcement

Miss Lestor: To ask the Attorney-General what consideration he is giving to the relationship between access and maintenance in the new legislation on maintenance enforcement to ensure that failure to pay does not result in the child being forbidden to see a parent.

The Attorney-General: The Child Support Bill and the Maintenance Enforcement Bill are concerned only with the assessment and payment of maintenance. The difficulties surrounding the denial of access to an absent parent are being considered as part of the Government's review of the family justice system. There is no proposal that failure to pay maintenance will result in the child's being forbidden to see the parent who has failed to pay.

Miss Lestor: To ask the Attorney-General whether there are any proposals when the private child support agency is established to track down and collect maintenance from errant fathers to ensure that shared access is enforced.

The Attorney-General: The Child Support Agency, which will be a "next steps" agency accountable to the Secretary of State for Social Security, will be concerned only with issues relating to the assessment and payment of maintenance for children. It will have no involvement with issues of access, which will remain with the courts. As the White Paper "Children Come First" made clear, although absent parents sometimes see the payment of maintenance as connected to the question of their access to the children concerned, the two are separate issues which are decided on the basis of different criteria. Nonetheless, the Government are aware that there are difficulties surrounding the enforcement of access where an order has been made. This is one of the areas which is being considered as part of the Government's review of the family justice system in England and Wales.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics, Leeds

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what were the levels of redundancies, by industry, in Leeds West for the period 1981 to 1991, classified by men, women, young persons and ethnic minorities.

Mr. Jackson: The available information is given in the tables. The figures relate to the numbers of redundancies confirmed as having occurred following receipt of notification under the 1975 Employment Protection Act, in the years 1983 to 1990 in the jobcentre areas covering the Leeds metropolitan district, analysed by the 1968 and 1980 standard industrial classifications.

The comparisons are affected by the changes to the redundancy fund in 1986.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the percentage of total employment by industry and what was the percentage change in employment by industry; for the period 1981 to 1991, for Leeds, West, classified by men, women, young persons and ethnic minorities.

Mr. Jackson: Employment statistics for local areas are compiled only when censuses of employment are taken. They cover employees in employment only and exclude the self-employed and members of Her Majesty's forces.

The available information for Leeds, West from censuses of employment taken in 1984 and 1987 is given in the table. Separate data for young persons and ethnic minorities are not available. Comparable data from the 1981 census of employment could be obtained only at disproportionate cost; data from the 1987 census are the latest currently available.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons in the Leeds metropolitan district there were in (a) full-time employment, (b) part-time employment and (c) temporary employment for each year from 1979 (i) by gender and (ii) as a percentage of all employees in (x) manufacturing industry and (y) the service sector industry.

Mr. Jackson: Information for employees in employment by district is only available from the censuses of employment for 1981, 1984 and 1987. This can be obtained from the NOMIS database in the House of Commons Library. It is not possible to identify how many were in temporary employment.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he has taken to recruit members of ethnic minorities in top grades of employment at his Department.

Mr. Jackson: Senior grades are recruited by the Civil Service Commission. The commission has taken various steps to aid recruitment of members of the ethnic minorities. The ED group will shortly be implementing equal opportunities action programmes focusing on the need to increase the represention of ethnic minorities and women and people with disabilities, in the higher grades. These programmes will reflect the programme of action on race issued by the office of the Minister for the Civil Service.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many and what percentage of officers in each grade 1 to 7 and overall in the Department are (a) women and (b) from ethnic minorities, respectively.

Mr. Jackson: The numbers and percentages of women and ethnic minority officers in grades 1 to 7 and overall in the Department at 1 January 1991 are set out in the tables.

Redundancy Payments

Sir Dudley Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the reason for the delay by his Department's redundancy payments service at Birmingham in sending the sums owed to Mr. Peter Turner of 67 St. John's court, Warwick, following representations by the hon. Member for Warwick and Leamington.

Mr. Forth: I refer my hon. Friend to my letter of 20 November 1990. A duplicate claim has now been processed and the money owed was sent to the Official Receiver on 7 February 1991. I understand the payment to Mr. Peter Turner was made on 27 February.

Homeworkers

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he intends to take to improve the pay and employment rights of homeworkers.

Mr. Forth: Employees who are homeworkers have the same employment rights as other employees. Pay is best determined by the parties concerned in the light of their particular circumstances. Homeworkers in wages council industries must be paid at least the statutory minimum wage rates set by the councils.

Training

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what were the average costs per (a) employment training place and (b) youth training trainee place negotiated in the past year between (i) TECs and providers and (ii) regional offices and TECs.

Mr. Jackson: Financial arrangements agreed between training and enterprise councils—TECs—and providers of training for the delivery of employment training—ET—and youth training—YT—are matters for the parties involved. The details of costs per trainee week and per output agreed between my Department and individual TECs are commercially confidential.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is his estimate of underspending on youth training and employment training measuring anticipated actual expenditure on 31 March against planned expenditure for 1990-91.

Mr. Jackson: Forecast outturn expenditure on youth training and employment training in comparison to 1990-91 cash limits is shown in the table.

	Published cash limit £ million	Forecast outturn £ million
Youth training	840	833
Employment training	1,075	1,062

Claimants

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) how many claimants in each of the years 1986-87, 1987-88, 1988-89 and 1989-90 from Great Britain have changed their status from long-term unemployed to fresh claimant as a result of participating in programmes provided by the employment service;

(2) if he will list each of the programmes provided by the employment service which result in the long-term unemployed returning to the unemployment register as new claimants.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service executive agency are the responsibi lity of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred these questions for reply.

Pay Rates

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the maximum and minimum basic rates of pay recorded in the Leeds office of the employment service from advertised posts in (a) the manufacturing sector and (b) the service sector for (i) full-time and (ii) part-time work and showing figures for (1) men and (2) women.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service executive agency are the responsibi lity of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many men (a) over the age of 60 years and (b) between the ages of 60 and 65 years, are in full employment; and what proportion of the employment market (b) constitutes.

Mr. Jackson: It is estimated from the labour force survey that there were 695,000 men aged 60 and over and 604,000 men aged 60 to 64 in full-time employment in Great Britain in spring 1989. The latter group formed 4·4 per cent. of all men aged 16 and over then in full-time employment.

Training (Special Needs)

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the average cost per employment training special needs place negotiated in (a) the year 1989-90 between regional offices and providers and (b) in the past year between regional office and TECs and (c) in the past year between TECs and providers.

Mr. Jackson: Information on costs of special needs places on the employment training programme is not available.

South Glamorgan TEC

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to his answer of 26 February, Official Report, column 480, what part his Department will take in the re-tendering process for the construction of the new South Glamorgan TEC headquarters.

Mr. Jackson [holding answer 1 March 1991]: This is a matter for the TEC.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to his answers of 12 February, Official Report, column 461-62 and 26 February, what was the subject of discussion between his director of field operations and the chairman of South Glamorgan TEC on 7 and 9 December 1990.

Mr. Jackson [holding answer 1 March 1991]: Various matters were discussed including the contract for the refurbishment of premises at Dumballs road for South Glamorgan TEC.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he expects to finalise the amount of his financial contribution towards the cost of constructing the new South Glamorgan TEC headquarters.

Mr. Jackson [holding answer 1 March 1991]: This will depend on a number of factors, including the dates on which the TEC makes decisions about its premises.

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION

Jobs Report

33. Mr. Wilson: To ask the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, representing the House of Commons Commission, if he will make a statement of implementation of the Ibbs report.

Mr. Beith: Following the generally supportive debate in the House on Thursday 17 January, the Commission is now proceeding with the first phase of the implementation of the proposals in Sir Robin Ibbs's report on House of Commons services. The recruitment of a new Director of Finance and Administration is now well advanced, and an appointment is likely to be made by Mr. Speaker before Easter. It is hoped that the procedures for appointing the new Director of Works—who will be responsible to the authorities of both Houses—will be completed before the Whitsun recess. The implementation of the other main proposals in the report will proceed as expeditiously as possible thereafter. The House will wish to know that the Offices Committee in the other place has also welcomed the general thrust of the Ibbs report and is taking steps to apply the recommendations where appropriate to its own administration.

TRANSPORT

School Buses (Seat Belts)

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Conway) of 11 February, Official Report, column 309, if he will indicate the EC legislation which currently prevents Her Majesty's Government from introducing national proposals on the wearing of seat belts on school buses; and if he will further indicate which part of which EC directorate he is pressing to enable such measures to be brought forward.

Mr. Chope: The relevant EC directives are 76/155/EEC and 77/541/EEC together with their subsequent amendments, including most recently 90/629/EEC and 90/628/EEC. Any seat belts and anchorages that are fitted to new vehicles must conform to the standards laid down in these directives. In the case of coaches, no manufacturer can be obliged to fit seat belts or anchorages other than to front or exposed seats, and member states are not free to override this.

We have pressed directorate general III in the European Commission to bring forward proposals as soon as possible which would require seat belts to be fitted on all seats in coaches and minibuses. This concern has now been reflected in the recitals to directive 90/628/EEC, which state that everything should be done in order to prevent passenger ejection in accidents. We hope the Commission will respond to this by putting forward proposals within that time scale requiring the fitting of seat belts on each seat. In the meantime, we are considering what further steps can be taken to encourage the more widespread fitting of seat belts on passenger seats.

British Rail Work (King's Cross)

Mr. Waller: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action he has taken to safeguard the land required for British Rail's proposed works at King's Cross.

Mr. Freeman: Safeguarding directions under the Town and Country Planning General Development Order 1988 have been made. They came into force today 4 March. These are initial directions and can be amended if details of the works at King's Cross are altered at any stage.

Canning Town Flyover

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he intends to open public consultation concerning the widening of the Canning Town flyover A13, and any associated changes in traffic circulation affecting pedestrians and local traffic.

Mr. Chope: We intend to hold full public consultations, which I hope will begin towards the end of this summer.

Central Line

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to receive the report of the investigation by London Underground Ltd. into the delays and hazards experienced by passengers on the Central line on Tuesday 19 February; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: I understand that London Underground Ltd. hopes to complete its report very shortly. This will be discussed with the Health and Safety Executive's railways inspectorate, and the Health and Safety Commission will consider and advise on whether further action may be necessary.

M20

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) when the contract for the M20, junctions 5 to 8, improvement will be awarded;

(2) when he expects the M20, junctions 5 to 8, improvement to be completed;

(3) when tenders will be invited for the M20, junctions 5 to 8, improvement.

Mr. Chope: Tenders for the construction of the M20, junctions 5 to 8, improvement, were invited on 1 March. We aim to award the contract by mid-summer this year for completion of the work by mid-summer 1993.

Road Signs

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to achieve the harmonisation of international road sign standards.

Mr. Chope: The United Kingdom plays a full and active part in promoting necessary international harmonisation of road sign standards. The Department of Transport is represented on United Nations Economic Commission for Europe and European conference of Ministers of Transport committees dealing with road sign harmonisation.

Work on constructional standards for traffic signs is being carried out under the auspices of Comité Européen de Normalisation—CEN. The Department is represented at CEN and plays a full part in the development of the new European standards which are planned for publication by the end of 1993.

Road Building and Renewal

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has any plans to institute rolling programmes of road building and renewal.

Mr. Chope: These are already in place. Road construction schemes are kept under review, and schemes are added to the programme from time to time. A total of £400 million will be spent on major maintenance of motorways, trunk roads and bridges this financial year as part of a continuing programme.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether the United Kingdom Government have ratified (a) the 1968 Vienna convention on road traffic, signs and signals and (b) the 1954 New York convention on the temporary importation of private road motor vehicles and for tourism.

Mr. Chope: The United Kingdom is a signatory to and hopes soon to ratify the 1968 Vienna conventions on road traffic and road signs and signals. The 1954 conventions on the temporary importation of private road vehicles and facilities for touring were both ratified by the United Kingdom in 1956.

Road Signals

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to encourage the standardisation of the position and operation of controls, lights and indicators for roads and road vehicles.

Mr. Chope: The detailed requirements for and the legal significance of light signals for the control of vehicular traffic are prescribed in the Traffic Signs Regulations and General Directions 1981 and comply with the provisions of the European convention and agreement on road signs and signals. Detailed legal requirements for the fitting and control of lights on vehicles, including direction indicators are covered by the Road Vehicles Lighting Regulations 1989. These regulations follow closely agreed European standards for the installation and performance of lighting and light-signalling devices on motor vehicles and trailers.

Carbon Monoxide Emissions

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish a list of car manufacturers' specifications for carbon monoxide emissions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: This information is already available from vehicle manufacturers and published by other organisations such as tuning equipment manufacturers. Reputable service agents should also have the information.

Cars (Fuel-injection Systems)

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has on the proportion of new cars available for purchase in the United Kingdom with fuel-injection systems which are fitted with an inertial safety switch.

Mr. Chope: It is estimated that in excess of 90 per cent. of fuel-injected vehicles manufactured in the United Kingdom are fitted with a device, not necessarily inertial, that will automatically shut off the fuel delivery in the event of a substantial impact. Proportions of imported fuel injected vehicles fitted with such devices are not known, although most importers will have been issued with guidelines recommending their use.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Broadcasting

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the statutory provisions that relate to the accountability of broadcasting authorities.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The constitution and responsibilities of the Independent Television Commission, Radio Authority and S4C are set out in the Broadcasting Act 1990, while the BBC is governed by the terms of its charter and accompanying licence and agreement.

Asylum Requests

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the average length of time spent in processing requests for asylum into the United Kingdom in each year since 1980.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information requested is given in the table.

Average length of time (in months) between the receipt of an application and the decision, 1983-90[1]

Year in which decision made	Applications for refugee status or asylum
1984	8½
1985	12½
1986	14
1987	14
1988	17
1989	12
[2]1990	12

[1] Excludes south-east Asian refugees given settlement on arrival.
[2] Provisional.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many individuals currently seeking asylum have had to wait for two years or more before a decision is made on their cases.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: At 31 December 1990 some 4,000 asylum applicants, including associated dependants, are recorded as awaiting a decision in the United Kingdom for two years or more. However, this figure overstates the position because of under-recording of decisions made earlier.

Women Offenders

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the most common category of crime for women offenders during the last 10 years; and what is the average sentence for these crimes.

Mr. John Patten: The most common indictable offence committed by women is shoplifting. The table shows the number of women found guilty or cautioned for this offence over the past 10 years and the average sentence lengths imposed by the courts.

Female offenders found guilty at all courts or cautioned for shoplifting offences 1980 to 1989 England and Wales

	Number found guilty or cautioned for shoplifting offences	Percentage found guilty or cautioned of shoplifting over all indictable offences	Number given custody for shoplifting offences	Average sentence length for shoplifting (months)

1988	37,787	47	535	3	6
1989	35,371	46	465	2	5

Charity Commission

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of the Charity Commission's income is provided by Government grant.

Mr. John Patten: The Charity Commission is non-ministerial Government Department and, as such, its total expenditure, which is subject to a cash limit, is voted by Parliament.

Leicestershire Police Force

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will reimburse the Leicestershire police force in respect of unforeseeable expenditures which have led to budgetary overspending.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Home Office will continue to meet 51 per cent. of Leicestershire police authority's expenditure on revenue costs through specific grant, regardless of whether the expenditure was foreseen or not.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much funding the Leicestershire police force has received from central Government in each of the past five financial years.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Specific police grant paid to Leicestershire county council in respect of the financial years 1985-86 to 1989-90 was as follows:

1985-86	18,093,241
1986-87	20,700,339
1987-88	22,488,908
1988-89	24,563,482
1989-90	28,578,769

In addition, rate support grant paid to Leicestershire county council in each of these years included support for that part of police expenditure not covered by police grant.

"Cautioning of Offenders"

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the provisions of Home Office circular 59/1990 "Cautioning of Offenders", as it relates to the discretion now being extended to the police.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The purpose of the circular is to establish national standards for cautioning based on consistent general principles in which the courts and public may have full confidence. It does not give the police any new discretion, but emphasises the principle that cautioning can be suitable for all age groups, not just juveniles. Generally, cautioning is recognised as an increasingly important way of keeping offenders out of the courts and, in many circumstances, reducing the risk that they will re-offend.

Crime Concern

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the work of Crime Concern.

Mr. John Patten: In the two years for which it has been fully operational, Crime Concern has undertaken a wide range of valuable work, notably in establishing area crime reduction schemes, forging a fruitful relationship with the private sector and encouraging the development of youth crime prevention projects. I look forward to the organisation's continuing contribution to preventing crime.

Hospital Strip Cells

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners were put into hospital strip cells in each of the years from 1986 to 1990.

Mrs. Rumbold: I regret that the information is not available in statistical form and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Women's Prisons

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the overcrowding and lack of integral sanitation at Bullwood Hall and Styall women's prisons; and if he will give figures for the certified normal accommodation and the actual numbers for the last 12 months at these establishments.

Mrs. Rumbold: Some cells in Bullwood Hall are being shared because of the temporary withdrawal of 23 cells so that access to night sanitation can be provided by means of an electronic unlocking system. All the main areas of accommodation in the prison will have integral sanitation by February 1992 leaving only the hospital and segregation unit, and work will be carried out in these areas in 1992-93. There is no overcrowding in Styal prison and integral sanitation is currently being installed. Work on one house is complete and the two remaining houses will have integral sanitation by September 1991. All other areas of the prison have open access and therefore integral sanitation is not required.

The figure for the certified normal accommodation of Bullwood Hall is 119. The figure for Styal is normally 258, but has been reduced to 208 while refurbishment is carried out. The actual numbers of prisoners on the last Friday of the month for each of the previous 12 months were as follows:

	Bullwood Hall	Styal
30 March	123	221
27 April	124	214
25 May	119	204

Television Programme Listings

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what representations he has received on the publication of television programme listings; and what evaluation he has made of the effects of charges on local newspapers;

(2) if he will again review the implications of the Broadcasting Act for television listings in local newspapers; and what steps he will take to monitor referrals of charges for listings to the copyright tribunal.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have received a number of representations about the proposed scale of charges for the publication of television listings. The Broadcasting Act 1990, however, makes provision for the independent Copyright tribunal to adjudicate in any case in which a publisher considers that the charge imposed for publishing television listings is unreasonable. I see no need to monitor referrals to the tribunal. It is premature to consider the effects of charges on local newspapers until the procedure set out in the Act has been concluded.

Estate Rifles

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will issue guidelines to chief police officers following the consideration of the firearms consultancy committee of section 16 of the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1988 on visitors' use of estate rifles; and whether he intends to legislate on the purchase of ammunition by users of estate rifles.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We shall consider the need for this most carefully in the light of any advice which the Firearms Consultative Committee may make in due course. We have no plans, at present, to legislate for further controls on the purchase of ammunition permitted under section 16.

Detainees

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the guidelines decided by his advisory panel on those detained on the grounds of national security under the Immigration Act 1971 in relation to (a) the number of witnesses allowed, (b) the legal or other advisers who may be present at hearings and (c) other matters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The arrangements are those set out in the then Home Secretary's statement to the House on 15 June 1971 at columns 375-77. Other issues affecting the conduct of proceedings are a matter for the chairman of the panel.

WALES

Air Pollution

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the air pollution monitoring sites based in Wales for (a) ozone, (b) carbon monoxide, (c) nitrogen oxides, (d) acid deposition, (e) atmospheric hydrocarbon, (f) trace germs, (g) atmospheric chemistry, (h) smoke and sulphur dioxide directive, (i) other sulphur dioxide sites, (j) lead sites and (k) multi-element sites including lead.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The sites operated in Wales on behalf of the United Kingdom Government are:

(a) Ozone—Aston Hill.
(b) Acid deposition sites—Beddgelert; Tycanol Wood; Llyn Brianne; Plinlimmon.
(c) Smoke and sulphur dioxide, including directive sites —Cardiff; Cresselly (Pembs); Marshfield, near Cardiff; Newport, Gwent; Neyland; Pontypool; Port Talbot; Waunfawr; Welshpool; Wrexham; Cwmgwrach, Neath; Glynneath—installed but not yet operational.
(d) Lead sites—Cardiff.

There are no air pollution monitoring sites operated in Wales on behalf of the United Kingdom Government in respect of carbon monoxide, nitrogen oxides, atmospheric hydrocarbon, trace germs, atmospheric chemistry and multi-elements.

However, other monitoring is carried out under the aegis of various independent organisations.

Welsh Water

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what target has been set for Welsh Water plc to achieve in terms of reducing water loss between reservoir and consumer as part of the efficiency component in price setting.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: In the prospectus of the water share offers in November 1989, Dwr Cymru stated that it intended to reduce the proportion of water lost through leakages and otherwise unaccounted for to 25 per cent. by 2012. As part of its "K" investment programme the company is to spend £550 million, at November 1989 prices, on its distribution system by 31 March 2000. The company also set out in the prospectus its objectives in relation to the replacement and relining of its mains.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what reports have been made by Welsh Water on progress made in reducing the proportion of water between reservoir and consumer since privatisation.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: This is a matter for the Director General of Water Services.

CIVIL SERVICE

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask Minister for the Civil Service when his Department last conducted a survey of the ethnic origins of its employees; when it next plans to do so; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The last survey was conducted in 1986. There are no plans to repeat it, but the enthnic origins of all entrants to the department are monitored on a continuous basis.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Peru (Cholera)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what specific medical resource is available to help the people of Peru combat the outbreak of cholera.

Mrs. Chalker: The Government of Peru, with assistance from the World Health Organisation, has identified the medical requirements and requested external assistance. The international community, including Britain, has responded positively to this request.

ENERGY

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what steps he has taken to recruit members of ethnic minorities in top grades of employment at his Department.

Mr. Wakeham: Recruitment to senior grades is carried out by the Civil Service Commission on behalf of my Department. The commission has taken a number of steps to encourage applications from the ethnic minorities and to ensure that selection procedures are non-discriminatory. These include publicity in the ethnic minority press, increasing representation of ethnic minority members on selection panels, training in equal opportunities issues and validation of selection procedures to ensure that they are non-discriminatory.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many and what percentage of officers in each grade (1 to 7) and overall in the Department are (a) women and (b) from ethnic minorities, respectively.

Mr. Wakeham: As at 1 January 1991 there were no women in grades 1 to 4; at grade 5 there were five, or 12·5 per cent., at grade 6 there was one, or 4·5 per cent., and at grade 7 there were 14 or 10 per cent. The information supplied voluntarily in the most recent ethnic origin survey shows one person, or 0·5 per cent., of grades 1 to 7 is from the ethnic minorities.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when his Department last conducted a survey of the ethnic origins of its employees; when it next plans to do so; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Wakeham: The last survey was conducted in the spring of 1990, and a top-up survey is currently in progress. Further surveys will be carried out as the need arises, initially on an annual basis.

Electricity Prices

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he or any of his Ministers or officials have been in touch with regional electricity companies about their proposed price increases for domestic electricity consumers.

Mr. Wakeham: I and my Ministers and officials are in regular contact with the regional electricity companies on a range of electricity matters.

Pollution Tax

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what studies he has made of the effect of a pollution tax on (a) fossil fuels and (b) fossil fuels used to supplement electricity generation under the non-fossil fuel obligations.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Government's policy on the use of economic instruments for environmental protection is set out in the White Paper "This Common Inheritance". In the long term, action to control emissions will inevitably have to include increases, achieved by taxation or other means, in the relative price of energy. However, the White Paper made clear the Government's intention not to introduce any such measures in the next few years outside the transport sector. Analytical work continues in support of this policy.

Plutonium

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Newport, West of 25 February, Official Report, column 345, how much of the 3·5 tonnes of plutonium sent abroad, or the 0·5 tonnes of plutonium held on behalf of foreign customers at Sellafield, was reprocessed and stored or exported by British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. before the tripartite safeguards agreement between the United Kingdom and Euratom/IAEA was agreed.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Some 40 per cent. of the plutonium referred to by the hon. Member was sent abroad or stored by British Nuclear Fuels plc before the United Kingdom/Euratom/IAEA safeguards agreement —Infcirc-263—came into force in 1978. All plutonium arising from reprocessing spent fuel at Sellafield on behalf of overseas customers has been subject to Euratom safeguards since 1973 and to the terms of that tripartite agreement.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Newport, West of 25 February, Official Report, column 345, what proportion of the 3·5 tonnes of foreign origin plutonium to which he refers arose from contracts for reprocessing nuclear fuel from abroad signed prior to the end of 1975.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Specific details of the Company's contracts are a commercial matter for British Nuclear Fuels plc.

Radioactive Wastes

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy for what time periods the low, intermediate and high level radioactive wastes respectively, arising from the reprocessing of foreign spent oxide nuclear fuel at the thermal oxide reprocessing plant at Sellafield, may be stored at the site before being repatriated.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Contracts containing provisions for the return of waste from reprocessing during the first 10 years of operation of British Nuclear Fuel's thermal oxide reprocessing plant allow a period of up to 25 years following the year of reprocessing for the return of conditioned waste. Contracts signed in 1990 for reprocessing in the second 10 years of THORP operations provide that conditioned waste will normally be returned within five years.

It is planned to return high-level waste, which contains 98 per cent. of the activity of all wastes, as soon as practicable after vitrification. The detailed negotiation of this programme is a matter for BNFL and its customers who must complete facilities for the receipt and storage of the vitrified waste before it can be returned. It is expected that even for the initial baseload contracts the return will begin within five to 10 years of the fuel being reprocessed.

Oil and Gas (GDP)

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has on the proportion of the gross domestic product of each of the countries of the European Community and Norway and Sweden which is derived from oil and gas production; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: In 1990 extraction of mineral oil and natural gas accounted for about 2 per cent. of United Kingdom gross domestic product at current factor cost. The corresponding percentage is zero for Belgium, Luxembourg, Portugal and Sweden. Comparable figures for Denmark, France, Ireland, Italy, Germany, Greece, Netherlands, Spain and Norway are not readily available.

PRIME MINISTER

IRA Terrorism

Mr. Latham: To ask the Prime Minister whether he will make a statement on the Government's programme to combat IRA terrorism in Northern Ireland and mainland Britain.

The Prime Minister: The Government remain totally committed to defeating terrorism, whether it emanates from the Provisional IRA, or from other Northern Irish terrorist groups.

In Northern Ireland, we will continue with the security policy described by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in his statement of 8 November 1990.

In order to ensure that anti-terrorist legislation is appropriate to the current security threat, the Government have laid before Parliament the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Bill. In addition to re-enacting virtually all the provisions of the existing emergency law this Bill would provide the police and armed forces with the legal means to protect the community effectively, and at the same time provide appropriate safeguards for individuals. The specific proposals before Parliament include new powers to examine documents; a new criminal offence of possession of items intended for terrorist purposes; new powers in relation to closed crossings on the Anglo-Irish land border; a new offence of directing the activities of an organisation concerned in terrorism; new powers to enable the Secretary of State to make statutory codes of practice in connection with the exercise of emergency powers; and new powers to facilitate the investigation of terrorist financing and to confiscate the assets of those who have gained personally from their involvement in this.

In Great Britain, responsibility for protecting the public from the threat of attack from the Provisional IRA rests primarily with the police. The Government welcomed the appointment last year by the Association of Chief Police Officers of the head of the Metropolitan police anti-terrorist branch as national co-ordinator of PIRA investigations. The Government will seek to ensure that the police have the right structure for combating terrorism; that they have sufficient resources; and that they have sufficient powers. To this end it is in the Government's view essential that the House should approve the continuation of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989. The Act contains special provisions for the proscription of Irish terrorist organisations; for the exclusion of suspected terrorists from Great Britain, Northern Ireland and the United Kingdom as a whole; for the restraint and confiscation of terrorist funds; for the arrest and detention without charge of suspected terrorists for a maximum period of seven days on the authority of the Secretary of State; and for the system of police controls at ports and airports throughout the United Kingdom.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Prime Minister how many and what percentage of officers in each grade (1-7) and overall in the Cabinet Office are (a) women and (b) from ethnic minorities, respectively.

The Prime Minister: The number of women and ethnic minorities in each grade (1-7) and overall serving in the Cabinet Office is:

2	1	6	0	0
5	9	18	1	2
Overall in the Cabinet Office	839	56	51	3·5

The Gulf

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister when Her Majesty's Government first learned of the announcement made on Baghdad radio on 25 February that Iraqi forces were withdrawing from Kuwait; at what time an authoritative English translation of the announcement was made; and whether he made any contact with allied partners in Operation Granby as a result of the radio statement.

The Prime Minister: The substance of the Baghdad radio broadcast, made at 2230 hours GMT on 25 February, became known to us at 2245 hours GMT. A full English translation became available to us at 2324 hours GMT. We are in constant touch with our coalition partners over many aspects of the Gulf crisis.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister what assessment was made of the applicability of Geneva convention article 23 before allied airforces in Operation Granby were given orders to bomb convoys of Iraqi military forces withdrawing from Kuwait.

The Prime Minister: Article 23 of the regulations attached to Hague convention IV of 1907 states that it is especially forbidden to kill or wound an enemy who, having laid down his arms, or having no longer means of defence, has surrendered at discretion. The coalition made it clear that it would not attack unarmed Iraqi soldiers, but that retreating formed combat units continued to pose a threat and would therefore be treated as hostile.

International Agreements

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister if he will now make it his policy for Ministers of Her Majesty's Government to answer questions from Members that seek clarification of Her Majesty's Government's interpretation of international treaties, agreements and United Nations resolutions to which the United Kingdom is a party and affect policy decisions of the Government.

The Prime Minister: It has always been our policy to answer hon. Members' questions as well as we can.

THE ARTS

Crafts Council

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Minister for the Arts whether he has any plans to increase the level of Government funding to the Crafts Council.

Mr. Renton: The Government's current level of funding to the Crafts Council is £2·52 million. Under the latest settlement, this funding will increase to £2·815 million in both 1991-92 and 1992-93, and increase further in 1993-94 to £2·885 million. The figures for 1991-92 include an exceptional additional allocation of £65,000 for incentive funding to use in connection with the move to new premises.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Minister for the Arts what has been the level of funding granted to the Crafts Council in each year from 1979 onwards; and what are the estimated grants for the Crafts Council up until 1992-93.

Mr. Renton: Details of the level of funding granted to the Crafts Council in each year from 1979 onwards are set out in the table. Under the latest settlement, the estimated grant for the Crafts Council is £2,815 million for each year of 1991-92 and 1992-93.

1979-80	1·148
1980-81	1·260
1981-82	1·525
1982-83	1·600
1983-84	1·665
1984-85	1·777
1985-86	1·880
1986-87	1·925
1987-88	2·022
1988-89	2·250
1989-90	2·350
1990-91	2·520

Welsh Arts Council

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Minister for the Arts how many separate grants and other payments have been made by the Welsh Arts Council during the last three years; and how many grants issued were of amounts less than 5,000.

Mr. Renton: The information requested is as follows:

1989-90—409 grants and subsidies (263 less than £5,000);

1988-89—440 grants and subsidies (308 less than £5,000);
1987-88—369 grants and subsidies (260 less than £5,000).

The Gulf

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Minister for the Arts what information he has, pursuant to his oral answer of 18 February, Official Report, column 12, relating to the Kuwait museum of islamic antiquities, the museums and shrines of Najaf and Kerbaka, Babylon and Ur of the Chaldees, and the museum in Baghdad housing Sumerian antiquities.

Mr. Renton: The Office of Arts and Libraries has no responsibility for museums or religious and cultural sites in Iraq or Kuwait.

My answer of 18 February referred to the removal by Iraq of the contents of the Kuwait museum of Islamic antiquities. I have no information relating to the museums and shrines of Najaf and Kerbaka, Babylon and Ur of the Chaldes and the museum in Baghdad housing Sumerian antiquities. Newspaper reports have speculated about the possibility of damage being caused to cultural and religious sites in Iraq and Kuwait, but I have no means of substantiating these reports.

Departmental Policies (Environmental Implications)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Minister for the Arts what actions have been taken since the appointment of a Minister in his Department to consider the environmental implications of his Department's policies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton [holding answer 1 March 1991]: The environmental implications of the Department's policies are my responsibility. Consideration is given to them as appropriate in consultation with arts bodies, but particularly with the institutions which my Office sponsors. Arts organisations contribute considerably to the enhancement of the environment through conservation activity, assistance towards inner city regeneration, ecological and other research programmes.

HEALTH

Incontinence Services

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the existing project on incontinence drawing on evidence from the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys surveys started; when he expects it to finish; who is carrying out the project; and how the results will be used in developing the incontinence services.

Mr. Dorrell: The project, undertaken by the social policy research unit, university of York, commenced in September 1990 and is scheduled for completion in April 1991. The purpose is to relate the OPCS data to previous United Kingdom research on incontinence and incontinence services so as to establish a starting point for measuring outcomes.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the meeting between the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State on 15 January with representatives from the Spinal Injuries Association, Age Concern England and the Association of Continence Advisers on the incontinence services; what were the views expressed by those organisations; and what was his response.

Mr. Dorrell: It was agreed that, across the country, there were wide variations in the level of services to people with incontinence. The Department is looking at how best to tackle this problem. In the meantime the NHS management executive has written to all district health authorities drawing their attention to existing policy guidelines on continence services, and reminding them of the need not to expose vulnerable patients or clients to anxiety as a result of any proposed changes in arrangements for the supply of incontinence pads.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health who will carry out the project on the role of continence advisers due to start in April 1991; with whom they will consult and work; within what financial parameter they will look at the future roles of continence advisers; and when he expects the project to finish.

Mr. Dorrell: The project will be conducted by the social policy research unit, university of York, and is expected to take two years. The researchers aim to make contact with all existing continence advisers, a representative sample of health and social service managers, and other interested parties. The researchers are free to make whatever recommendations they think appropriate.

Elderly People

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of the population was over the age of 65 years in 1961, 1970, 1980, and 1990; and if he will give estimates for the years 2000, 2010, 2020 and 2030.

Mr. Dorrell: Estimated and projected percentages of the population of England and Wales aged 65 and over are as follows:

	Per cent.
Mid-year estimate:
1970	13·2
1980	15·1
[1]1989	15·8
Projections (1989-based):
1990	15·8
2000	15·7
2010	16·1
2020	18·0
[2]2029	20·0

[1] Latest available estimate.
[2] Last available projection.

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the Government's current policy towards the elderly; if he will comment on funding arrangements of organisations connected with the elderly; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The Government's policy for elderly people comprises two main aims: the first is to provide services which enable people to maintain their independence for as long as possible and, after any period of hospital care, to return to their homes or to homely settings in the community as soon as possible; the second is to provide care and treatment appropriate to the individual patient—this may involve community nursing at home, domiciliary social services, acute hospital care, rehabilitation or long-stay medical or nursing care.

It is for each health and local authority to determine the type and level of provision they provide in the light of local circumstances and priorities. In drawing up their community care plans we expect the statutory agencies to work together to ensure that they are compatible and comprehensive taking account of provision in the independent sector and of the individual needs and wishes of the elderly people themselves and their carers.

Under section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968, the Department of Health funds a number of voluntary organisations who work with and for elderly people.

Expenditure

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has on the level of health expenditure in Scotland, England and Wales for each of the last 10 years at constant prices.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is given in the table.

Gross NHS expenditure at 1990-91 prices

£ million

	England	Scotland	Wales
1981-82	18,909	2,555	1,177
1982-83	19,250	2,587	1,212
1983-84	19,533	2,641	1,230
1984-85	19,989	2,695	1,266
1985-86	20,061	2,707	1,281
1986-87	20,875	2,786	1,332
1987-88	21,768	2,870	1,399
1988-89	22,524	2,977	1,459
1989-90	22,830	3,046	1,486
1990-91	23,718	3,102	1,554

GDP

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has on the proportion of the gross domestic product in each of the countries of the European Community and Norway and Sweden which is spent on health; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The information required is in the table:

Total Expenditure on Health as a propottion of GDP (1987): EC Countries, Norway and Sweden

	Per cent.
Belgium	7·2
Denmark	6·0
France	8·5
Germany	8·1
Greece	5·3
Ireland	7·4
Italy	7·2
Luxembourg	7·5
Netherlands	8·5
Norway	7·5
Portugal	6·4
Spain	6·0
Sweden	9·2
United Kingdom	6·0

The proportion of GDP spent on health care is indicative neither of the efficiency with which resources are used, nor of health outcomes.

Baby Milk Powder

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will take action to ban any advertising of baby milk powders that suggests that those products are as good as or better than the baby's mother's milk.

Mr. Dorrell: The Government are committed to the protection and promotion of breastfeeding as the best means of nurturing infants. Our policies and programmes are based on unequivocal expert advice from the Committee on Medical Aspects of Food Policy (COMA) and on the principles of the World Health Organisation's "International Code of Marketing of Breast-Milk Substitutes". The latter includes recommendations on the restriction of general advertising of baby milk powders, formally known as infant formulae.

In the United Kingdom the marketing of infant formulae is closely controlled under voluntary self-regulating arrangements which the United Kingdom manufacturers drew up in consultation with the Government in the early 1980s. It is under these arrangements that we have acted on the WHO recommendations. Details of the arrangements are set out in the publication "Code of Practice for the Marketing of Infant Formulae in the United Kingdom and Schedule for a Code Monitoring Committee". The code of practice specifically states that "no advertising should imply that infant formulae are equivalent or superior to the milk of a healthy mother" and restricts such advertising to publications aimed at health care professionals.

Copies of the WHO and United Kingdom codes of practice are in the Library.

Food Poisoning

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the number of cases notified to him in 1990, for 1990 by region, for (a) food poisoning in general, (b) salmonella (c) salmonella enteritidis, (d) salmonella enteritidis P4, (e) salmonella typhimurium, (f) campylobacter and (g) listeriosis.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 25 February 1991]: The information requested has been placed in the Library.

The data show notifications of food poisoning to the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys and laboratory reports of specific organisms to the Public Health Laboratory Service's communicable disease surveillance centre.

DEFENCE

Antares

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to publish the results of the inquiry into the sinking of the vessel Antares from Carradale; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Departmental consideration of the board of inquiry report has not yet been completed. I will, however, make a summary of its findings available to the House in due course. I am at present unable to say when this will be.

Air Publications and Forms Store

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he now expects the air publications and forms store to be moved from the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Current planning for the move of the air publications and forms store from Woolwich to Llangennech allows for a phased transfer over the period April 1991 to December 1992.

Iraqi Nationals

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central of 19 February, Official Report, column 137, how many Iraqi nationals detained at Rollestone remain there; and how many have been released.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A total of 32 Iraqi nationals are detained as prisoners of war at Rollestone; three others have been released.

1st Armoured Division

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those units under the command of 1st Armoured division.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The main units under the command of the 1st (British) Armoured Division are as follows:

The Gulf

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what guidance was given to British pilots in the allied forces involved in Operation Granby to assess whether the Iraqi troop carriers, withdrawing from Kuwait, contained any Kuwaiti citizens kidnapped by Iraqis, before bombing of the convoys in southern Iraq took place.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Allied forces had instructions to attack retreating Iraqi units which could continue to pose a threat.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Treasury last conducted a survey of the ethnic origins of its employees; when it next plans to do so; and whether he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: A survey of members of staff for whom no ethnic origins information was held was undertaken in December 1990. As a result, the total proportion of Treasury staff for whom ethnic origin data are held now stands at 84 per cent.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he has taken to recruit members of ethnic minorities in top grades of employment at the Treasury.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Recruitment to senior grades of the civil service is undertaken by the Civil Service Commission. The commission has taken a number of steps to aid recruitment of members of the ethnic minorities including increasing representation of ethnic minorities in its liaison and selection panels; ensuring that its recruitment brochures reflect a multi-racial work force; and organising training which highlights equal opportunity issues concerning ethnic minorities.

Male Earnings

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the change in the take home pay of a married man on average pay with two children since 1 April 1975; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: The real net income of a family with two children aged under 11 years, in which the husband has average earnings, rose by 32 per cent. in real terms between 1974-75 and 1990-91; all but 1 per cent. of this rise took place after 1978-79.

Foreign Travel

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has on the percentage of the gross domestic product in the United Kingdom which has been spent on foreign travel by British citizens travelling abroad in 1960, 1970, 1980 and 1990.

Mr. Maples: The percentage of gross domestic product which has been spent on foreign travel by British citizens travelling abroad is as follows:

	Percentage
1980	1·18
1989	1·84
1990	[1]—

[1] Data not yet available.

These figures have been derived from gross domestic product data and travel data which are found on the CSO database, which can be accessed through the House of Commons Library.

GDP

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has on the gross domestic product of each of the countries of the European Community and Norway and Sweden; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maples: Figures of gross domestic product analysed by country are shown in the monthly OECD publication "Main Economic Indicators", of which copies are available in the Library of the House.

National Insurance

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list all the points on the income scale for a single man with the standard allowance at which the combined national insurance and marginal rates alter; and if he will list those rates.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 25 February 1991]: Information for 1990-91 is given in the table.

Levels of income at which the marginal rate of income tax and national insurance contributions of a single person[1] changes, 1990-91

Weekly income	Marginal rate of income tax and national insurance contributions[2]
£	Per cent.
57·79	34
350·00	25
455·87	40

[1] Assumed to be non-aged with no reliefs or allowances other than the single personal allowance.

[2] Class 1 national insurance contributions for an employee contracted into the state earnings-related pension scheme (SERPS).

Income Tax

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost in a full tax year of returning to schedule D those income tax payers in the theatrical, writing, television and allied industries who have recently been transferred to schedule E; and if he will also estimate the cost of continuing to tax these categories as schedule E but restoring all new expenses previously allowed under schedule D.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 25 February 1991]: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Mortgage Tax Relief

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much the £30,000 limit could be raised to give a revenue neutral change if mortgage tax relief were restricted to the basic rate.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 25 February 1991]: To about £37,000 on the basis of 1990-91 figures. The estimate excludes behavioural effects.

Business Expansion Scheme

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what was (a) the total amount invested in the business expansion scheme, (b) the amount invested in private rented housing, (c) the total cost of tax relief and (d) the amount of tax relief in respect of investment in private rented housing, for each year from 1987-88 to 1989-90;

(2) for each of the years of the existence of the business expansion scheme, what were the percentages and amounts of BES money invested in residential and assured tenancy schemes and the associated revenue foregone by the Exchequer.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 25 February 1991]: The business expansion scheme was extended to include investment in private rented housing in 1988-89. The latest estimates are shown in the table.

	Amounts invested			Cost of income tax relief
	Total	Of which investment in private rented housing		Total	Of which in respect of investment in private rented housing
	(£ million)	Amount (£ million)	Percentage	(£ million)	(£ million)

[1]1989-90	225	165	75	75	55

[1] Provisional estimates.
Information is not yet available for 1990-91.

Profit-related Pay

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people are currently in profit-related pay schemes; how many were in, in each of the years since it was introduced; how many registered schemes have existed in each year; and what is the distribution of schemes by number of people in them.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 25 February 1991]: The information is shown in the table. There were about 290,000 employees participating in PRP schemes at the end of January 1991.

	Live registered schemes as at December
	1987	1988	1989	1990
Number of participants
1-50	244	517	650	711
51-100	64	114	149	165
101-500	88	156	245	268
501-1,000	23	28	37	49
Above 1,000	11	15	31	40
Total schemes	430	830	1,112	1,233
Participating employees	72,000	122,000	226,000	263,000

Payroll Giving

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people participated in the payroll giving scheme in each year of the scheme's existence; what total sums were given to charities as a result of the scheme in each year; and what was the cost to the Exchequer in each year.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 25 February 1991]: Estimates are as follows:

	Payroll giving scheme
Year	Donors (thousands)	Donations (£ million)	Cost of tax relief (£ million)
1987-88	55	1·0	0·3
1988-89	120	3·5	1·0
[1]1989-90	190	7·0	2·0
[1]1990-91	250	10·0	3·0

[1] Provisional.

Private Medical Insurance

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many of those benefiting from tax relief on private medical insurance are pensioners; and what is the income distribution of those people who gain.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 25 February 1991]: It is estimated that tax relief on private medical insurance for the over-60s will benefit some 600,000 individuals with 330,000 policies in 1990-91. The further details requested are not available.

Company Cars

Mr. Beith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the yield from increasing the company car scale charges in 1991-92 by (i) 10 per cent., (ii) 20 per cent. and (iii) 30 per cent.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 26 February 1991]: The yield in a full year from increasing the company car scale charges in 1991-92 by 10 per cent., 20 per cent., and 30 per cent. is provisionally estimated at £120 million, £240 million and £360 million, respectively.

The Gulf

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for each country making a contribution to the United Kingdom's costs in the Gulf conflict (a) the amount promised, (b) the amount received so far and (c) the dates which he expects payments to be made; and what are the totals of such contributions (i) promised, (ii) received and (iii) expected in each quarter.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 26 February 1991]: In addition to the information given in my right hon. Friend's reply of 26 February, column 443, to my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins), we have learnt that the Danish payment of DKr90 million, or about £8 million, was made on 26 February. The first of three tranches of $167 million, or about £85 million, was received from the United Arab Emirates on 28 February. As of noon on Friday, 1 March, we had also been promised £15 million by the Belgian Government. At this stage, the timing of future payments is not known.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his current estimate of the total cost of Government spending in 1990-91 and 1991-92 of the Gulf war; and what is his estimate of the effects on the British economy.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 26 February 1991]: In 1990-91 provision has been made for additional defence spending as a result of the Gulf crisis of £780 million, of which £40 million was absorbed within the existing defence budget. An extra £9·5 million has been provided for health, additional provision totalling a further £9·5 million made on FCO votes and there are also smaller costs, which have been absorbed, on some other public expenditure programmes. About £160 million worth of claims has been paid by ECGD to exporters against defaults by Iraq.

The effect on Government spending in 1991-92 cannot yet be estimated. The Government are committed to substantial additional costs for defence, but these will be spread over some years and are very uncertain. The indications at this stage are that eventual defence costs may be up to the £3 billion mark. This figure does not take account of contributions pledged by other countries towards the United Kingdom's costs. The balance of claims against ECGD are likely to be paid over the next 5 to 6 years.

The impact of the Gulf war on the United Kingdom and world economies is uncertain and difficult to separate from other factors. A revised economic forecast will be published at Budget time.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current total subsidy to mortgage tax relief (a) for higher rate taxpayers, (b) for lower rate taxpayers and (c) for those lower rate taxpayers buying their first home.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 28 February 1991]: The estimated cost of mortgage interest relief in 1990-91 can be analysed as follows:

	Cost £ billion
Higher rate taxpayers	1·1
Basic rate taxpayers	6·3
Non-taxpayers	0·4
Total	7·8

Information on mortgage interest relief for first-time buyers is not separately available.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Statutory Instruments (Prayers)

40. Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many prayers against statutory instruments have been debated in the current parliamentary Session; and how many prayers have been tabled.

Mr. MacGregor: Up to and including 25 February, 43 motions for an address for the annulment of statutory instruments have been tabled this Session. Of these, one has been debated on the Floor of the House. In addition, seven instruments subject to negative resolution have been referred to Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, and four have so far been considered.

Space Audit

41. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will make a statement about the results of the space audit of the Palace of Westminster and its associated buildings.

Mr. MacGregor: The space audit is being undertaken by the Parliamentary Works Office to provide an authoritative record of the use of all the accommodation on the parliamentary estate, and a qualitative assessment, particularly of the areas used as offices. The consultants' recommendations, together with advice on space standards, are now being evaluated by the New Building Sub-Committee before it takes decisions on the accommodation needs to be included in the brief for the next phase of the new parliamentary building.

Office Accommodation

42. Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Lord President of the Council whether he has any plans to bid for rental accommodation now available in close proximity of the House to enable Members to have more office accommodation; what constraints there are on his doing so; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: A number of properties are under consideration by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to provide additional space for the House.

Parliamentary Procedures

43. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Lord President of the Council whether he has any further statements to make regarding new parliamentary procedures and hours of work.

Mr. MacGregor: No.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Lord President of the Council whether he will review arrangements for the internal collection and delivery of hon. Members' correspondence to and from constituents.

Mr. MacGregor: The Members' Post Office receives and sorts Members' incoming mail for collection or redirection daily; outgoing mail is collected at set times, by Post Office staff, from boxes in the Palace and outbuildings for onward transmission by the Post Office. I have no plans to review the arrangements at present but I know that the Serjeant-at-Arms will wish to try to meet any particular problems which the hon. Member may wish to draw to his attention.

Parliamentary Statistics

Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council since 1979, how many (a) Bills, (b) orders, (c) schemes, (d) regulations, (e) affirmative resolutions and (f) negative resolutions have been passed; and if he will make a statement on the trends.

Mr. MacGregor: The following information is available:

(a) Since the beginning of the 1979-80 Session, 748 Public and Provisional Order Bills and 290 Private Bills have received Royal Assent:

Session	Public Bills	Private Bills	Total
1979-80	102	40	142
1980-81	78	25	103
1981-82	59	25	84
1982-83	56	5	61
1983-84	76	37	113
1984-85	87	18	105
1985-86	77	38	115
1986-87	55	19	74
1987-88	62	33	95
1988-89	46	20	66
1989-90	45	28	73
[1]1990-91	5	2	7
Total	748	290	1,038

[1] Up to and including February 1991.

In Sessions 1979-80 to 1989-90 inclusive, 11 Public Bills were passed by the Commons but did not receive Royal Assent.

(b), (c) and (d). Orders, schemes and regulations, along with rules and directions, are types of Statutory Instruments. Figures for the numbers of each type considered by the House and made are not maintained. The following numbers of Statutory Instruments have been made each calendar year from 1979:

Year	Number
1979	1,770
1980	2,051
1981	1,892
1982	1,900
1983	1,965
1984	2,072
1985	2,080
1986	2,344
1987	2,278
1988	2,311
1989	2,503
Total	25,829

(e) Figures for the numbers of Statutory Instruments and other statutory papers (reports, codes of practice etc.) which are subject to affirmative resolution and have been so approved by the House are not readily available. The Joint and Select Committees on Statutory Instruments have considered the following numbers of Statutory Instruments subject to affirmative resolution procedure since 1979:

Session	Number
1980-81	130
1981-82	121
1982-83	99
1983-84	180
1984-85	158
1985-86	158
1986-87	117
1987-88	246
1988-89	160
Total	1,768

(f) Since 1979, one motion for an Address to be presented to Her Majesty, praying that a statutory instrument be annulled (a "prayer") has been agreed to (on 31 October 1979). One motion to disapprove a statement of changes in immigration rules has been agreed to (on 15 December 1982). Figures for the numbers of statutory instruments and other papers laid pursuant to statute which are subject to negative resolution are not readily available. The Joint and Select Committees on Statutory Instruments have considered the following numbers of Statutory Instruments subject to negative resolution procedure since 1979:

Session	Number
1979-80	1,010·00
1980-81	755·00
1981-82	686·00
1982-83	455·00
1983-84	863·00
1984-85	637·00
1985-86	815·00
1986-87	462·00
1987-88	1,179·00
1988-89	854·00
1989-90	916·00
Total	8,632·00

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when his Department last conducted a survey of the ethnic origins of its employees; when it next plans to so so; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: A full survey of the ethnic origins of Foreign and Commonwealth Office staff was conducted in 1986-87. It is kept up to date with information on new staff and leavers. Non-respondents in the diplomatic wing are to be re-surveyed in the next few weeks. The aid wing conducts periodic resurveys of non-respondents. The FCO attaches importance to its departmental programme for action on race as a means of ensuring that it recruits, develops and retains the best qualified people regardless of ethnic origin.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he has taken to recruit members of ethnic minorities in top grades of employment at the Foreign Office.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Recruitment to the most senior entry grade is conducted for us by the Civil Service Commission, which has taken various steps to improve ethnic minority recruitment. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office has produced its own recruitment materials which reflect a multi-racial work force, and often places features and advertises vacancies in ethnic minority media.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many and what percentage of officers in each grade (1-7) and overall in his Department are (a) women and (b) from ethnic minorities, respectively.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The information available is as follows:

Diplomatic wing

(a) The figures at 28 February 1991 for the diplomatic wing, including both home civil service grades 1 to 7 and the diplomatic service equivalents, are as follows:

	Total women in grade	Women as percentage of total in grade
[1]HCS4	0	0
HCS7	43	8·66

[1] no equivalent DS grade.

Overall there are 3,312 women in the diplomatic wing, equivalent to 46·8 per cent. of staff.

(b) According to the diplomatic wing's ethnic survey 96 staff, or 1·4 per cent. of the payroll, have declared themselves to be of ethnic minority origin. The survey is, of course, voluntary.

I regret that I am unable to provide a breakdown of the figures by grade.

Aid wing

(a) In January 1990 there were 35 women at HCS grades 1 to 7, representing 10·9 per cent of the total at those grades. A more detailed breakdown is not available. Overall there were 662 women in the aid wing, or 43·4 per cent. of staff.

(b) According to the aid wing's ethnic survey 1·5 per cent. of HCS grades 1 to 7 are of ethnic minority origin. Overall, 3·79 per cent. of the total payroll of 1,525 staff have declared themselves to be of ethnic minority origin. The survey is voluntary. A breakdown of figures by grade is not available.

BBC World Service

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further steps are being taken to improve the reception of the BBC World Service for British forces.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: In addition to the substantial measures already taken to improve reception in the Gulf since the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait, by increasing the number of frequencies and extending the hours of broadcasting, arrangements for high quality local rebroadcasting of the World Service are in hand. The arrangements made through the Services Sound and Vision Corporation to bring BBC World Service programmes to troops in the Gulf over special channels are a matter for the Secretary of State for Defence. British forces, as well as the wider public, in other parts of the world are benefiting from a 10-year programme of investment in audibility which is now almost complete.

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further steps he is taking to improve the reception of the BBC World Service to the Gulf area generally.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Substantial improvements have already been made, following the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait. The BBC has increased the number of shortwave frequencies serving the Gulf and the time that they are available. High-power medium wave transmissions have been added to provide additional coverage throughout the night hours. In addition, arrangements for high-quality local rebroadcasting of the BBC World Service are in hand.

Sri Lanka

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government will urge the Sri Lankan Government to establish an immediate ceasefire with the Tamil Tigers and use the good offices of the Australian Prime Minister or those of the Commonwealth to mediate in the conflict between the two sides.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Before urging the Sri Lankan Government to arrange a further ceasefire with the LTTE, the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, with or without international mediation, Her Majesty's Government would need to be convinced that conditions existed for meaningful negotiations to take place thereafter based on recognition of the unity, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Sri Lanka and of the need to satisfy the legitimate aspirations of all its citizens through preservation of its multi-ethnic and multi-lingual character.

Bulgaria

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what were the practical results of the recent visit of President Zhelev of Bulgaria to this country.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told President Zhelev that we would extend the know-how fund to Bulgaria. Cultural and a cultural centres agreements were signed. President Zhelev also accepted a gift of pharmaceuticals from Her Majesty's Government. There will be a further announcement shortly.

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on relations between the United Kingdom and Bulgaria.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: United Kingdom-Bulgarian relations have been raised to a new level by President Zhelev's highly successful visit. We were pleased to be able to show our support for reform in Bulgaria.

Hong Kong

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the number of Hong Kong Chinese who have sought to enter the United Kingdom under the British Government proposals, as of the 25 February.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the number of applications for United Kingdom passports lodged by Hong Kong residents on the final date for application.

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will seek a report from the governor of Hong Kong on the number of applications received for United Kingdom passports under the British Nationality (Hong Kong) Act 1990; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many applications were received for United Kingdom passports under the British Nationality (Hong Kong) Act 1990, as at 28 February;

(3) what were the reasons for the number of applications for United Kingdom passports under the British Nationality (Hong Kong) Act 1990 being substantially less than anticipated by the governor of Hong Kong; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The number of applications received is substantially less than the total number of people in Hong Kong who were eligible to apply. Because the scheme is objective and transparent, potential applicants were able to assess accurately their prospects of success. It seems likely that many people who believed that they would not succeed did not apply.

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many applications had been received in Hong Kong for British passports at the end of the deadline date of 28 February.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The number of applications received up to midnight Hong Kong time on 28 February was 57,862. This is not, however, the final figure. Registered mail applications posted up to 28 February will also be accepted.

Lebanon

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps are being taken to secure the removal of Israeli forces from southern Lebanon.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We believe that the full implementation of the 1989 Taif accord is the best means to achieve Lebanon's territorial integrity, sovereignty and independence. We reiterated our support for the accord in the unanimous vote to renew the UNIFIL masdate on 30 January and in the EC declaration on the Gulf of 19 February.

Baltic States

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what input he has had with regard to the advice offered to United Kingdom business men who wish to exploit business opportunities in the Baltic states.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We keep in touch with the Department of Trade and Industry and the British embassy in Moscow over commercial opportunities in the Baltic states.

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to set up honorary consular facilities in the Baltic republics; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have no such plans at present.

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether there are any representatives of the British Government who are based in the Baltic republics and who have the remit to exploit trade and commercial opportunities on behalf of British industry.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No. The British embassy in Moscow has responsibility for assisting export promotion in the Baltic states. Members of the embassy visit the region and assess opportunities there.

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give the name and address of the nearest United Kingdom consular representative to each of the Baltic states.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Her Majesty's consul in Moscow, Mr. Paul Massey, is responsible for consular matters in the Baltic states. The address of the consulate is Naberezhnaya Morisa Toreza 14, Moscow 72.

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the names of those countries which maintain consular offices and personnel in the Baltic states.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: According to the information available to us, the following countries maintain consular offices and personnel in the Baltic republics:

Latvia (Riga)
Sweden: branch of Leningrad—Consulate-General
Estonia (Tallinn)
Sweden: branch of Leningrad—Consulate-General
Finland: branch of Leningrad—Consulate-General
Lithuania (Vilnius)
Poland: Consul ad hoc of the Polish republic in residence in Vilnius.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many and what percentage of officers in each grade (1-7) and overall in the department are (a) women and (b) from ethnic minorities, respectively.

Mr. Eggar: The number and percentage of women in each grade requested and the overall number in the Department are as follows:

Grade 4	2	25
Grade 5	26	21
Grade 6	114	27
Grade 7	46	25
Overall	1,525	54

We do not hold information on the ethnic origin of all our staff, but of those who have responded to the ethnic monitoring survey (98 per cent.) carried out last year, those from ethnic minorities were:

	Number	Per cent.
Grade 5-6	4	1
Grade 7	5	3
Overall	184	6·4

The survey was conducted on the understanding that anonymity would be preserved. Any further breakdown of the figures could identify individuals and cannot therefore be provided.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he has taken to recruit members of ethnic minorities in top grades of employment at his Department.

Mr. Eggar: Recruitment of grades above administrative officer is carried out by the Civil Service Commission which has taken steps to aid recruitment of members of the ethnic minorities. For the grades of administrative officer and below, where the Department recruits direct, we are trying to widen our recruitment field, particularly to those from ethnic minorities, by using centrally devised tests as an alternative to formal qualifications.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when his Department last conducted a survey of the ethnic origins of its employees; when it next plans to do so; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: A survey of the ethnic origins of staff was carried out last summer and the database is now continually updated as now staff join the Department. This Department launched its own programme of action to achieve equality of opportunity for people of ethnic minority origin in June last year. We have already achieved the objective to establish ethnic origin data on 98 per cent. of our staff.

Health Education and Physical Education

Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the position of health education and physical education in the core curriculum and on how they relate to each other.

Mr. Atkins: Health education is a cross-curricular theme within the curriculum as a whole, including physical education. The terms of reference of the national curriculum working group on physical education asked it to consider the contribution which physical education can make to health education. The interim report of the group, published in February 1991, identified ways in which this contribution can be made. A copy of the report has been placed in the Library.

Licensed Teachers

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list those local education authorities who are currently employing licensed teachers indicating (i) the numbers employed by each authority, (ii) how many are graduates and (iii) how many are non-graduates who met the necessary criteria.

Mr. Fallon: On 28 February 439 licensed teachers were employed by local education authorities in England and Wales and, of these, 290 were graduates. The number of licensed teachers employed by individual local education authorities is as follows:

	Number
Avon	2
Barking and Dagenham	2

Secondary Schools, Torquay

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to reply to the letter dated 28 July 1990 concerning secondary school placement in Torquay from Mr. I. W. Morton of Kingshurst, Paignton road, Stoke Gabriel, Totnes, Devon TQ9 6SJ.

Mr. Fallon: Mr. Morton's letter, and those of seven other parents on the same subject, raised difficult questions about the Sex Discrimination Act and have required detailed consultation with the local education authority. Two letters have been sent to Mr. Morton advising him of the problem and apologising for the unavoidable delay. We will reply fully to Mr. Morton's inquiries as soon as we are in a position to do so.

National Association of Governors and Managers

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will undertake a review of the decision by his Department to grant funds to the National Association of Governors and Managers; and if he will make a statement.

(2) if he will suspend further payments to the National Association of Governors and Managers.

Mr. Fallon: A grant of up to £40,000 has been agreed for 1991-92. My right hon. and learned Friend is now considering a further application for funds.

Student Loans

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the current rate of student take-up of loans from the Student Loans Company; and what number of loans he estimates will have been taken out by the end of the 1990-91 academic year and 1991-92.

Mr. Alan Howarth: As at 28 February 1991, over 109,000 students have applied for a loan from the Student Loans Company. It is too early to say what the take-up rate will be for the current academic year or, of course, for the academic year 1991-92.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what number and percentage of applications the Student Loans Company has rejected to date.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Student Loans Company does not reject any valid applications from students whose institutions have correctly certified them as eligible.

Where the application form is invalid—because it has not been completed correctly—the company may need, in certain circumstance, to invite the student to reapply. I am asking the managing director of the company, which is responsible for the administration of the scheme, to write direct to the hon. Member, giving the number of cases where this has happened.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what costs he expects the Student Loans Company to face in collecting due loans, separating out (a) collection costs per loan for each year from 1990 to 2027, (b) annual collection costs for each year from 1990 to 2027 and (c) annual loss from loans deemed uncollectable, for the same period.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Information is not available in the form requested. The Student Loans Company expects to collect significant numbers of repayments from April 1992. The company does not yet have an approved budget for the financial year 1992-93. However, the Government have consistently forecast annual operational costs for the next few years within the range of £10 to 20 million.

The company will not regard any loans as uncollectable. Where a borrower is granted deferment, he need not make any repayments, although his outstanding loan will continue to be indexed in line with inflation. Where a borrower qualifies for cancellation, the student loans legislation provides for the debt to be cancelled: there is, therefore, nothing to collect. Where a borrower defaults on his repayments, the company will seek recovery of the full sum owed, if necessary by taking him to court.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the latest available figure for the number of student loans outstanding; and how much is owed.

Mr. Alan Howarth: As at 28 February 1991, the Student Loans Company had made 82,176 loans, to a total value of £31·095 million.

Chief Inspector of Schools (Annual Report)

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when the latest annual report of Her Majesty's senior chief inspector of schools was (a) made available to the press, and (b) placed before Parliament; and in what manner.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Copies of the report were made available to the press at 12.00 on 13 February, the day of publication. Copies were dispatched to the Vote Office by first-class post on the day before publication. Opposition spokesmen were sent copies and further copies were placed in the Library on the day of publication.

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make copies of the latest annual report of Her Majesty's senior chief inspector of schools available to hon. and Right hon. Members through the Vote Office.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: On 12 February 200 copies were sent to the Vote Office.

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science on what date he first saw a draft of the latest annual report of Her Majesty's senior chief inspector of schools, and whether any amendments to the draft were made at the suggestion of Ministers.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The senior chief inspector submitted his annual report to me on 4 February and it was published on 13 February.

Ministers made no suggestions of any changes to the report which was published in the form in which it was submitted.

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will set out in detail the procedures for the forthcoming appointment of a new holder of the office of Her Majesty's senior chief inspector of schools, including the nature of the involvement of Ministers in the appointment.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Civil Service Commission is organising an open competition which is being advertised widely in terms which I approved. Selection will be on merit and those selected for interview will appear before a board, chaired by the first civil service commissioner, on which my Department will be represented by senior officials and which will include a distinguished outside member. The board's recommendation will be made to me in the usual way. Her Majesty's inspectors of schools are appointed by Her Majesty the Queen, on the recommendation of the holder of my office, as required by section 77(2) of the Education Act 1944.

Wavertree Church of England School

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what capital works required at Wavertree Church of England school be authorised at the time of its establishment; when they will be completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon: Statutory proposals approved on 22 June 1990 provided for the site and buildings of Wavertree Church of England voluntary controlled school to be upgraded and extended as necessary in order to accommodate about 210 pupils, including pupils displaced by the closure of St. Mary's and St. Bridget's CE voluntary controlled primary schools.

In setting Liverpool's annual capital guideline (ACG) for 1991-92 we have taken full account of the authority's plans for this project. It is, however, for local education authorities to decide what capital projects to undertake, and when, taking account of their obligation to implement approved statutory proposals.

Barkestone Church of England School

Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on the future of the premises and property of Barkestone Church of England school, Leicestershire.

Mr. Fallon: The future of the premises and property of Barkestone Church of England school will be determined strictly in accordance with the provisions of the proposed Diocese of Leicester (Educational Endowments) Order 1991. The order authorises the Leicester diocesan board of education to sell any of the property of the schools comprised in the order and, until sale, to let or otherwise manage such properties according to the general law applicable to the management of property held on trust for charitable purposes. In the case of Barkestone Church of England school, the diocesan board of education has indicated that it will not sell the former school premises but make them available for local community purposes under a lease. The diocesan board has indicated also that the teacher's house will not be sold for the time being, although there are plans to sell the agricultural land which comprises part of the trust property.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Low-energy Light Bulbs

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he is taking to encourage the use of low-energy light bulbs in his Department's offices and other buildings.

Dr. Mawhinney: The use of low-energy lighting is being promoted as part of a major Government effort to increase energy efficiency, with the target of a 15 per cent. reduction in overall energy consumption in Government buildings by 1995. A recent consultative paper on energy efficiency issued by the Department of Economic Development highlighted a wide range of energy conservation measures, including low-energy lighting. Departments have been asked to identify areas where energy efficiency can be improved. Moreover, where necessary, the cost of worthwhile projects will be taken into account when financial allocations are being made.

Royal Mail

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what discussions he has had with the chairman of the Post Office on the reorganisation of the royal mail service in Northern Ireland;

(2) what assessment he has made of the effect of the reorganisation of the royal mail service in Northern Ireland on unemployment in the constituency of South Down.

Dr. Mawhinney: None.

Railway Crossings

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the enabling legislation authorising Northern Ireland Railways to install automatic half barriers to selected open crossings is to be tabled; and if he will name the crossings concerned.

Mr. Needham: Orders in relation to the conversion of 13 automatic open crossings to automatic half-barrier level crossings are in preparation and are scheduled to come into operation as follows:

Crossing	Operation date
Slaght	2 September 1991
Killagan	16 September 1991
Galgorm	30 September 1991
Broughdone	14 October 1991
Glarryford	28 October 1991
Dunloy	11 November 1991
Caldanagh	25 November 1991
Ballyboyland	9 December 1991
Barmouth	6 January 1992
Umbra	20 January 1992
Magilligan	3 February 1992
Bellarena	17 February 1992
Cromore	2 March 1992

Residential Homes

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish tables, broken down by area health and social service board showing, for each of the last three years where figures are available, (i) social security expenditure on income support for residents of private and voluntary residential care and nursing homes, broken down by age and client group, and (ii) expenditure on board residential care and other services for elderly people.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 28 February 1991]: The only readily available information about expenditure on income support relates to the position at 1 October 1990 and is as follows:

Weekly expenditure on income support at 1 October 1990

	Up to 59 years	60 years or over
Homes for persons in need
Age and infirmity	3,059	104,824
Elderly and blind or elderly and entitled to the higher rate of attendance allowance	—	26,060
Mental disorder	5,313	10,210
Drug or alcohol dependence	950	918
Mental handicap	19,541	4,198
Physical disablement under pensionable age	6,372	5,095
Physical disablement over pensionable age	—	4,891
Nursing homes
Mental disorder	1,180	13,165
Mental handicap	6,967	4,419
Drug or alcohol dependence	776	959
Physical disablement under pensionable age	29,654	49,988
Physical disablement over pensionable age	—	29,401
Terminal illness	8,374	338,671
Others	693	71,064
Totals	82,919	663,863
Grand totals	746,782

Expenditure by each health and social services board for the last three years available on residential accommodation for the elderly was:

Board	Year ended 31 March 1988 £ million	1989 £ million	1990 £million
Northern	7·0	7·2	7·3
Southern	4·2	4·5	4·6
Eastern	11·4	11·8	12·6
Western	4·1	4·2	4·6
Total	26·7	27·7	29·1

However, for facilities such as day centres and services such as home help and meals it is not possible to separate expenditure on a specific client group such as the elderly and this expenditure has not been included in the above figures.

ENVIRONMENT

Fire Services

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment following the decision to transfer funding for the Fire Service College to local fire brigades, what amount has been added to the RSG in respect of this commitment; where information is available as to the sums allocated to each authority; who may inspect this information; what account was taken of these changes indetermining the standard spending assessments for metropolitan fire and civil defence authorities; and where this information is available.

Mr. Key: In 1990-91 the Fire Service College will receive £7,595,000 as its share of the revenue support grant total for England. In 1991-92 it will receive £5,630,734. Additionally, for 1991-92 the total standard spending assessment for the fire and civil defence block takes account of the new arrangements whereby the college recovers part of its costs through charges. This is reflected in the standard spending assessments of individual authorities. However, grant is distributed on the basis of authorities' total SSAs and it is therefore not possible to say what proportion of their grant entitlements relates to any specific task or function.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will consider extending the grounds for exemption from the poll tax to include severe physical handicap as well as severe mental impairment.

Mr. Key: Our review of local government finance is considering all aspects of the community charge. Under the present arrangements people with disabilities may be helped by the community charge benefit disability and severe disability premiums.

Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make it his policy to exempt from the poll tax wives whose husbands were sole earners and have either absconded or been jailed.

Mr. Key: Our review of local government finance is considering all aspects of the community charge.

Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many ex-service men who receive a war pension are exempted from paying (a) all and (b) 80 per cent. of the poll tax; and in how many cases the war pension payable to ex-service men is taken into account in calculating the liability of the pensioner's partner for the poll tax.

Mr. Key: This information is not available. Although entitlement to a war pension does not confer exemption from the personal community charge, local authorities must disregard the first £10 of and have the discretion to disregard the whole or part of the rest of a person's war disablement pension when calculating community charge benefit. If a partner is in prison, the decision whether a community charge benefit claim should be assessed on a joint basis will depend on whether, in the opinion of the local authority, the partners are still members of the same household.

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the actual current expenditure of each London borough per poll tax payer.

Mr. Key: The available information is as follows:

Net revenue expenditure per head of relevant population

	Budget Estimate 1990-91 £
City of London	26,186
Camden	1,392

Lambeth and Haringey have not supplied figures which enable the calculation to be made.

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the standard spending assessment for each London borough expressed in terms of spending per poll tax payer.

Mr. Key: The standard spending assessments for each London borough for 1991-92 in pounds per charge payer are listed in the table:

	1991-92 SSA (£/adult)
Camden	1,403

Mr. Blair: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many students were estimated to be in Cambridge for the purposes of calculating the community charge; what factors have led to the increase in charge levels for 1991-92; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: The number of students notified to the Department of the Environment by Cambridge city council and used for the purposes of calculating revenue support grant was 15,020. The community charge set by each district council is a matter for it to decide.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much assistance a couple living in a property of (a) half and (b) three quarters average rateable value in Rugby and Kenilworth will receive under the community charge reduction scheme in 1991-92.

Mr. Key: If Rugby borough council sets its community charge next year at or above £332, a couple who have not moved since 31 March 1990 living in a property of half average rateable value could look forward to a reduction of £272 between them and for a couple living in a property of threequarters average rateable value, £128 between them. If Warwick council sets its community charge next year at or above £344, the reduction for a couple living in that area who have not moved since 31 March 1990 would be (a) £248 between them and (b) £80 between them.

Mr. Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many households in Hackney were in receipt of transitional protection in 1990-91.

Mr. Key: No information is available on the numbers of households in each authority area in receipt of transitional relief. Relief grant claim forms from the local authority indicate that 19,000 charge payers in Hackney have benefited from transitional relief this financial year.

Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will set out in tabular form details of the exact effects on community charge payers in (a) Charnwood borough, (b) Melton borough and (c) Rutland district councils of the community charge reduction scheme; and how many charge payers are likely to benefit in each case.

Mr. Key: No information is yet available on the numbers of people in each charging authority area who will benefit from a reduction. The figures in the table show the benefit of the community charge reduction scheme in Charnwood, Melton and Rutland for couples who have not moved since 31 March 1990 living in properties of (a) three quarters average rateable value and (b) half average rateable value for the area if the authorities concerned set a community charge in 1991-92 which is at or above their scheme charge.

Benefit for couples from 1991-92 community charge reduction scheme

	Scheme charge	(a)	(b)
Charnwood borough	342	202	328
Melton borough	339	220	338
Rutland district	340	173	307

Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will list the district councils within Leicestershire which have increased their levels of community charge in 1991-92 by more than the benefit which their charge-payers have received from central funding of the safety net; to what factors he attributes these increases; and how they will be affected by the community charge reduction scheme.

Mr. Key: As far as I am aware, no district council in Leicestershire has yet decided upon its community charge for 1991-92.

A list of the authorities in Leicestershire which are contributing to the safety net, together with the amount of their contributions, is given in the table. Contributions will not be required in 1991-92.

Blaby	881,265
Charnwood	3,208,998
Harborough	1,444,158
Hinckley and Bosworth	505,101
Oakby and Wigston	502,287
Rutland	684,308

Entitlement to reductions under the community charge reduction scheme will be based on the scheme listed in the Community Charge Reduction Scheme Report (England), laid before Parliament on 18 February, or the local authority's set charge in 1991-92, whichever is the lower.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is his estimate of the number of local authorities who will receive special grant payments for income forgone because of exempting Gulf personnel from the poll tax;

(2) if he intends to publish any further details on the operation of the scheme to compensate local authorities for income forgone due to exempting Gulf personnel from the poll tax; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: The number of authorities which will benefit from the scheme is not yet known. Further details of the operation of the scheme will be issued shortly, following discussions between my Department and the local authority associations.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the information available, including forecasts, from the capital monitoring returns from local authorities on the likely level of (a) housing capital receipts, (b) non-housing capital receipts and (c) all capital receipts generated in 1990-91 in (i) England and (ii) in each class of authority; and what is the amount that will have to be set aside as provision for credit liabilities.

Mr. Portillo: The quarterly capital payments return (CPR2) submitted by local authorities covers outturn data for April to September 1990-91 and provides a forecast for the whole of 1990-91. The returns made by local authorities together with estimates for non-response suggest the likely level of all capital receipts generated in 1990-91 to be as follows:

	£ million
County councils	284
Metropolitan districts	697
London boroughs	873
Non-Metropolitan districts	1,558
Other authorities	218
All England	3,629

Local authorities report that of the £3,629 million they expect to receive in 1990-91, £1,195 million will be usable capital receipts, hence the reserved part will be £2,434 million which must be set aside as provision for credit liabilities.

Local authorities are not required to provide separate forecasts for housing and non-housing capital receipts.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish details of the information sent to local authorities during February on the treatment of service men in the Gulf regarding poll tax liability.

Mr. Portillo: My Department has not issued any such advice to local authorities during February. On 19 February my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley explained to the House that it was the Government's intention that soldiers and associated civilians posted to the Gulf should not pay the charge for the duration of their posting. In the light of the recent High Court judgment in the case of Bradford MBC v. Anderton we are currently considering what steps need to be taken to realise this objective.

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much assistance a couple living in a property of half average rateable value in Sevenoaks will receive under the community charge reduction scheme in 1992.

Mr. Key: If Sevenoaks council sets its community charge next year at or above £281, a couple who have not moved since 31 March 1990 living in a property of half average rateable value could look forward to a reduction of £221 between them.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing for (a) each local authority, (b) each class of authority and (c) England as a whole the capital receipts accumulated by 31 March 1990 and his best estimates of the amount set aside as provision for credit liabilities in 1990-91 from (i) housing capital receipts, (ii) non-housing capital receipts and (iii) all capital receipts.

Mr. Portillo: I have today arranged for the available information to be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the cost of implementing and administering the community charge in each of the 32 London boroughs and in the City of London (i) during 1989-90 and (ii) during 1990-91, (a) funded by the Government and (b) in fact incurred; and what is the estimate of the cost of the same activity for each of the same local authorities for the financial year 1991-92.

Mr. Key [holding answer 1 March 1991]: I will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the cost to his Department of (a) implementing and (b) monitoring the community charge in England in the financial years (i) 1989-90 and (ii) 1990-91; and what is his estimate of the cost for 1991-92.

Mr. Key [holding answer, 1 March 1991]: The information is not available in the form requested. The outturn costs for 1989-90 and 1990-91 and estimated costs for 1991-92, excluding accommodation, publicity and publications, of the local government finance policy directorate in my department, which deal with all aspects of local government finance, including the community charge, are as follows:

1989-90	2,591
1991-92	2,983

Mrs. Currie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for every year since 1975 the total spent by local authorities in cash and real terms, and the proportions of funds from Government, from business and from households or individuals with an estimate for 1990-91.

Mr. Key [holding answer 26 February 1991]: The available information is as follows:

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the proportion of local government income, and the amount, which comes from charges or fees payable by users of local authority services; what are the average figures for local authorities; and what is the range of such figures.

Mr. Key: The latest year for which information is available on the levels of fees and charges is 1988-89. The total amount of income met from fees and charges, excluding rents, over all accounts in 1988-89 for the English local authorities was £3,584 million. This represented 8 per cent. of total revenue income for that year.

The average income from fees and charges for all the English local authorities, including the passenger transport authorities, waste regulation and disposal authorities etc., was £7,239,000. The range spanned a minimum of less than £1,000 to a maximum of £90,211,000 for ILEA.

Mr. Cabora: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of local authority income was provided or will be provided for each year from 1979-80 to 1991-92 by (a) rate or revenue support grant, (b) domestic rates or poll tax, and (c) non-domestic rates or receipts from the non-domestic rate pool, for (i) the York city council area and (ii) England as a whole.

Mr. Key [holding answer 19 February 1991]: Under the old system of local government finance rate support grant was not paid in respect of local authority areas. It is not possible to estimate the proportion of rate support grant paid to North Yorkshire county council which relates to the area of York city council. The estimated amounts of rate income for the area are shown in the table:

York City Council

	£ million
	Domestic rate income	Non-domestic rate income
1983-84	6·6	9·4
1984-85	7·2	10·2
1985-86	7·9	10·9
1986-87	9·3	12·7
1987-88	10·7	14·4
1988-89	12·1	16·5
1989-90	13·6	18·3

No figures are available for rate income for York city council before 1983-84.

Street Naming

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to transfer responsibilities for street naming to town, community, and parish councils; and what representations he has received on the subject.

Mr. Key: No, and none; but the topic could be relevant to the current review of local government.

Action for Cities

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the results to date of the campaign Action for Cities, launched in March 1988.

Mr. Key: Good progress has been made in regenerating our inner cities under the Action for Cities initiative, with Government expenditure input of over £10 billion since 1988. In partnership with the private sector, substantial investment has taken place in new factories, shopping centres, roads and other infrastructure and in treating derelict land, thus improving the quality of life for people in our inner cities and creating important new employment and training opportunities. Long-term unemployment in the inner cities has nearly halved since March 1988.

The Government, through the city action teams and inner city task forces, are continuing to work with local government, the private and voluntary sectors and with local people to build on that success.

Land Reclamation

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans his Department has to promote the use of sewage sludge in land reclamation schemes.

Mr. Baldry: Full-scale experimental reclamation proposals have been carried out in recent years by several water companies in England and Wales. In addition the water research centre, in consultation with the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, has in hand the preparation of an advisory code of practice on the use of sewage sludge in land restoration.

Air Pollution

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans regularly to publish figures of the costs and benefits of measures to reduce air pollution.

Mr. Baldry: My Department has a substantial research programme on the effects of air pollution and the costs and benefits of possible approaches to the abatement of these. Results of research projects are published whenever appropriate.

British Waterways Board

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the reasons for the British Waterways Board's decision no longer to set targets for revenue from leisure, freight and estates for years after 1990-91 in his Department's annual report.

Mr. Baldry: Ministers set annual targets for a range of performance indicators agreed with the British Waterways Board (BWB). The previous set of performance indicators are being reviewed in the light of the board's move to regional management and the Government's endorsement of the integrated business strategy in February 1990. Income from leisure, freight and estates is incorporated in the figures for internally generated income in the table at figure 16 in the Department's 1991 annual report.

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimates he has received of income to British Waterways from the disposal of estates for the next four years.

Mr. Baldry: Estimates of income from all sources for the next four financial years will be provided in the British Waterways Board's (BWB) 1991 corporate plan. The plan is not published, but the Government's decisions about the Exchequer grant and borrowing limits for BWB in 1992-93 onwards, which will be announced in the autumn, will be based on its assessment of the board's projected income and expenditure. Income from disposal of assets is shown in the board's annual report and accounts.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment to what extent he took the state of the property market into account when determining revenue grant to British Waterways.

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 1 March 1991]: British Waterways Board grant settlements take account of all relevant factors.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all sites of special scientific interest associated with waterways administered by British Waterways.

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 28 February 1991]: This information is not available centrally, but the Nature Conservancy Council's memorandum to the Environment Select Committee in February 1989 gave details of some 110 km of 19 British Waterways Board waterways notified as sites of special scientific interest (the Fifth Report from the Environment Committee—Session 1988-89, Appendix 16 (HC 237)).

Sewage

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the locations of sea sewage outfalls in Cornwall; what are the quantities of treated and untreated sewage discharged at each location; and at what distance from the high water mark.

Mr. Baldry: Details of these discharges are available from the south-west regional office of the National Rivers Authority.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report a list of those viruses which are not destroyed by primary treatment at a sewage treatment works; and the proportion of total viruses which are not destroyed by primary treatment.

Mr. Baldry: The report by Consultants in Environmental Sciences Ltd. into coastal sewage discharges indicates that primary treatment removes up to 50 per cent. of viruses. The report, which was commissioned by my Department, has been placed in the Library. Further discussion on this subject is contained in the Environment Select Committee's fourth report on pollution of beaches.

Property Services Agency

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what criteria are used by the Property Services Agency in selecting new office accommodation; and what factors influenced their decision to select accommodation in Newton Abbot rather than Torquay.

Mr. Yeo: The Property Services Agency now acts only as the agent of the Department which commission new office accommodation. In the case of a jointly occupied building, this will normally be the Department of the Environment, through its property holdings directorate.

The location of new office accommodation depends on the requirements of the occupying Departments. The proposed new building in Newton Abbott is intended to house three Departments, which each have a specific requirment to serve the Newton Abbott area.

Boat Owners

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement of the level of protection for residential boat owners.

Mr. Yeo: Residential boat owners are protected by the terms of their contracts, if any, with the owner of the mooring at which their boat is kept. Their protection may also be subject to local Acts and byelaws.

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many residential boat owners, both licensed and unlicensed, moor their craft on waterways administered by the British Waterways Board.

Mr. Baldry: The British Waterways Board licensed 173 houseboats in 1989-90. No figures are available for unlicensed houseboats.

British Waterways Bill

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received on the British Waterways Bill.

Mr. Baldry: Since this Private Bill was deposited on 27 November last year, 56 letters have been received, most of which are of a circular nature. The representations largely concern the proposals for dealing with the control of moorings and craft construction standards. Since the Bill's provisions are matters for the British Waterways Board, correspondents have been advised to pursue their concerns directly with them or through the appropriate Private Bill Office.

Benzene

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what information he has on the levels of airborne benzene at various locations within the United Kingdom;

(2) what information he has on airborne benzene levels in countries other than the United Kingdom.

Mr. Baldry: The averages of hourly concentrations of benzene in air, measured in the Department's air quality research programme in 1982-83 were: 1·6 parts per billion (ppb) at a rural site, 2·7 ppb at a site by a busy motorway and 9·3 ppb by a major road in a city centre. The maximum hourly means measured at the three sites were 6 ppb, 12·7 ppb and 26·4 ppb respectively.

The levels found in the United Kingdom are consistent with measurements reported elsewhere. The United States Environmental Protection Agency report mean concentrations of 2·8 ppb in urban areas, 1·8 ppb in suburban areas and 0·16 ppb in remote rural areas. A mean concentration of 2·6 ppb has been reported for Sydney, Australia.

Petrol Pumps

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to introduce legislation to make vapour recovery petrol pumps mandatory at filling stations.

Mr. Baldry: Pollution from petrol vapour will be much reduced by the proposed EC car standards directive to come into force in 1992. The Government's White Paper on the Environment "This Common Inheritance" commits the Government to working with the vehicle and fuel industries to achieve further improvements. The European Commission is expected soon to bring forward proposals for reducing petrol vapour emissions along the marketing chain and we propose to review what further action is necessary in the United Kingdom in the light of these proposals.

Planning Appeals

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many planning appeals there have been in each of the last five years; and what has been the cost of their administration.

Mr. Yeo: The information requested is set out in the table. The administrative costs column relates only to costs incurred in the planning inspectorate. Other costs are incurred elsewhere in the Department and planning authorities. Information on these is not readily available.

Year	Appeals received	Appeals withdrawn	Appeals decided	Administrative costs £ million
1985-86	17,839	2,143	14,130	5·405
1986-87	19,856	2,533	15,613	6·109
1987-88	22,482	3,173	18,474	6·981
1988-89	28,659	4,257	21,061	10·274
1989-90	32,281	4,627	26,481	11·414

Vacant Land

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many responses he has had to the consultation paper "Encouraging The Use of Vacant Public Sector Land"; and what steps have been taken to analyse the information received.

Mr. Yeo: We have received 111 responses and are being analysed in the context of our current consideration of policy options. I am arranging for a list of respondents to be placed in the Library shortly.

Planning Controls

Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will consider strengthening planning controls and regulations on developers to include environmental concerns.

Mr. Yeo: Environmental concerns must already be taken into account by local planning authorities when determining any planning application in so far as they are material to that application. The Government's planning policy guidance emphasises the importance of such concerns, and identifies some of the matters which must, where relevant, be taken into account. The Government will continue to review that guidance, as promised in the Environment White Paper "This Common Inheritance" (Cm 1200).

The Town and Country Planning (Assessment of Environmental Effects) Regulations 1988 require environmental assessment as part of the planning process for many development proposals which are likely to have significant environmental effects. These regulations implement directive 85/337/EEC for this purpose.

Environmental Impact Assessments

Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to put environmental impact assessment on a statutory basis.

Mr. Yeo: The Town and Country Planning (Assessment of Environmental Effects) Regulations 1988 (SI No. 1199) require environmental assessment for a wide range of projects where they are likely to have significant environmental effects. These regulations, and other statutory instruments made under the European Communities Act 1972, implement directive 85/337/EEC.

My noble Friend Lady Blatch has undertaken to consider the principle of an amendment to the Planning and Compensation Bill which would enable the Secretary of State to add to the categories of project which are subject to planning control and which require environmental assessment.

Land Register

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the number of additional acres which would be added to the register if all public and private land had to be shown on the register.

Mr. Yeo: I assume that my hon. Friend is referring only to unused and underused land.

A total of 82,400 acres of unused and underused land owned by the public sector in England was recorded as being on the register at 30 September 1989. Since that date the register has been maintained only selectively, for the purpose of considering directions to dispose of such land.

No figure is available for the total amount of public and private unused and underused land. It is estimated at present that there are approximately 150,000 acres of vacant land in urban areas, but there is no basis for estimating the amount of such land outside urban areas or the amount of underused land in England as a whole which is not included in this figure.

Wild Birds

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek to amend the Wildlife and Countryside Act, in order to prohibit the all-year killing of wild birds in Britain.

Mr. Baldry: The Act permits the killing at any time only of those species listed in part 2 of schedule 2. These species can cause widespread agricultural damage or threaten public health or air safety. The Act implements the objectives of the European Community directive on wild birds to which the Government are fully committed. We have urged the European Commission to propose an amendment to the directive which will establish that member states may operate sensible pest control practices where this would not endanger the conservation of the species.

Magpies

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what information he has received concerning the impact of magpies on song bird populations;

(2) what assessment he has made of which particular song birds are most at risk from magpie predation.

Mr. Baldry: Population levels of magpies have been monitored by the British Trust for Ornithology under contract to the Nature Conservancy Council. The trust found a substantial increase in magpie numbers between 1966 and 1986 and no evidence that magpie numbers had any deleterious effect overall on song bird populations and breeding success in the areas studied.

Land Disposal

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will consult the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and other voluntary organisations concerning the drafting of amendments to the general authorisation issued under section 152 of the Water Act 1989 concerning the disposal of land in a national park, the Norfolk and Suffolk Broads, an area of outstanding natural beauty or a site of special scientific interest.

Mr. Baldry: Consultation is taking place with the Countryside Commission and the Nature Conservancy Council and they in turn will take full account of the views expressed to them by voluntary conservation bodies about the operation of the existing general authorisation.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will state the conservation, access and recreation criteria which are applied when entering into a covenant with a company holding an appointment under chapter 1 part II of the Water Act 1989 for the purposes set out in section 152(7) of that Act or directing the disposal to a specified person under section 152(5)(a) of that Act where the land has not been acquired compulsorily.

Mr. Baldry: In exercising his powers under section 152 the Secretary of State must fulfil the duties in relation to the environment and recreation placed on him by section 8 of the Act.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what minor transactions he intends to exclude from the conditions applied in the general authorisation issued under section 152 of the Water Act 1989 concerning the disposal of land, or interests or rights in or over that land, which is situated in a national park, the Norfolk and Suffolk Broads, an area of outstanding natural beauty or a site of special scientific interest.

Mr. Baldry: The review of the general authorisation is still in progress, and conclusions have not yet been reached.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he intends to seek Parliament's approval for the text of any revision or alteration to the general authorisation issued under section 152 of the Water Act 1989 concerning the disposal of land in a national park, the Norfolk and Suffolk broads, an area of outstanding natural beauty or a site of special scientific interest.

Mr. Baldry: No. The Act does not require that.

Canal Towpaths

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to secure continued access to the towpaths of canals owned by the British Waterways Board for cyclists and pedestrians.

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 1 March 1991]: The Government's objectives for BWB require the board to promote the fullest practicable use of the waterways for leisure, recreation and amenity. The aim of the board's integrated business strategy, endorsed by Government, is to enhance the value of the network for the benefits of all users.

Water Contact Sports

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with the National Rivers Authority regarding the introduction of appropriate water quality objectives for water contact sports; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 1 March 1991]: We have asked the National Rivers Authority to advise the Department about the establishment of the new system of statutory water quality objectives provided for under the Water Act 1989 and discussions on this are continuing. As part of the preparatory work for the new system, consideration is being given to the setting of appropriate standards for the range of uses for which waters are expected to be suitable. The needs of water contact sports will be taken into account in this process.

Jobs, Leeds

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment further to his answer of 22 February, Official Report, column 284, if he will break down by sector (a) the 5,241 permanent jobs created in the Leeds development corporation area between June 1988 and March 1990 and (b) the expected 885 jobs in the year to 31 March.

Mr. Key [holding answer 1 March 1991]: A breakdown, by sector, of the permanent jobs created in the Leeds development corporation's area between designation in June 1988 and the end of March 1990 and in 1990-91 is not available. The Department does not require UDCs to collect information in this detail.

Single Homeless Initiative

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on (a) the number of properties on which short-term leases had been entered into, (b) the number of empty housing association properties that had been repaired and (c) the number of properties that had been purchased as at 31 December 1990 under the single homeless initiative announced by the Minister for Housing in June 1990; and how many single homeless people have been assisted as a result.

Sir George Young [holding answer 27 February 1991]: No transactions had been completed by December 31 1990, but for rough sleepers or those who would otherwise be sleeping rough, 70 private sector leasing places are now available, with a total of 500 expected by the end of March. The Housing Corporation has approved expenditure of £3·3 million to provide 220 places in repaired housing association properties; £7 million has been allocated to provide 200 places in purchased properties. These figures exclude the 586 extra places in direct access hostels approved for funding under the initiative.

Bathing Waters

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has received a copy of the report on research conducted by Lancaster university's environmental epidemiology department at Blackpool; and whether he intends to consult with the North West Water Company, on action to be taken in respect of the sea off Blackpool.

Mr. Trippier: I have recently received a copy of the report on Lancaster university's research which complements similar studies by the Department over the past two years. The Department will continue to take a close interest in progress on North West Water's comprehensive improvements to bathing waters on the Fylde coast which should be completed as quickly as possible.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Regional Incentive Expenditure

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will take steps to restore the level of regional incentive expenditure to that of 1979.

Mr. Leigh: We have no plans to make changes to regional industrial policy. The Government remain committed to an effective regional industrial policy and will continue to make the necessary resources available.

Engineering Trade Balance

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the annual trade balance of the engineering sector in each year from 1979 to 1990; and what are the comparable figures for West Germany over the same years.

Mr. Leigh: The information is in the table. Figures for Germany for 1990 are not available.

Property Identification

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether it is the policy of his Department to mark property with an indelible mark or similar means of identification.

Mr. Leigh: An exercise was undertaken in 1987 when some 3,000 items of equipment, ranging from computers, typewriters, video recorders and facsimile machines, had identification markings applied to them.

Since then, smaller, easily removable items of IT office equipment, such as telephones, portable PCs, and so on, have a marking applied to them.

In the context of IT and office equipment the issue of potential theft is under continuing review as part of our security policy.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many and what percentage of officers in each grade (1-7) and overall in the Department are (a) women and (b) from ethnic minorities, respectively.

Mr. Leigh: The figures as at 28 February 1991 are:

Grade	Number	Percentage
(a) Women
G1	Nil	—
G2	Nil	—
G3	4	7·5
G4	2	25·0
G5	29	14·0
G6	19	10·4
G7	116	12·9
All staff	5,795	44·6
(b) Ethnic minorities (from 87 per cent. response to survey)
G1-4	Nil	—
G5	2	1·0
G6	5	2·7
G7	17	1·9
All staff	1,180	9·1

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he has taken to recruit members of ethnic minorities in top grades of employment at his Department.

Mr. Leigh: On those few occasions when the DTI recruits senior grades directly, the Department makes clear in its advertisements that it is an equal opportunity employer. Normally, however, the Civil Service Commission conducts recruitment to senior grades on the Department's behalf. The commission has taken a number of measures to aid recruitment of members of the ethnic minorities. It has, for example, increased representation of ethnic minorities in liaison and selection panels, and appointed an Asian woman as a part-time commissioner.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when his Department last conducted a survey of the ethnic origins of its employees; when it next plans to do so; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh: A voluntary ethnic survey of DTI staff was completed in April 1988, and the resulting database is continuously updated. There is a current positive response rate of 87 per cent. As part of this Department's programme of action on race we intend, in 1991-92, to examine again the ethnic origin database to establish whether an improvement in the response rate is possible.

Instant Coffeee

Mr. Marlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's investigation into the instant coffee market in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Redwood: The Monopolies and Mergers Commission's report into soluble coffee is currently being considered by the Secretary of State and will be published in due course. A copy of the report will be laid before Parliament in the normal way.

Indonesia

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the United Kingdom's main exports, in value, to Indonesia for the last 15 years.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 1 March 1991]: For the years 1976-89 the information requested can be found in table V of the relevant edition of "Overseas Trade Statistics of the United Kingdom" (Business Monitor MA20); 1990 figures are in table V of Business Monitor MM20 (December 1990). These publications are available in the House of Commons Library.

Export Controls

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what restrictions are placed on the type of goods available to be exported under the export credit guarantee scheme.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 1 March 1991]: There are no specific types of goods for which ECGD credit insurance is restricted. However, all exports covered by ECGD must comply with the statutory requirements for export licensing and must also comply with other international agreements of which the United Kingdom is a signatory.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list countries which have had export controls and restrictions placed upon them since 1987.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 1 March 1991]: Goods which are subject to export controls are listed in the Export of Goods (Control) Order, which specifies in Article 2 the destination to which goods are controlled. Since 1987 India and Pakistan have been added to article 2.

Radioactivity

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects the Radioactive Products (Safety) Regulations to enter into force.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 28 February 1991]: We hope to make the Radioactive Products (Safety) Regulations in the late spring, to come into force by the end of the year.

Fire-retardant Mattresses

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what evidence he has on the extent to which fumes given off by fire-retardant mattresses if they catch fire are lethal.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 28 February 1991]: My Department has no evidence that smoke and gas emissions from the ignition of fire-retardant mattresses are more injurious than those from burning mattresses with little or no fire protection.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has sought to obtain any evidence on the extent of use of fire-retardant mattresses for young children and on the use of fire retardant and non-fire retardant bedding for young children.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 28 February 1991]: No. Requirements for the fire protection of mattresses, and other nursery furniture, can be met without the use of fire-retardant treatments. There are no specific requirements relating to the fire resistance of bedclothes.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has sought to obtain any evidence of the toxicity in its other uses of the plasticiser used in fire-retardant mattresses.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 28 February 1991]: No. A number of different plasticisers are used in the manufacture of mattresses which have PVC covers. The chief medical officer's expert group is examining whether current plasticisers are entirely appropriate for use in cot mattresses. The findings of the expert group will be published as soon as possible and the implications, if any, for mattresses and other products will then be considered.

Drinks Cans

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had with (a) the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents (b) beverage manufacturers and (c) container suppliers about the use of opening mechanisms of cans of drinks which involve part of the opener entering the can and coming into contact with the contents.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 27 February 1991]: None. My officials regularly meet ROSPA and the enforcement authorities and I am not aware of difficulties giving rise to the need for a meeting with ROSPA or the industry on this matter.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to prohibit the use of opening mechanisms of cans of drinks which involve part of the opener entering the can and coming into contact with the contents.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 27 February 1991]: I have no such plans.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what moves are being taken within the European Community to prevent the use of opening mechanisms of cans of drinks which involve part of the opener entering the can and coming into contact with the contents; and what information he has on the current policy of other European Governments on this matter.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 27 February 1991]: I am not aware of any proposals within the European Community to prevent the use of such opening mechanisms. The policy of other European Governments on this matter is not known.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has concerning the number of accidents which have arisen, in the latest year for which figures are available, as a result of the swallowing of any parts of opening mechanisms of cans of drinks which involve part of the opener entering the can.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 27 February 1991]: No accidents of that type were recorded by my Department's home accident surveillance system for 1988, which is the latest year for which complete information is available.

EC Grants

Mr. Robert Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list those EC countries that apply additionality conditions to EC grants and payments; and if he will provide details of the conditions that are imposed in each country.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 26 February 1991]: The terms of Community grants are set out in Community legislation.

SCOTLAND

Local Government Finance

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland is he will list for each regional council in Scotland his estimate of the turnover of the community charge register, expressed as a percentage, (a) that took place in 1989-90 and (b) that is expected during the current financial year; and what are the equivalent Scottish wide figures.

Mr. Allan Stewart: This information is not held centrally, but the recent report prepared by the Controller of Audit suggests that changes to the register in 1989-90 were equivalent to an annual average of 50 per cent. of total register entries.

Land Grants

Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the amounts (a) applied for and (b) received by the Scottish Office from the European Community for land grants relating to industrial regional aid and the amounts paid to Scottish applicants for land grants for each year since 1975.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will obtain for his departmental library a copy of the conference prodeedings on proposals for the disposal of radioactive waste in the Highland region by Nirex, held on 28 November in Inverness.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Scottish Office Environment Department is obtaining a copy of the proceedings of the conference, which was organised by Highland regional council.

Community Charge

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people are currently registered as community charge payers in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: As at 1 July 1990 3,834,410 people were included in the community charge registers in Scotland. This figure includes students, who are liable for only 20 per cent. of the community charge, but excludes those liable for collective or standard charges.

Volunteer Fire Brigades

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he is satisfied with the level of fire cover provided by volunteer fire brigades in Scotland, in the light of the need to implement regulations relating to health and safety and hazardous substances.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It is for fire authorities to satisfy themselves on the level of fire cover, whether this cover is provided by volunteer, retained or whole-time firefighters, taking into account relevant legislation and regulations.

New Towns

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether tenants of existing new town housing authorities will be given the option of choosing public sector landlords when the new town administrations are wound up.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The options for new town tenants remain unchanged from those set out in the White Paper "The Scottish New Towns: The Way Ahead" (Command 711), which states:

"The position in each new town will be carefully considered once an order for dissolution has been made, and formal consultations will be held with development corporations, district councils and representative tenant groups to review the position and to determine to what extent transfers might take place, be it to housing associations, co-operatives, district councils, private or other landlords. Those tenants who have not transferred to other landlords will be transferred to Scottish Homes at wind-up, with a view to pursuing further diversification with the small residual number of houses."

Water Quality

Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list each of the water supplies in Scotland which have been issued with a relaxation under regulation 4(1)(c) of the Water Supply (Water Quality) (Scotland) Regulations 1990 in respect of aluminium, the size of the population served, the mean concentration of aluminium recorded, and which of these have aluminium in excess of the EC standard for each of the individual water supplies;

(2) if he will give a breakdown of those water supplies with aluminium in excess of the EC standards which have been granted a relaxation under regulation 4(1)(c) of the Water Supply (Water Quality) (Scotland) Regulations 1990 which have excess aluminium as a result of the naturally occurring aluminium.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Relaxations under regulation 4(1)(c) have been authorised in respect of aluminium in the supply zones listed in the table. The population and the authorised maximum concentration of aluminium in each case are shown. Data on mean concentrations for individual supplies are not held centrally. The EC standard is the same as that set in the regulations (200 micrograms per litre). All these relaxations relate to naturally occurring aluminium.

Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what are the criteria applied in deciding the duration of the relaxations under regulation 4(1)(c) of the Water Supply (Water Quality) (Scotland) Regulations 1990 in respect of individual water supplies; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what are the criteria applied in deciding which water supplies are subject to relaxations under regulation 4(1)(c) of the Water Supply (Water Quality) (Scotland) Regulations 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Relaxations under regulation 4(1)(c) can be authorised only in respect of substances or parameters arising from the nature and structure of the ground in the area from which the supply emanates. They cannot be authorised for toxic substances or microbiological parameters and must not give rise to a public health hazard. An authorisation can be modified or revoked at any time, without notice if that is necessary in the interests of public health.

The regulations do not require any limit of duration to be specified in the authorisation of a relaxation under regulation 4(1)(c). Where a time limit is stated it is the date by which the water authority expects to make improvements, so that the supply will meet the standards, and beyond which the relaxation will not be needed.

Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will release details of the latest updated list of water supplies which have been granted relaxations under regulation 4(1)(c) of the Water Supply (Water Quality) (Scotland) Regulations 1990 in respect of aluminium; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Current relaxations are listed in my answer to an earlier question today. Water authorities are required by the regulations to maintain a public record containing information on the quality of water in each of their supply zones, including particulars of any relaxations granted. They are also required to publish similar information in an annual report to be issued by 30 June each year. The first such reports, covering the part-year 1 July to 31 December 1990, are due by 30 June 1991.

Training Costs

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the average cost per trainee week for (a) employment training and (b) youth training negotiated in the past year between the Training Agency and each of the local enterprise companies.

Mr. Allan Stewart: There are no such negotiations between the Training Agency and local enterprise companies.

Departmental Policies (Environmental Implications)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what actions have been taken since the appointment of a Minister in his Department to consider the environmental implications of his Department's policies; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 1 March 1991]: As the responsible Minister I have set up a new framework for co-ordinating and monitoring Scottish action on the various policy commitments in the White Paper "This Common Inheritance" which was published in September. From the turn of the year the Scottish Development Department was renamed the Scottish Office Environment Department and will take the lead in following up the White Paper.

Legislation was introduced earlier this Session to merge the Nature Conservancy Council for Scotland and the Countryside Commission for Scotland to form Scottish Natural Heritage from 1 April 1992. I have increased the funding available to voluntary bodies for environmental activities and commissioned a major survey of attitudes in Scotland to the environment. New guidance has been issued on the design and location of rural housing.

Various measures are being taken to improve Scottish Office housekeeping, including steps to meet energy efficiency targets and to make greater use of recycled products.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report a table which shows the number of (a) sites of special scientific interest in Scotland which were originally notified under the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949, (b) sites which have been renotified under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, (c) sites awaiting renotification under the 1981 Act, (d) sites whose original boundary was altered when renotified under the 1981 Act and (e) original sites which the Nature Conservancy Council has denotified or does not intend to renotify.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 22 February 1991]: The information is shown in the table.

Sites of special scientific interest

	Number of sites
Sites originally notified under the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949	905
Sites which have been renotified under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981	704
Sites awaiting renotification under the 1981 Act	21
Sites where the boundary was extended on renotification under the 1981 Act	254
Original sites which the Nature Conservancy Council has denotified or does not intend to renotify	110

The figure of sites originally notified under the 1949 Act has been adjusted to take account of subsequent amalgamations and divisions. Information is not available for sites where the boundaries were altered because of partial deletions on renotification.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Slaughterhouses

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on what basis European Community veterinary inspectors decide which slaughterhouses they will visit when they make their routine checks; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Decisions are taken by the European Community Commission. Selection is random, but practical considerations generally result in visits being made to particular geographical areas. The Commission aims to have inspected all existing approved plants at least once by the end of 1992.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when European Community veterinary inspectors will next visit the United Kingdom; whether he will name the slaughterhouses chosen for such a visit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: European Community veterinary inspectors will visit slaughterhouses in England on 11-22 March and in Scotland on 8-19 April. They intend visiting the following slaughterhouses in England:

EWS 17, 24, 30, 41, 51, and 108.

The visits planned for Scotland are a matter for the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Further visits are planned to slaughterhouses in England and Northern Ireland in June and July, but itineraries have yet to be finalised.

Wood Pigeons

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what studies have been carried out into the impact of shooting wood pigeons as against scare methods as a means of reducing agricultural damage.

Mr. Gummer: Research carried out by my Department has shown that scaring regimes to protect crops against wood pigeon damage are most effective when combined with shooting.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what studies he has carried out into the agricultural damage caused by wood pigeons in the United Kingdom; and what have been the results.

Mr. Gummer: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given on 21 November to the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies), Official Report, column 135, and the consequent placing of relevant research in the Library.

Soft Fruit

Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimates he has of the possible effects on the raspberry industry in particular, and the soft fruit industry in general, of the ending of minimum import prices; and if he will assist these industries by continuing the minimum import price system until the end of the fruit season.

Mr. Curry: There is a place for semi-processed soft fruit from eastern Europe in the United Kingdom market to complement the home-grown product provided that it is marketed in an orderly manner. Minimum import prices MIPs were introduced by the EC Commission in July 1990 at the request of the United Kingdom Government because east European imports were causing market disruption. We have made it clear that our preferred solution is voluntary price agreements and that the EC Commission should seek to conclude these before the MIPs expire on 31 March. If that is not possible, we will seek the extension of the MIP arrangements to cover the beginning of the 1991 soft fruit season. I shall emphasise this at the Council of Ministers next week.

Foxes

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many fox destruction societies or clubs are registered with his Department in England; and what level of financial assistance they currently receive.

Mr. Maclean: No such groups are registered in England.

Intervention Storage

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin), Official Report, 6 February, column 198, if he will make it his practice to continue to publish figures on the tonnage and value of foodstuffs in intervention storage in response to questions from hon. Members.

Mr. Curry: Tables showing EC and United Kingdom intervention stock levels are deposited in the Library of the House each month. We are willing to supply other information in relation to intervention stocks as long as the cost of providing it is not disproportionate.

Coccidiostat

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will introduce regulations requiring poultry treated with coccidiostat to be labelled as such.

Mr. Maclean: I have asked the food advisory committee in its general review of food labelling to consider whether treatments to living animals should be indicated on food labels. The committee's report on its review will be published shortly and I shall be consulting interested parties on its recommendations before reaching my conclusions.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the number of confirmed cases of BSE reported from (a) livestock markets and (b) slaughterhouses in England and Wales in the last six months of 1990.

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 22 January 1991]: Following is the information:

	Confirmed cases
(a) Livestock markets	60
(b) Slaughterhouses	51

SOCIAL SECURITY

Social Security Agencies

16. Mr. Page: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the two new social security agencies are expected to come fully into operation.

Miss Widdecombe: The social security benefits agency and the contributions agency are due to be established in April 1991. We will make a further announcement about this in due course.

Pensioners

17. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of pensioners have some form of second income in addition to the basic state pension.

Miss Widdecombe: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West (Sir A. Durant).

24. Dr. Michael Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the current value of the assets held by the average pensioner household; and what was the comparable position in real terms in 1978-79.

Miss Widdecombe: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given earlier to the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North (Sir T. Skeet).

National Insurance

18. Sir Marcus Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many individuals would be affected by the removal of the upper earnings limit for national insurance contributions.

Mr. Jack: If the upper earnings limit for employees' national insurance contributions were removed it is currently estimated that about 3·3 million people would pay more in contributions. If the corresponding upper profits limit for self-employed people were also removed it is estimated that about another 0·6 million people would pay more in contributions.

27. Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the total cost to business would be if national insurance contributions were levied at 5 per cent. on all employees with earnings below the national insurance threshold.

Mr. Jack: On the limited information available, we estimate the cost to employers at around £200 million a year in national insurance contributions. In addition, employers would bear substantial administrative costs arising from the extra record keeping involved.

Single Mothers

19. Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will review the policy towards single parent mothers of small children who by working lose benefit.

Mr. Jack: The social security system already has several provisions which help lone parents benefit from working, where they wish to do so. The White Paper "Children Come First" contains proposals which will further improve the ability of lone parents to combine work with the responsibility of caring for their children and thus to be better off.

Unemployment Benefit

20. Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he has any plans to revise the 26-week rule depriving homeless unemployed people of benefit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: I assume that my hon. Friend is referring to the rule under which budgeting loans do not become available until a claimant has been on income support for 26 weeks. The purpose of this rule is to target social fund money on people who have been out of work for some time and who are therefore likely to be in greatest need. Crisis loans are available if there is an emergency or serious risk to health or safety.

We have no plans to change this rule.

Computerisation

22. Sir Anthony Meyer: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what evidence he has of improvements in the speed of service offered by social security offices as a result of the computerisation of the benefit system.

Miss Widdecombe: The Department's strategy for the computerisation of the social security payment system will be completed on time in July 1991. One of the aims of the strategy is to reduce the time taken to process benefit claims.

The latest available information indicates that the national clearance time for new and repeat claims for income support stands at around 4·7 days, compared with 6·2 days relating to the period immediately prior to computerisation. The clearance time for claims to retirement pension averages 22·7 days compared with 28·2 days before computerisation.

General benefit inquiries are also being dealt with more efficiently, as local office staff are now able to quickly access an individual's details, via the computer terminal, rather than having to search for the appropriate clerical record.

Family Credit

23. Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the latest figure for the number of families benefiting from family credit; and what was the number of benefiting from the predecessor scheme in 1978-79.

Mr. Jack: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Amos).

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many families in (a) west Leeds, (b) Leeds, (c) West Yorkshire and (d) England are in receipt of family credit; and what proportion these families represent of those estimated to be entitled to this benefit.

Mr. Jack: The only figures available for Leeds, west Leeds and West Yorkshire are for the number of families actually in receipt of family credit on a particular day. They do not include those who had claimed by that date but whose claim had not yet been decided. On 8 February 1991, the latest date for which these figures are available, the number of families who, at the date of their award, were living in the places listed, were as follows:

	Number
(a) West Leeds	[1]3,005
(b) Leeds	[2]4,826
(c) West Yorkshire	[3]16,557

[1] The total in the area covered by the Leeds west, Leeds north west and Leeds north local social security offices.

[2] The total in the area covered by all the local social security offices in Leeds.

[3] The total in the area covered by all the local social security offices in West Yorkshire.

For England as a whole, a true caseload figure is available which includes awards covering the given date but not made till later. At 31 July 1990, the latest date for which this figure is available, the caseload for England was 264,000.

Information about the total number of families eligible for family credit can be obtained only for Great Britain as a whole, and only retrospectively, from family expenditure survey data.

Disability Working Allowance

26. Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the number of disabled people who will be able more easily to work as a result of the introduction of the new disability working allowance.

Mr. Scott: Disability working allowance is an entirely new addition to social security to meet the needs of disabled people who want to work but have limited capacity. We expect that once DWA is established about 50,000 people at any one time will take the new opportunity offered by this benefit.

Management Consultants

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the projects (a) undertaken in the year to April 1990 and (b) proposed but not yet operational by management consultants giving, in each case, its title, author, completion date and whether the document is available.

Miss Widdecombe: Details of the projects in the year 1989-90 and proposed but not yet operational projects are shown in the table. As stated in my reply to the hon. Member's earlier question on 21 February 1991 at col 269, consultancy reports are usually internal working documents and are not publicly available. The exception in the 1989-90 project list is the Arthur Young assignment which contributed to the efficiency scrutiny on fraud. As this was considered to be of wider interest, a copy of the scrutiny report was placed in the Library.

Attendance Allowance

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many claims for attendance allowance under the terminal illness rules have been received by his Department since the new rules came into force; what is the average number of days between day of claim and the date of the decision for such claims; what are the shortest and longest clearance times to date; and what is the average clearance time for reviews;

(2) what is the success rate for (a) initial claims and (b) reviews of claims for attendance allowance under the terminal illness rules; and if he will list the numbers of refusals by grounds for refusal.

Mr. Scott: Such information as is available is in the table.

Attendance allowance: claims and reviews under the special rules for terminal illness

	Number and Estimate
Number of claims decided (to end January 1991)	20,200
Estimated average time from claim to decision	10·5 days
Estimated success rate of claims	95 per cent.
Estimated average clearance time for reviews	3·8 weeks
Estimated success rate of reviews[1]	77 per cent.

[1] In a significant number of cases, where the review was not successful under the special rules, the review was changed to one under the normal rules.

Absent Parents

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give the details of how the right of appeal will apply in cases where 20 per cent. of the income support personal allowance is deducted from caring parents on income support or family credit who do not provide information for pursuit of maintenance from absent parents.

Mr. Jack: As part of the Government's proposals for reforming the system of child maintenance, the Child Support Bill, introduced on 14 February in another place, provides for a reduction in the income support personal allowance of caring parents on income support or family credit who, without good cause, fail to provide information which will allow maintenance to be recovered from an absent parent. The White Paper "Children Come First" proposed that the reduction should be up to 20 per cent. of the adult income support allowance. In cases to which this reduction applies, the decision will be taken by an adjudication officer on the basis of an opinion from the Secretary of State together with any representations from the person concerned. As with other such decisions, there will be the right of appeal to a social security appeal tribunal and thereafter, on a point of law, to the social security commissioner.

Child Support

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he will take to ensure that child support agency staff are fully trained and can offer an adequate counselling service.

Mr. Jack: Staff in the agency will be properly trained in recognition of the sensitive nature of their work. They will also be able to help those lone parents who wish to work to do so by advising them on "in work" benefits and identifying the practical help available from various sources such as employment training, jobcentres, job clubs, and so on. Training will focus on measures to provide a good quality service to the public including, among other things how to deal sensitively and sympathetically with people who may be under stress. Staff will be responsible for ensuring that the caring parent understands the range of services that the agency can provide.

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether the proposed changes to child maintenance will incorporate an additional element when calculations of maintenance levels are being arrived at for children with disabilities.

Mr. Jack: The White Paper "Children Come First" invited comments on whether the maintenance required should be increased for a child who is disabled. The Government are considering the differing comments received.

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many responses he has received to the White Paper "Children Come First"; and if he will publish a digest of them, together with the Government response.

Mr. Jack: So far, some 250 submissions from organisations and individuals have been received. The Government have no plans to publish a digest and response. A number of the organisations which commented have already published their responses and in a number of cases individuals commented drawing on their own personal experience. We have considered all the comments received and there will be an opportunity to discuss the issues during debates on the Child Support Bill and the detailed regulations.

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy in future legislation on maintenance enforcement to replace the White Paper terms "caring parent" and "absent parent" with "resident parent" and "contact parent", respectively.

Mr. Jack: We received comments on terminology in a small number of responses to the White Paper "Children Come First" and have given thorough consideration to the most appropriate and readily comprehensible phrases to describe the parties involved in a maintenance award. In the Child Support Bill, introduced in another place on 14 February, "caring parent" has been replaced by "person with care". This reflects the fact that a person responsible for the day-to-day care of a child is not necessarily the child's natural or adoptive parent. We do not think that the proposed terms are appropriate, because the responsibility to pay maintenance is wholly independent of whether the parent has any contact with the child.

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what mechanism there will be to ensure that the proposed new Child Support Agency will not reduce the income of individuals or families to below the income support level when enforcing maintenance payment; and if he will make a statement on the recommendation of the Social Security Advisory Committee to reconsider the proposal in the White Paper "Children Come First" to impose a penalty of over £7 a week reduction in benefit for lone parents who refuse to name the liable parent.

Mr. Jack: The Child Support Bill sets out the method of calculation of the amount of maintenance due to be paid for a child or children. It makes provision for a protected level of income after the payment of maintenance based on income support levels.

The Bill also makes provision requiring a caring parent who claims income support or family credit to co-operate as far as possible in obtaining maintenance. Where there is no good reason for a failure to do so a reduction may be made in the amount of benefit paid. We have considered very carefully all the comments received on this issue, including those of the Social Security Advisory Committee. We remain convinced that it is right in principle to expect both parents to do as much as they reasonably can to ensure the payment of proper amounts of maintenance for their children. It would, however, clearly not be right to define criteria for this purpose which would mean that the making of a threat of violence would automatically absolve an absent parent from liability being pursued.

Domestic Violence

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy to ensure that there is no expectation upon women escaping violent partners to name fathers of their children at liable relatives interviews.

Mr. Jack: Our policy is that caring parents who are in receipt of benefit should be expected to co-operate in obtaining maintenance for their children unless they can show good cause for refusing to do so. It would, however, clearly not be right to define criteria for this purpose which would mean that the making of a threat of violence would automatically absolve an absent parent from liability being pursued.

Maintenance Payments

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish a list of the situations where the proposal to deduct 20 per cent. of the income support personal allowance from caring parents on income support or family credit who do not provide information to allow pursuit for maintenance from absent parents, would not be applied.

Mr. Jack: The White Paper "Children Come First" quoted rape and incest as circumstances which might constitute good cause for a caring parent claiming income support or family credit not to co-operate in seeking maintenance from the absent parent. We are still considering carefully all the comments we have received on this proposal, and whether it is in the interests of the children to publish a list. Regulations will prescribe the circumstances in which a benefit reduction will not apply in as much detail as possible.

Income-related Benefits

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the basis on which income-related benefit levels are set.

Miss Widdecombe: I refer the hon. Member to paragraphs 2.1 to 2.5 of the memorandum on benefit levels and a minimum income, dated 18 October 1989, and submitted to the House of Commons Social Services Committee. A copy of the complete memorandum is in the Library.

Departmental Relocation

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many jobs have been created outside London by his Department over the last two years.

Miss Widdecombe: The Department has taken a number of positive steps to move work away from London. For example, we are transferring benefits processing work away from 21 London offices to new social security centres in Glasgow, Belfast and Makerfield employing some 1,400 staff.

In addition, new agencies such as the Information and Technology Services Agency are based primarily away from London, and the new Benefits Agency headquarters will be moving to Leeds from June 1992 with the transfer of nearly 500 London-based posts.

Pensioners' Income

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of the average pensioner's income comes from occupational pensions, savings and earnings.

Miss Widdecombe: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington).

Mr. Ridley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of those over retirement age have additional income over and above their national insurance pension; and what has been the percentage increase, in real terms, of the total income of the average pensioner over the period 1979 to 1990.

Miss Widdecombe: Eighty-four per cent. of pensioners have some form of income in addition to their state retirement pension and other social security benefits. The average pensioner's income increased in real terms by 31 per cent. between 1979 and 1987, the last year for which figures are presently available.

Benefits Agency

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he would list the subject areas in social security which after the creation of the Social Security Benefits Agency will receive a reply which is (a) printed in Hansard and (b) only placed in the Library.

Miss Widdecombe: I refer the hon. Member to my answer to him on 21 February at col. 272-73. The precise matters to be delegated to the chief executive will be set out in the framework document when the Benefits Agency is established.

Residential and Nursing Homes

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) of 26 February, Official Report, columns 466-67, whether he will recommission Price Waterhouse to survey the running costs of private residential and nursing homes using the chief social services inspector's recommendations in "Inspecting for Quality Guidance on Practice for Inspection Units in Social Services Departments and Other Agencies."

Miss Widdecombe: We have no current plans to do so.

Research Projects

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answers to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) of 25 February, Official Report, columns 401-404, if he will indicate which of the projects listed (a) is to be published and (b) when.

Miss Widdecombe: I refer the hon. Member to the reply to the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) on 20 November 1990 at column 108.

Claimants, Leeds

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will show for (1) Leeds, West and (2) Leeds metropolitan district council area the number of applicants for and awards of (a) community care grants, (b) budgeting loans and (c) crisis loans and (i) the amounts awarded, (ii) the percentage refused and (iii) the average award.

Mr. Scott: I shall let the hon. Member have such information as is available as soon as possible.

Pensions

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action he is taking to assist persons on low incomes to enhance their pension levels.

Miss Widdecombe: Appropriate personal pensions were introduced in 1988 to give people the chance of contracting-out of the state earnings-related pension scheme and investing that money in their own pension arrangement. They have been further assisted in building up their pension by the extra 2 per cent. incentive which is payable for the five years from 1988 to 1993.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Court of Appeal

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases were referred back to the Court of Appeal criminal division in each of the last two years under section 17 of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968.

Mr. John Patten: The information is as follows:

References to the court of appeal under section 17(1)(a) of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968

(a) In respect of conviction

Year	Number of cases referred	Number of defendants involved	Appeals allowed	Appeals dismissed
1989	3	6	3	—

[1]Seven cases still awaiting determination.

(b) In respect of sentence

Year	Number of cases referred	Number of defendants involved	Appeals allowed	Appeals dismissed
1989	7	7	6	1
1990	3[1]	3	1	—

[1] Two cases still awaiting determination.

Pardons

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many pardons were granted in each of the last two years to persons convicted after a trial on indictment.

Mr. John Patten: None.

Kiranjit Ahluwalia

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations he has received regarding the conviction of Kiranjit Ahluwalia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Fifty-nine representations have been received about the conviction of Kiranjit Ahluwalia. We have considered these very carefully but have concluded that they do not provide any information that would justify the intervention of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary in this case. The normal procedures for the review of life sentence prisoners will continue to apply.

Trevi Group

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what meetings of the Trevi group are scheduled for the rest of this year; on which dates they will occur; and what will be the venue.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I shall attend the Trevi Ministers' meeting in Luxembourg on 14 June and the one to be held during the Dutch Presidency in the latter half of this year. A number of meetings of officials take place under each Presidency, normally in the capital of the member state concerned.

Child Abduction Act 1984

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons have been charged under the Child Abduction Act 1984; how many persons have been convicted by the courts; and what sentences were passed in each case.

Mr. John Patten: Information on the number of people charged is not collected centrally.

The data given in the table relates to the number of persons prosecuted and found guilty for offences under the Child Abduction Act 1984. This information is published annually in volumes 1 and 2 of the Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, supplementary tables, copies of which are available in the Library.

Persons proceeded against and found guilty of child abduction under the Child Abduction Act 1984[1] by result 1985 to 1989 England and Wales

[1] The Act came into force in October 1984 but court data was not collected until January 1985.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many and what percentage of officers in each grade (1-7) and overall in the Department are (a) women and (b) from ethnic minorities, respectively.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The latest available figures show that 117 staff in grades 1 to 7 and their equivalent are women: this represents almost 14 per cent. In the unified grades 11 per cent. of staff at grade 3, 24 per cent. at grade 5, 8 per cent. at grade 6 and 23 per cent. at grade 7 are women.

As to ethnic origin, for which information is derived from voluntary surveys, 36 members of staff in grades 1 to 7 and their equivalent described themselves as of ethnic minority origin: this represents some 4 per cent. of respondents in these grades.

In the Home Office as a whole, 24 per cent. of staff are women and almost 5 per cent. of respondents to voluntary surveys described themselves as of ethnic minority origin.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he has taken to recruit members of ethnic minorities in top grades of employment at the Home Office.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Most senior posts are filled internally and the most important factor in increasing the number of ethnic minority staff in those posts will be their advancement over time through the promotion system. Considerable importance is attached to ensuring that they have every opportunity to do so. Recruitment direct to senior grades is generally conducted by the Civil Service Commission, and is always on the basis of fair and open competition. Advertisements make clear that the civil service is an equal opportunities employer.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when his Department last conducted a survey of the ethnic origins of its employees; when it next plans to do so; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: All non-industrial staff in the Home Office were asked to state their ethnic origin in voluntary surveys conducted between 1983 and 1986. A further questionnaire was sent in 1988 to those who had not previously responded. Consideration is now being given to ways in which the response rate for surveys can be increased, and measures are being taken to obtain survey data for industrial staff. People seeking posts in the Department are asked to state their ethnic origin when making their applications.

Community Charge

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons have now received court summonses over failure to pay the poll tax, and, of these, how many are income support claimants; how many liability orders have been issued by the courts and, of these, how many applied to income support claimants; what estimates he makes for these totals over the current three months; and if he will give a geographical breakdown by area or by court.

Mr. John Patten: Information about the number of summonses and liability orders in the period 1 April to 31 December 1990 is available in the Library; comparable information for the period 1 January to 31 March 1991 will be placed in the Library within six weeks of the end of this quarter. I have no information about the number of community charge enforcement proceedings against income support claimants, since this information is not available to justices' clerks and is not necessary for the purposes of these proceedings.

Detainees

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Iraqi and other nationals taken into custody in connection with events in the Gulf are still detained; and what steps he is taking to release them.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: At 4 March, 31 Iraqis and two other nationals were detained under the provisions of the Immigration Act 1971 pending deportation for reasons of national security and 32 Iraqis were detained as prisoners of war.

With the exception of those held as prisoners of war, whose release is a matter for the Ministry of Defence, any detainee is free to leave the United Kingdom at any time. The decisions to detain and to deport continue to be reviewed on an individual basis in the light of representations received, including the advice of the advisory panel.

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many individuals detained by him on the ground of national security under the Immigration Act 1971 have (a) appealed and (b) have had their cases determined by his advisory panel since 16 January 1991, of these how many have been (i) recommended for deportation and (ii) recommended for release; and how many have been (1) released and (2) deported.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 4 March 1991]: Fifty-six of those detained under the Immigration Act requested an appearance before the advisory panel and 42 have been heard since 16 January. Those who have not been heard have requested postponements.

The advice of the panel is confidential but following consideration of this advice and all other representations, my right hon. Friend has decided to continue deportation action in 20 cases and to take no further action in 13. In the other nine cases, the advice is awaited or is under consideration.

A total of 20 were released from detention following my right hon. Friend's consideration of the advice. Two have left the United Kingdom after deportation orders were made against them.

Boundary Commission

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will announce the present membership of the Parliamentary Boundary Commission for England.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Mr. Speaker is Chairman of the Commission. The other members are:

	Appointed by	Date
Mr. Justice Knox	The Lord Chancellor	1 January 1991
Miss Sheila Cameron, QC	The Home Secretary	3 March 1989
Mr. David Macklin	The Secretary of State for the Environment	16 February 1989

[1] First appointed 1 January 1987.

Paul Malone

Mr. Terry Fields: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the relevant chief constable on the present location of exhibits DHH/1, J/T1, J/T2, J/T3, J/T4 and J11, a hospital appointment card, photographs relative to the charges made against Malone and original handwritten interview notes taken at Ellesmere Port police station, Cheshire, in the case of Paul Malone currently residing in Durham prison; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 4 March 1991]: The location of these exhibits is a matter for the relevant chief officer of police to whom inquiries should be addressed directly.

WALES

Road Safety Education

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) which (a) primary and (b) secondary schools in each local education authority area in Wales currently do not have road safety education programmes;

(2) what was the average amount of time given to teaching road safety education programmes in (a) primary schools and (b) secondary schoools in each local education authority area in Wales during 1990; and what were the corresponding figures for each year since 1979.

Sir Wyn Roberts: This information is not held centrally.

Environmentally Sensitive Areas

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will make it his Department's policy to maintain the voluntary nature of environmentally sensitive area schemes and maintain the role of the project officers as interpreters and advisers on the guidelines.

Mr. David Hunt: I have no plans to change these arrangements.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he has any plans to link payments made under the environmentally sensitive areas scheme to the annual rate of inflation.

Mr. David Hunt: No. The level of payments in the Cambrian mountains and Lleyn peninsula ESAs have been reviewed and my judgment was that the existing rates of payment were appropriate and there was no justification for increasing them.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to offer a minimum level of payment per farm when deciding on environmentally sensitive areas scheme allocations.

Mr. David Hunt: This is one of the matters which I will consider as part of our review of the scheme which is now under way.

Property Marking

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether it is the policy of his Department to mark property with an indelible mark or similar means of identification.

Mr. David Hunt: As a rule my Department finds it unnecessary to have to use special markings to protect its property, but we have taken action to mark telephone handsets which have proved to be vulnerable to theft.

Family Planning Clinics

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many family planning clinics have been operational in each district health authority area in Wales in each year since 1976.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: This information is not available centrally.

Secure Accommodation (Juveniles)

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consideration he has given to the provison of secure establishments in Wales for juveniles awaiting trial; and if he will make a statement.

Mr Nicholas Bennett: Our officials are presently conducting a review of secure care in Wales, including the need to make provision for juveniles on remand. We expect to have their final report shortly.

Veterinary Inspection Centre, Bangor

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if any decision has been taken on the future of the Bryn Adda veterinary inspection centre in Bangor, Gwynedd.

Mr. David Hunt: My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food expects to be able to make an announcement about the review of the veterinary investigation service very shortly.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for 5 March.

Mr. MacGregor: I have been asked to reply.

My right honourable Friend the Prime Minister is in Moscow having bilateral discussions with President Gorbachev.

CIVIL SERVICE

Ethnic Minorities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service what steps he has taken to recruit members of ethnic minorities in top grades of employment at the Cabinet Office.

Mr. Renton: The top grades in my Department are normally filled by promotion from within, or by staff on loan from other Departments. The Cabinet Office monitors the ethnic origin of all new entrants to the Department and promotion is solely on merit. If it is necessary to recruit to the top grades from outside the civil service, the Cabinet office turns to the Civil Service Commissioners. They adopt a wide range of good equal opportunity practices to aid recruitment of members of the ethnic minorities, including the monitoring of applicants at every stage of the selection process.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Telephone Calls (Tracing)

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures are being taken to encourage the development of equipment to trace hoax and nuisance telephone calls; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: The provision of call tracing facilities is primarily a matter for the network operators. I know that the Director General of Telecommunications, Sir Bryan Carsberg, is keeping the situation under close review.

Hoax and nuisance calls are an obnoxious practice, causing great distress, and I have every sympathy with the victims. Complaints should be referred to the police, who have the power to prosecute under the Telecommunications Act 1984. British Telecom and Mercury are ready and willing to co-operate in such inquiries by tracing calls.

There is at present no equipment approved for connection to the public telephone network that the residential customer can use to trace calls. An application for approval has been received in respect of a call filter device. This would enable certain customers, connected to digital exchanges, to screen calls before answering them. The device works by requiring the caller to key in a number before the called party has to accept the call.

Trade Balance

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will set out the increase or decrease in value and volume of manufactured trade to and from the Federal Republic of Germany of (a) United Kingdom, (b) France and (c) the United States of America in each year from 1985 to 1990, together with the balance of total trade and manufactured trade with Germany in each case.

Mr. Leigh: The information is in the tables. Figures for 1990 are not available for the United States of America and France.

Data in volume terms are not available for bilateral trade.

Companies Act 1989

Sir Michael Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to commence provisions of the Companies Act 1989.

Mr. Redwood: On Monday 4 March I signed an order which commences certain provisions of the Act. Sections 126 and 127(3) concerning company records come into force on 1 July. Certain powers to make regulations under part VII of the Act—financial markets and insolvency—are also commenced so as to permit regulations under that part to be made to take effect at the time the substantive provisions come into force, which is expected to be in mid-April. The remaining provisions of section 193 come into force on 1 April 1991. Section 193 inserts section 62a and paragraph 22A of schedule 11 into the Financial Services Act 1986, restricting to private investors the right to bring action for contravention of rules, regulations and so on. I have also made regulations under section 62a of the 1986 Act defining "private investor" and specifying circumstances in which rights are retained by persons other than private investors. These will also come into force on 1 April 1991.

I have placed a copy of the order in the Library.

ECGD Insurance Services Group

Dr. Hampson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will publish the list of potential purchasers after privatisation of the insurance services group of the Export Credits Guarantee Department.

Mr. Lilley [pursuant to the reply, 4 February 1991, c. 25]: The privatisation of ECGD's short-term business, currently undertaken within the insurance services group, will, as previously announced, be by means of a competition among prospective trade purchasers and consortia.

Last July, Samuel Montagu, acting on my behalf, issued a prequalification questionnaire accompanied by a preliminary information memorandum to potential investors who had expressed a written interest in acquiring the business. There was a good response to these documents from a wide range of investors.

The Government have now decided on a shortlist of potential bidders for the business. In alphabetical order, these are:

Assicurazioni Generali;
Cobac;
A consortium comprising Eagle Star and Gerling, with shareholdings of 95 per cent. and 5 per cent. respectively;
NCM;
Sun Alliance;
Trade Indemnity.

The shortlisted companies have been informed of the Government's decision and are being invited to tender accordingly.

The shortlist has been selected with regard to a range of criteria including the candidates' commercial understanding of, and commitment to, the credit insurance business, their financial robustness and willingness to take over the business broadly on the basis proposed by the Government. The shortlisted candidates have all stated their willingness to bid for 100 per cent. of the business.

Prior to the submission of tenders bidders will have the opportunity of detailed discussions with ECGD, including members of insurance services management, staff representatives and the Government's advisers on the sale.

The deadline for receipt of tenders will be 30 April 1991, following which there will be a period of evaluation. Price will be an important, but not the sole, criterion to be taken into account. I reserve the right to reject any or all of the bids. The sale is not likely to be completed before the end of July, but it is our intention to proceed as quickly as possible, subject to the successful passage of the Bill through Parliament.

Normal competition legislation and procedures will apply to the sale.

Arrangements are being made for appropriate information from the invitation to tender to be laid in the Library of the House.

TRANSPORT

Seatbelts

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many children who were killed or injured in road accidents were not wearing seatbelts in (a) 1989 and (b) 1990.

Mr. Chope: The information available is as follows:

(a) Since January 1983, all front seat occupants of cars or light vans have been required to wear a seat belt. From 1 September 1989, further regulations were introduced requiring children aged under 14 to wear a selt belt in the rear of cars or light vans where such a belt was fitted. Casualty figures for 1989, for children aged 0 to 13 travelling in cars or light vans, are given in the following table:

Child casualties in cars and light vans in road accidents
Great Britain
1989

	Children aged 0 to 13
	Killed	Injured
Seat belt worn	20	4,143
Seat belt not worn	34	4,864
Not reported	16	2,180
TOTAL	70	11,257

(b) Corresponding figures for 1990 are not yet available.

MV Breydon

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the destination and cargo of the British registered coaster MV Breydon when fire broke out earlier this month.

Mr. McLoughlin: A statement is not appropriate at this stage as the cause of the fire is still being investigated by the marine accident investigation branch. However, I understand that when the fire broke out the vessel was on passage from Great Oakely, near Harwich to Drogheda in Southern Ireland, with a cargo of explosives.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when his Department last conducted a survey of the ethnic origins of its employees; when it next plans to do so; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Department completed its latest voluntary survey of the ethnic origins of its staff during January 1991. The Department's response rate following the re-survey is 91 per cent. This information will be kept up to date by asking new entrants to complete an ethnic background questionnaire.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many and what percentage of officers in each grade (1-7) and overall in the Department are (a) women and (b) from ethnic minorities, respectively.

Mr. McLoughlin: The numbers and percentages of women and ethnic minority staff employed in the Department at present are:

	Total	Women		Recorded number	Ethnic[1] percentage
		Number	Percentage
All grades	15,274	7,005	45·86	644	4·22

Grade 7	526	58	11·02	16	3·04
Total	822	69	8·38	20	2·43

[1] These figures are based on a voluntary confidential survey of staff. the response rate overall and for the grades 1-7, is 91 per cent.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he has taken to recruit members of ethnic minorities in top grades of employment at his Department.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Civil Service Commission is responsible for the recruitment of top grades to all Departments of the civil service. Recruitment and promotion are carried out on the principle of fair and open competition.

The Commission is extending links with universities, polytechnics and tertiary colleges to attract more applicants including those from ethnic minorities; ensuring that its recruitment brochures reflect a multi-racial work force; and validating selection procedures to ensure that they are fair and non-discriminatory.

British Rail

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what performance targets he set British Rail for the number of trains which arrive on time during (a) 1989 and (b) 1990; what was the performance against target; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: British Rail's current quality of service objectives were set in December 1989 by my right hon. Friend, the member for Hertsmere, to cover a three-year period from April 1990 to March 1993. BR's quality objectives for InterCity and Network SouthEast were set by the Government in October 1986 and covered the period up to the end of March 1990. Quality objectives for regional railways were first set in July 1989. The performance of each sector against their separate objectives is shown in the attached table:

British Rail performance: Punctuality

InterCity

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he could list the amount spent on research and development by British Rail for each year since 1979.

Mr. McLoughlin: This is a matter for British Rail. The information is not immediately available in my Department.

Coastguard Service

Mr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the detailed recommendations of the regional controllers on the implementation of the review of the auxiliary coastguard service.

Mr. McLoughlin: It is not normal practice to publish the advice of officials to Ministers. However, I would be willing to discuss the outcome of the review with the hon. Member before reaching decisions.

Mr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library a full copy of the review of Her Majesty's coastguard sector organisation and auxiliary coastguard service.

Mr. McLoughlin: No. But I have made widely available a summary of those points of the review that are likely to be of interest outside the coastguard service.

Roads

Mr. Cormack: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the next stage in the Government's policy of encouraging privately-financed roads infrastructure will be.

Mr. Rifkind: The Government are committed to greater use of the private sector in providing transport infrastructure. I have now decided to seek views on the suitability of the western orbital route for a private finance competition.

The scheme has been planned hitherto as a public sector road. But I believe that the private sector should be given the opportunity to play the leading role in designing, planning, building and operating this road and financing it by tolls paid by the motorist. Of course, the Government are concerned to achieve the most cost effective provision of roads, and so will choose the option which offers better value for money. The costs and benefits of private sector proposals for the western orbital route will therefore be compared with those of the public sector alternative.

Private sector involvement can provide the opportunity for more and better transport provision, relieving congestion whilst safeguarding the environment. Market disciplines should lead to greater efficiency and innovation. The private sector costs would not be subtracted from total public sector provision.

There will be full safeguards for the environment and for local people, if a private sector scheme goes ahead. The Department of Transport will be looking for proposals for a privately financed road on broadly the same route as that already announced.

Extensive environmental protection, including sensitive landscaping, would be a dominant feature of the proposed public sector scheme. Any private sector scheme would be required to achieve the same environmental standards, and a full environment assessment carried out.

If the privately-funded scheme goes ahead authorisation will be sought under the new procedures proposed under the New Roads and Street Works Bill. This means that those affected by the road would have the same opportunities to voice their opinions as if the road were a public scheme. And the arrangements for compensation of owners of land or property would be exactly the same as if the scheme were publicly-funded.

I would aim for a private sector road to be completed at approximately the same time as the public sector scheme, that is towards the end of the 1990s.

This is a major new opportunity for the private sector to provide roads, and good news for the west midlands. It shows that the private finance initiative goes from strength to strength. I look forward to seeing an imaginative response from industry to get this road built as quickly as possible.

The positive benefits of this scheme are enormous. It would reduce congestion on the existing M5 and M6, and improve access to the western side of the west midlands conurbation, and therefore assist in the economic regeneration of the inner city areas, particularly in the black country.

We would ensure that the positive benefits of this route for the west midlands are protected by seeking from bidders a road which achieves the objective of relieving the present M5 and M6 within the conurbation and provides better connections to the national motorway system for Dudley and Wolverhampton.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many and what percentage of officers in each grade (1-7) and overall in the Treasury are (a) women and (b) from ethnic minorities respectively.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information requested in respect of grades 1 to 7 is shown in the table. The proportion of Treasury staff who are women is 43 per cent. Ethnic origin data is held for 84 per cent. of Treasury staff and of this total just over 7 per cent. are from ethnic minorities. All figures reflect the position as at 28 February 1991.

Income Tax

Mr. Beith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 18 December, Official Report, column 111, whether he has completed his consideration of the tax liability of hostages and refugees from Iraq and Kuwait who have been obliged to return home before the end of the tax year; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: I am still considering the matter.

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many tax units in the United Kingdom had (a) earnings, (b) total incomes per annum and (c) total assets exceeding (i) £70,000, (ii) £100,000, (iii) £250,000, (iv) £500,000 and (v) £1,000,000 in 1990-91; what was the percentage of the total in each category; and what were the comparable figures in 1978-79, adjusted for inflation.

Mr. Maude: The available information is given in the table:

	Number of individuals (thousands)	Percentage of taxpayers
1990-91
Earnings over £70,000	115	0·4
Total income for income tax purposes over £70,000	170	0·6

Earnings over £27,700	20	0·1
Total income for income tax purposes over £27,700	30	0·1

Estimates of the value of assets of the United Kingdom population in 1990-91 are not yet available. Information for 1988 and earlier years is published in Economic Trends October 1990.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the cost in 1991-92 and a full year of increasing all personal allowances by (a) the current increase in average earnings, (b) the inflation rate in December 1990, (c) 8 per cent. and (d) 5·5 per cent.; what would be the impact in each case on the number of people paying tax; and what would be the average gain per person in each case for people on annual incomes of £5,000, £10,000, £15,000, £20,000, £30,000, £40,000 and £50,000 and over.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 25 February 1991]: The latest estimates are given in the tables.

Effects of changes for 1991-92 compared with 1990-91 income tax allowances and thresholds

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the cost of enabling married couples who wish to share the benefits of married couple's allowance equally between them to do so.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 25 February 1991]: About £5 million in a full year at 1990-91 levels.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much revenue would be obtained if (a) personal tax allowances, (b) age allowance, (c) mortgage interest tax relief and (d) tax relief for occupational and private pensions were restricted to the basic rate in 1991-92 and in a full year.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 25 February 1991]: Estimates for 1991-92 are not yet available.

The latest estimates of the direct revenue yields in a full year at 1990-91 levels of income from restricting the income tax reliefs and allowances to the basic rate are as follows:

	£ million
Personal tax allowances	1,270
Age allowance[1]	nil
Mortgage interest relief	470
Relief on contributions to personal pensions[2]	[3]130
Relief on employee's contributions to occupational pension schemes	220

[1] The extra component of the personal allowance given solely to aged taxpayers.
[2] Including relief for retirement annuity premia and free standing additional voluntary contributions.
[3] This estimate is subject to a wide margin of error.

The direct revenue yield from restricting all reliefs and allowances to the basic rate is likely to be in the order of £3 billion, somewhat more than the sums of the yields from restricting the reliefs and allowances separately; this is due to the cumulative effect of bringing more people into higher rate tax. About two-thirds of those who would pay more tax as a result of this change are currently liable only at the basic rate. No account is taken of possible behavioural changes or the effect on receipts of capital gains tax.

Business Expansion Scheme

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many new lettings from investments under the business expansion scheme in 1989-90 there were in (a) south-east England and (b) the United Kingdom; and what percentage these figures represent of (i) all privately rented property and (ii) all rented property.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 25 February 1991]: Provisional estimates for new lettings from investments under the business expansion scheme in 1989-90 are as follows:

	New lettings	As a percentage of:
	Total number	All privately rented property per cent.	All rented property per cent.
South-east England	1,000	0·18	0·05
United Kingdom	3,000	0·18	0·04

Mortgage Tax Relief

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many individuals are currently receiving mortgage interest tax relief; how many of these are men; and how many of the total are receiving relief at the top rate of tax.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 25 February 1991]: There are an estimated 9·4 million single people and married couples with mortgages in 1990-91, of whom about one million receive interest relief at a rate in excess of the basic rate of income tax. A breakdown of the total number of mortgagors is given in the table.

Mortgagors	Million
Single men	1·3
Single women	1·0
Married couples	7·1
Total	9·4

THE ARTS

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Minister for the Arts how many and what percentage of officers in each grade (1-7) and overall in the Department are (a) women and (b) from ethnic minorities, respectively.

Mr. Renton: The number and percentage, of women in grades 2, 5, 6 and 7, and overall in the Office of Arts and Libraries, is as follows. The Department does not employ anyone in grades 1, 3 and 4.

	Number in grade	Number of women in grade	Percentage
Grade 2	1	0	0
Grade 5	4	1	25
Grade 6	1	1	100
Grade 7 (and equivalent)	9	2	22
Departmental total	59	26	44

When responding to the ethnic origin questionnaire none of the staff in the Office of Arts and Libraries indicated that they were of ethnic minority origin.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Minister for the Arts what steps he has taken to recruit members of ethnic minorities in top grades of employment at the Office of Arts and Libraries.

Mr. Renton: The top grades in my Department are normally filled by promotion from within, or by loans from other Departments. The Cabinet Office records the ethnic origin of all new entrants to the Department, and promotion is solely on merit.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Minister for the Arts when his Department last conducted a survey of the ethnic origins of its employees; when it next plans to do so; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The last survey of staff was conducted in 1986. This is kept up to date by information on the ethnic origins of new staff and leavers.

EMPLOYMENT

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when his Department last conducted a survey of the ethnic origins of its employees; when it next plans to do so; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The first survey of ethnic origin of staff took place in 1986 and was undertaken on the basis of voluntary self classification. A reminder was sent to all staff for whom the information was not held in November 1988. As a result we now know the ethnic origin of 92·1 per cent. of ED group staff. My Department is now considering whether further action is required.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is his forecast of changes in employment by industry for the period 1991 to 2000 for Leeds, West for men, women, young persons and ethnic minorities.

Mr. Jackson: The Department does not make forecasts of employment.

Taylorplan Services Ltd.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether the wages inspectorate has examined rates of pay advertised or paid by Taylorplan Services Ltd. for contract employees in the public or private sector; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: The wages inspectorate has no record of Taylorplan Services Ltd. However, in 1986, the wages inspectorate examined rates of pay at Taylorplan Catering Ltd.

Efficiency Scrutinies

Mr. Lee: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to undertake new efficiency scrutinies.

Mr. Forth: I have decided to set up an efficiency scrutiny to examine the industrial tribunal system.

ENVIRONMENT

Water Companies

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment at the time of privatisation, what guidance he gave to water companies with regard to the companies offering consumers alternatives to water metering; and what discussions took place with local authorities on plans to provide alternative systems of valuation in new premises.

Mr. Trippier: We have not given any guidance to water companies or held discussions with local authorities about methods of charging for water services. Each company has had to decide how to charge customers in new or converted properties, in the light of the abolition of domestic rates from 1 April 1990, and I understand that most companies have decided to meter such properties. The Director General of Water Services is responsible for protecting customers' interests and for ensuring that companies do not show undue preference or discrimination in their charging policies.

Dredging

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that British Waterways is carrying out all its statutory obligations under section 105 of the Transport Act 1968 with respect to dredging.

Mr. Trippier: Responsibility for day-to-day waterway operation and maintenance rests with the British Waterways Board. It is for the board to satisfy itself that it is fulfilling its statutory obligations for dredging.

Housing

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many additional units of accommodation each local authority originally estimated would result from the extra housing investment allocation announced on 27 March 1990; and how many units have been provided to date comprising (a) local authority empty dwellings refurbished, (b) housing association empty dwellings refurbished, (c) hostel places provided by local authorities, (d) hostel spaces provided by housing associations, (e) mobile homes provided by local authorities, (f) homes becoming available through cash incentive payments and (g) other.

Sir George Young: The cost of compiling the information in the form requested would be disproportionate. I will write to the hon. Member with the material we already have available.

Homelessness

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which local authorities have received extra housing investment allocation in 1990-91 to provide additional accommodation for the homeless under its £112 million initiative announced on 27 March 1990; and what additional housing investment allocation each local authority has received.

Sir George Young: My Department's news release No. 198 dated 27 March 1990, a copy of which was placed in the Library of the House, sets out the information requested by the hon. Member.

Lead-free Petrol

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place in the Library a copy of the results of his Department's survey into motorists' attitudes to the use of lead-free petrol; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Yes. We expect to have the results of the survey in April.

Households, Hackney

Mr. Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has of the number of households in the London borough of Hackney which are occupied by (a) two or (b) more than two adults.

Mr. Yeo: Information is not available in precisely the form requested. However, projections of married couple, lone parent, one person and other households for 1991 are published in the Department's "1985 based estimates of numbers of households in England, the regions, counties, metropolitan districts and London boroughs 1985-2001", which is in the Library.

Council Homes, Exeter

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the latest figure for the number of unoccupied council houses and flats in Exeter.

Mr. Yeo: The latest available information on empty council dwellings relates to 1 April 1990 and was provided by Exeter city council in its April 1990 housing investment programme return (HIP1), a copy of which is in the Library.

Gulf Casualties

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans have been made to provide adapted housing for service personnel permanently disabled in the Gulf; and how these will be financed.

Sir George Young: British casualties in the Gulf have, mercifully, been light and no difficulty is expected in providing adapted housing for any of them who may have been permanently disabled. Disabled people may obtain assistance for house adaptations under the house renovation grant system introduced by the Local Government and Housing Act 1989.

Community Charge

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is his estimate of the total amounts of money to be made available under the community charge reduction scheme to residents in Gedling borough;

(2) if he will set out the calculation of the community charge reduction scheme applying to the borough of Gedling.

Mr. Key: No information is yet available on the amount of reduction scheme grant payable to each charging authority. However, if Gedling borough council sets its community charge for 1991-92 at or above £364, a couple who have not moved since 31 March 1990 living in a property of average rateable value could look forward to a reduction of £120 between them; a couple living in a property of half average rateable value could get a reduction of £371 between them.

Competitive Tendering

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he proposes to take in regard to Redditch borough council under part I of the Local Government Act 1988.

Mr. Key: My right hon. Friend has today issued a direction under section 14 of the Local Government Act 1988 requiring Redditch borough council to expose refuse collection work to competitive tendering again by 1 February 1992. He has taken this action because he was not satisfied with the response which Redditch borough council made to the notice served on 18 January 1991 under section 13 of the Act.

That notice set out the Secretary of State's view that Redditch borough council had acted contrary to the requirement of section 7(7) of the Act, which is that, in awarding a contract, an authority must not act in a manner having the effect or intended or likely to have the effect of restricting, distorting or preventing competition, in that, in assigning this work to its direct service organisation, it rejected a lower tender from a private contractor without sufficient reasons.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he intends to take in relation to those authorities which have now set budgets above the limits implied by the intended capping criteria; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: We will not hesitate to use our capping powers to curb those authorities' budgets which we consider excessive or represent an excessive increase over the previous year.

As we have made clear on a number of occasions our present intention is to apply the criteria which my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State announced on 31 October 1990. These intended criteria are, however, necessarily provisional since we cannot take our capping decisions until authorities generally have set their budgets. When we do so, we shall take into account all appropriate considerations. But it is clearly a matter of concern that a few authorities have decided to budget at levels which under the intended criteria are excessive or represent an excessive increase: it remains open to such authorities to adopt substitute lower budgets if they so wish.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment at what stage in their posting local authorities are able to exempt (a) married and (b) single Gulf service personnel from the poll tax.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 4 March 1991]: There is no exemption for people serving in the Gulf. It is for community charge registration officers to decide when the law requires a person to be removed from the register, thus ending liability to the charge. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced on 19 February that it is our intention that those serving in the Gulf should not have to pay the charge during that period. We are currently considering what steps need to be taken to realise this objective.

Acid Rain

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will now place in the Library detailed maps of those parts of the country vulnerable to acid rain pollution from sulphur dioxide emissions from electricity generating stations.

Mr. Baldry: I have placed in the Library copies of two reports to my Department by the United Kingdom critical loads advisory group. These include maps of the United Kingdom in respect of soils, and of Scotland in respect of freshwaters, showing "critical loads" for sulphur—the levels of deposition in excess of which damage may be caused to ecosystems—and the places in which those loads are currently exceeded as a result of emissions of sulphur dioxide from all sources, not merely from electricity generating stations. The maps have been produced to inform discussions in the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe which are intended to lead to agreement of a new protocol on the abatement of sulphur dioxide emissions. They represent the latest available scientific assessment of the current position, and are not indications of policy. The United Kingdom is already committed, under the EC large combustion plants directive, to secure reductions of 60 per cent. in sulphur dioxide emissions from existing large combustion plant by 2003, compared with 1980 levels.

Departmental Policies (Environmental Implications)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what actions have been taken since the appointment of a Minister in his Department to consider the environmental implications of his Department's policies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine [holding answer 1 March 1991]: My Department has been active in implementing the commitments made in the Environment White Paper, "This Common Inheritance", since its publication in September. Our departmental report, published on 13 February, recorded progress with a wide range of initiatives, reflecting the White Paper's comprehensive review of policy affecting the environment. These included a 20 per cent. increase in funding for environmental research over the next three years, increased staffing for Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution and a £60 million pilot energy efficiency programme for local authority housing.

Snow Clearing

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will issue a circular to local authorities on clearing snow from pavements in built-up areas.

Mr. Chope: I have been asked to reply.

I have no plans to issue a circular, but I shall be happy to consider any specific representations which the hon. Member has about snow clearing by local authorities.

ENERGY

Energy Conservation

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make it his Department's policy to adopt specific annual targets for energy conservation and efficiency.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Decisions on investment in energy efficiency measures are a matter for individual consumers and it would be inappropriate for the Government to set specific national targets for annual improvements.

However, my energy efficiency office offers a range of programmes and other initiatives designed to encourage the adoption of cost effective energy efficiency measures. Measures of performance for each of these programmes are published annually, most recently in February 1991 in "The Government's Expenditure Plans Within the Energy Sector 1991-92 to 1993-94" (Cm 1505), copies of which are available in the Library.

Renewable Energy

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on progress on the renewable non-fossil fuel obligation 1991 bidding round.

Mr. Moynihan: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy has informed the House of our intention to make a further Renewables Order in the autumn of this year. The procedure that has been adopted by the regional electricity companies (RECs) to select the projects to be contracted under the order has been widely publicised, and was the subject of a seminar for renewables operators, jointly hosted by the Non-Fossil Purchasing Agency Ltd. and the Office of Electricity Regulation (OFFER), last month. That procedure is now in hand. It involves an initial scrutiny of the tenders, against the requirements of the legislation, by OFFER; a review period for unsuccessful tenderers; and a competitive bidding procedure for successful tenderers. My right hon. Friend will then determine the level of the obligation and the technology bands to be included within it, in the light of the advice of the Director General of Electricity Supply as to the available field and in consultation with the regional electricity companies. The RECs will then conclude contracts, to the required level of capacity, with the most economic projects in each band.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what financial contribution he will make to the Price Waterhouse critical path with analysis for the 1991 round of tendering for the non-fossil fuel renewables tranche; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: None. Price Waterhouse are advisers on the non-fossil fuel obligation to the regional electricity companies, and this is therefore a matter for the RECs and their agent the Non-Fossil Purchasing Agency.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what assessment he has made of the potential for wind, wave and other intermittent renewable energy services taking part successfully in the 1991 round of bidding for the non-fossil fuel obligation renewables tranche.

Mr. Moynihan: In answer to a parliamentary question on 19 December, at columns 162-63, my right hon. Friend gave an initial indication of the likely sizes of bands which might be included in the 1991 Renewables Order. However, it is for the regional electricity companies (RECs) to submit the projects that apply for inclusion in the 1991 renewables non-fossil fuel obligation (NFFO) to the Director-General of Electricity Supply (DGES), and for the DGES to assess the projects against the requirements of the legislation. We will then consult the DGES and the RECs before eventually setting the level of the obligation for the 1991 order.

Office of Electricity Regulation

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what discussions he had with the Director-General of the Office of Electricity Regulation between 18 and 20 February.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I, my Ministerial colleagues and officials are in regular contact with the Director-General of Electricity Supply and OFFER on regulatory matters concerning electricity.

DEFENCE

The Gulf

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence to what extent the 1st Armoured Division has been dependent on assistance from United Kingdom helicopters during the Gulf conflict.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A force of Lynx anti-tank and Gazelle observation/general purpose helicopters operate as an integral part of the 1st Armoured Division. The division is supported by Royal Air Force Chinook and Puma helicopters, together with Royal Navy Sea Kings, which provide rapid airlift for both personnel and materiel.

Dockyards

Mr. Robert Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many people were employed by his Department in the chief executive dockyard section (a) prior to the closure of Portsmouth and Chatham royal dockyards and (b) prior to the introduction of commercial management at Devonport and Rosyth; and how many people are now employed in the directorate general for ships repair.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Chief Executive Dockyards (CED) HQ staff (excluding Dockyard staff) were 344 in April 1982 prior to the closure of Chatham Dockyard and the conversion of Portsmouth Dockyard to the Fleet Maintenance and Repair Organisation which were completed in 1984. In April 1985, when commercial management of the Dockyards was proposed, there were 255 CED HQ staff; building up to 439 Directorate General Ship Refitting and transitional CED HQ staff in April 1987 when commercial management was introduced. There are currently 346 HQ staff in DGSR excluding the Superintendent Ships organisation in the dockyards. It should be noted, however, that DGSR now includes staff performing contracting, accounting, estimating and pricing functions which were not part of CED's responsibility.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Veal Crates

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he proposes to take to ensure that British standards relating to the use of veal crates are adopted by the European Community.

Mr. Maclean: Community proposals on the welfare of calves are already under discussion in the Council. We are pressing for our standards to be adopted throughout the Community from the earliest possible date.

Animal Feed

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any proposals to improve the monitoring of Chinese cotton seed imported for use as animal feed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: The Department is currently working with the feed industry on a survey on the contamination of raw materials of vegetable origin, including cotton seed. The results of the survey will be carefully studied to see whether any further action will be necessary on any of these materials.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any proposals to introduce labelling requirements for clean animal feeds.

Mr. Maclean: It is already an offence to sell animal feeds containing ingredients which are deleterious to animals. Manufacturers are required to label detailed information on nutritional quality and from next January they will also have to declare the ingredients of their feeds.

Property Marking

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether it is the policy of his Department to mark property with an indelible mark or similar means of identification.

Mr. Curry: It is not the policy of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to mark property with an indelible mark or similar means of identification. Most high-value items have registered numbers and these are recorded in stock registers. An annual stocktake is carried out. To mark items would be highly labour-intensive and not cost-effective.

Salmonella

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to abandon his policy of compulsory slaughter of egg-laying flocks infected with salmonella enteritidis.

Mr. Maclean: We have no plans to do so.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

School Enrolments

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the most recent enrolment figures for primary and secondary schools in the Crewe and Nantwich area.

Mr. Fallon: Information for areas within local education authorities is not available centrally.

The number of new admissions to maintained primary and secondary schools in Cheshire as at January 1990 is:

Schools	Number of new admissions
Primary[1]	12,171
Secondary[2]	11,575

[1] Children aged 4 and 5 admitted in September 1989 and January 1990. Excludes admissions to nursery classes.
[2] Number of pupils admitted in September 1989. Includes admissions to sixth form colleges.

"New Directions"

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has received a copy of "New Directions" published by the Royal National Institute for the Blind.

Mr. Fallon: My hon. Friend Under-Secretary of State (Mr. Howarth) was formally presented with a copy of "New Directions" on 31 October 1990. He welcomed the report and acknowledged it as a major contribution by the RNIB to advance the interests of visually impaired children and adults in this country.

Multi-disabled Children

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to review the work of agencies involved in the care of multi-disabled, visually impaired children.

Mr. Fallon: This Department does not at present have any plans to review the work of these agencies.

Higher Education

Dr. Woodcock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of the United Kingdom population achieved higher education qualifications in the latest period for which figures are available; and what comparable information he has for France and Germany.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The requested information is given in the table.

Country	Year of Data	Higher education[1] qualifications awarded per 100 of relevant age group[2]
United Kingdom[3]	1988	33
France[4]	1987	33
Germany	1987	37
	1987	22

1. International standard classifications of education (ISCED) level 3 incorporating sub-degree, first degree and post-graduate study.
2. The relevant age group is taken as the average single-year population in the group including 70 per cent. of new entrants at the start of the course. This is the standard OECD definition.
3. Includes estimated professional qualifications and nursing and paramedical qualifications gained at DH establishments. Excludes private sector.
4. Includes some sub-degree diplomas awarded on completion of the first two years of a first degree course.

Geography

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what advice he took in amending the National Curriculum Council's consultation report, to produce the draft order for geography.

Mr. Fallon: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Broadgreen (Mr. Fields) on 13 February at column 464.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has gathered when considering the geography national curriculum about the ways in which geography teachers have studied the Gulf and explored the issues involved.

Mr. Fallon: None.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what strategies the draft order for geography offers to teachers to enable their students to handle the amount of available information relating to geographical and environmental issues;

(2) what role is envisaged for geography, as outlined in the draft national curriculum order, in the teaching of the cross-curricular themes of economic awareness and citizenship.

Mr. Fallon: The National Curriculum Council intends to publish detailed advice on the implementation of the statutory requirements for geography in the national curriculum. This guidance will cover issues such as the organisation of teaching within the classroom and links with cross-curricular themes.

Specific guidance on the cross-curricular themes of economic and industrial understanding and citizenship, which was published by NCC in 1990, explains in broad terms the contribution which geography and other national curriculum subjects can make towards the teaching of these themes.

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what responses he has received to the draft order for geography; and how he proposes to respond.

Mr. Fallon: During the statutory consultation on the draft order for geography in the national curriculum, my right hon. and learned Friend received a total of 289 responses. He will consider the comments made in drawing up the final order which will set out in statute the attainment targets and programmes of study for national curriculum geography.

Lancashire Education Department

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many persons were employed in the education department of the Lancashire county council in 1981 and each year to the present day.

Mr Fallon: The total employees of Lancashire local education authority in March 1990 were as follows:

	Number
Full-time teachers and lecturers	13,400
Part-time teachers and lecturers	4,700
Full-time other employees	4,200
Part-time other employees	13,700

These figures include the nursery, primary and secondary schools sector, special and further education and central administration.

Comparable figures for other years are not available.

History

Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received this month on the history curriculum.

Mr. Fallon: During the statutory consultation on the draft order for history in the national curriculum, my right hon. and learned Friend received a variety of representations from 225 organisations or individuals. These included representations from LEAs, teacher associations, religious bodies and subject associations such as the Historical Association, the Royal Historical Society, the Primary History Association and the History Curriculum Association.

University Grants Committee

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will set out calculations showing how (i) basic grant, (ii) current grant and (iii) total resources are distributed to universities by the University Grants Committee for academic year 1991-92 (a) compared with the allocations for 1990-91 and (b) reconciled to the Department's expenditure plans as set out in Cm. 1511.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The aggregate sums distributed by the Universities Funding Council in each academic year are:

£ million

	Basic grant	Grant plus fees	Final resources
1990-91	1,341	1,816	1,894
1991-92	1,350	2,049	2,098

Basic grant excludes provision for certain items of funding distributed by the Council outside its allocation formula. These are set out for 1990-91 and 1991-92 in Circular Letters 12/90 and 6/91 respectively, copies of which are in the Library. Those letters also describe the details of the allocation process. Final resources for each year take account of tuition fees for funded places and adjustments for changes in specific funding. Figures for basic grant are not directly comparable with those in Cm. 1511, which relate to financial years and include the sums distributed by the Council outside its allocation formula.

Council for National Academic Awards

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he will announce a decision on the Bird report on the future of the Council for National Academic Awards and related issues.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The right for institutions to award their own degrees cannot be taken as an issue on its own. The report also raises important questions about which institutions should have this right, and about the nature of future quality assurance arrangements. We need to consider these further.

Durants School, Rickmansworth

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to make a decision on the proposal by Hertfordshire county council to close Durants school, Rickmansworth; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon: My right hon. and learned Friend expects to make a decision on Hertfordshire's proposal in respect of this school very shortly. His decision will be notified to Hertfordshire county council as soon as possible.

Student Loans

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the basis for calculating the unit cost per borrower's account of administering the student loans scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The unit cost per account for the academic year 1990-91 will be the operational costs of the Student Loans Company, excluding VAT, during that year, divided by the number of accounts open during the year. The unit cost per account has already fallen substantially during the first months of the scheme. It will continue to fall over the next few years.

The calculation excludes the start-up costs of £9·3 million, excluding VAT, incurred up to 31 August 1990. This one-off expenditure has enabled the company to administer the loans scheme efficiently. It therefore represents an investment in the future of both the company and the loans scheme.

The student loans scheme has made additional resources available to students in higher education. The number of applications passed the 100,000 mark last month. Thousands more students are applying every week. The scheme will generate substantial savings for the taxpayer in the medium term—and facilitate the expansion of higher education that we all want to see—even when the costs of administering the scheme are included. I congratulate the Student Loans Company on its achievement so far.

HEALTH

General Practitioners

15. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the change in the number of general practitioners between 1979 and the latest year for which figures are available.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Between 1 October 1979 and 1 October 1990 the number of general practitioners in England (1990 figures are provisional) increased by 4,267 —an increase of 20 per cent.

NHS Trusts

16. Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about the progress with setting up health service trusts.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am delighted to report that there has been great interest in national health service trust status. Fifty seven national health service trusts will be operational from 1 April this year. The other nine candidates are continuing to work towards trust status. To date, a further 129 hospitals and units have expressed an interest in gaining trust status by April 1992.

Drugs

17. Dame Jill Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he intends taking further steps to combat waste of money due to overprescribing of drugs.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Government are committed to a programme of measures to help eliminate wasteful and unnecessary prescribing. These include educational initiatives, the introduction of medical advisers on prescribing at each family health services authority and the introduction of indicative amounts for practices from 1 April 1991 to provide a financial benchmark against which performance can be measured.

20. Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the cost of the drugs budget to the NHS in the current year.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The latest forecast of spending on drugs in family health services in 1990-91 is £2,116 million. This represents an increase in real terms of 1 per cent. over the outturn for last year, although the rate of growth has slowed compared with previous years as a result of our initiative to encourage cost-effective prescribing. Information on expenditure on drugs in the hospital and community health services is not available for the current year but in 1989-90 amounted to £414 million.

Liver Transplants

18. Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps his department is taking to promote liver transplants.

Mr. Dorrell: The Government are continuing to promote the success of the United Kingdom liver transplant programme in a number of ways. Central funding in excess of £14·7 million will be provided in 1991-92, a fifth supra regional liver transplant centre will be designated from April 1991, and resources aimed at improving the supply of donor organs are regularly increased.

Hearing Aids

19. Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is proposing to take to reduce the waiting times for those requiring hearing aids.

Mr. Dorrell: We have set up and are funding twelve pilot projects in hospitals throughout England. The projects are aimed at testing a variety of ways of reducing waiting times for hearing aid services.

Pay Awards

21. Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what reaction he has received to the recent pay awards to NHS employees.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced on 31 January that the Government had decided to accept in full the review body recommendations, including those for doctors, dentists, nurses and the professions allied to medicine in the national health service. We have received one letter registering disappointment at the staging of the award.

Residential Care

22. Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future of local authority residential care for the elderly and disabled.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Our community care policies, to be implemented between now and 1993, will improve standards in residential care for old or disabled people either in local authority or independent care, and help to ensure that it is not used except where home-based alternatives are or have become unsuitable.

Regional Pay Bargaining

23. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has had about Government plans to decentralise pay bargaining in the health service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn, Hatfield (Mr. Evans).

NHS Spending

24. Dr. Michael Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the spending per head of population on the NHS, now and in 1979; and what are the figures in real terms.

Mr. Dorrell: In 1990-91 planned expenditure per head of population in the United Kingdom is £511. The equivalent figure in 1978-79 was £144 or £365 at today's prices. This is a real terms increase of 40 per cent.

Community Care

25. Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received from local authorities with regard to the implementation of Government proposals for community care.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department meets regularly with the local authority associations and welcomes their continued support for our community care policy.

Primary Health Care

26. Mr. Jack Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to improve the performance of family health service authorities in meeting primary care targets.

Mr. Dorrell: All family health services authorities (FHSAs) have been funded to appoint independent medical advisers to advise general practitioners on clinical and organisational issues. FHSAs can also target funds for GP premises and staff (for example, practice nurses) to support GPs in areas of greatest need. In addition many have appointed facilitators to work with GPs in establishing and improving their health promotion services.

Children

27. Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many scheduled surgical operations to infants under the age of three years have been cancelled for the remaining weeks of the present financial year.

Mr. Dorrell: Information collected centrally refers to cancelled operating sessions, not operations, and does not distinguish the age of the patient. Information for 1989-90, the latest available, is published in "NHS operating theatres availability and use in England—financial year 1989-90", a copy of which is available in the Library.

29. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action the Government are taking to prepare for the implementation of the Children Act 1989.

Mr. Dorrell: A number of documents have already been issued to local authorities including "An Introduction to the Children Act", a training curriculum produced by the London Boroughs Training Committee, and "The Care of Children—Principles and Practice in Regulations and Guidance", copies of which are available in the Library.

The first phase of a wide-ranging consultation exercise on the guidance and regulations required under the Act ended last year. Some 21 draft papers were sent out for comment to a great variety of statutory and voluntary organisations; the response which we received from the field to these drafts was both helpful and encouraging, and the comments were fed into the final drafting of the guidance. The consultation exercise has culminated in the issue of guidance on court orders, one in an initial series of five volumes of guidance and regulations. Some 20,000 copies of this guidance will be distributed free of charge this week. Other volumes will follow shortly.

We have commissioned several projects to provide training in the fields of child care and child protection in advance of implementation on 14 October 1991. Some projects are complete, and the material has been disseminated to the target audiences; others are nearing completion. The projects commissioned will provide professionals and others with a broad understanding and initial awareness of the Act or specialised training in specific aspects of the Act. We are confident that most projects will be completed before October 1991, and staff responsible for working with the Act will receive training in advance of implementation.

We recently announced the provision of an additional £250,000 to assist voluntary organisations in the provision of training for the Act. This money will be administered by the National Council for Voluntary Child Care organisations. In addition, further training projects will be commissioned from April this year, to address areas not covered in the first phase of training. This will include material for guardians ad litem, and on the provisions of the Act relating to children leaving care.

East Cumbria Health Authority

28. Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he last met the chairman of the Northern regional health authority to discuss the funding of East Cumbria health authority.

Mr. Dorrell: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has not discussed the funding of East Cumbria health authority with the chairman of the Northern regional health authority.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Douglas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current waiting time for women who require laser treatment for pre-cancerous cervical cells.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The statistics are not held centrally. These figures would not be recorded separately from other gynaecology statistics.

Food Safety

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what representations his Department has received from the cheese manufacturing industry concerning the proposals made in the Food Hygiene (Amendment) Regulations;

(2) how many cases of food poisoning have been traced to hard cheeses in the last three years;

(3) whether the Food Hygiene (Amendment) Regulations will apply to traditionally produced hard cheeses when (a) vacuum packed and (b) wax coated;

(4) how many cases of food poisoning have been traced to hard cheeses delivered in the post over the last five years.

Mr. Dorrell: The Food Hygiene (Amendment) Regulations 1990 specify that mould (or other micro-organism) ripened soft cheese should be temperature controlled. Hard cheese is only covered by the regulations in cooked products. The regulations do not differentiate vacuum packed or wax coated cheeses.

Data on the incidence of outbreaks of food poisoning related to particular foods is not in itself a conclusive indicator of the need for controls to improve food hygiene.

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment has been made of the effect of the Food Hygiene (Amendment) Regulations on the mail-order food industry.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell) on 21 February at columns 245-46. The Government are consulting mail order firms and others on proposals for amendments to these regulations, including an exemption for mail order to allow industry more time to develop practical means of achieving necessary controls. Amending regulations will be laid before Parliament when the consultation is complete.

Supra-regional Services

Sir David Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he received the recommendations of the supra-regional services advisory group on the future funding and management of the supra-regional services; and what response he has made.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Chairman of the Supra Regional Services Advisory Group sent his recommendations to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 21 December 1990. We accepted the recommendations in full, and issued an announcement to health authorities on 8 February. A copy of this announcement has been placed in the Library.

Officials are arranging contracts with the designated centres. When these are complete, we will make a further announcement of the agreed funding level for each unit.

NHS Pay

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the average rates of pay for NHS ancillary staff (a) in Yorkshire and Humberside and (b) nationally.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The estimated average gross annual rate of pay for NHS ancillary staff in Yorkshire region at September 1990 was £8,200 per whole-time equivalent compared with a figure of £8,170 nationally.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when his Department last conducted a survey of the ethnic origins of its employees; when it next plans to do so; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The last survey of ethnic origin conducted in the Department was over the period June to October 1989. In accordance with the Department's action plan on equal opportunities, a further survey is planned to commence in June this year.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many and what percentage of officers in each grade (1-7) and overall in the Department are (a) women and (b) from ethnic minorities, respectively.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is set out in the table:

Grade	Total Staff[1]	Female		Ethnic Minority[2]
		Number	Per cent.	Number	Per cent.
1	1	0	—	0	—
2	9	2	22·2	0	—

Total	755	214	28·3	20	2·6

[1] Figures from the Department's payroll as at 31 January 1991.
[2] Figures based on questionnaires voluntarily completed by staff. For the grades shown the overall response rate was 89·4 per cent.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he has taken to recruit members of ethnic minorities in top grades of employment at his Department.

Mr. Dorrell: Recruitment for established appointments at senior level is undertaken by the Civil Service Commission. The Department supports the various initiatives which the Civil Service Commission is taking to aid the recruitment of members of the ethnic minorities.

Pharmaceuticals

Mr. Michael Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his response on 30 January, Official Report, column 530, if he will name the major manufacturer of generic pharmaceutical products that has opposed the restoration of patent term protection by the European Commission and indicate what is its manufacturing capacity in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No.

Personal Social Services

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the estimated outturn of expenditure on the personal social services for each local authority in 1990-91; and what was the level of each authority's expenditure on the personal social services in 1979-80 adjusted by (a) the gross domestic product deflator and (b) the change in input unit costs.

Mr. Dorrell: The information is shown in the table:

Salmonella

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what factor he attributes the latest annual increase in salmonella enteritidis infections in humans.

Mr. Dorrell: Epidemiological and microbiological work by the public health laboratory service on salmonella enteritidis phage type 4, which is the main salmonella associated with food poisoning in humans, continues to demonstrate that this organism is predominantly associated with poultry meat and eggs. Reports of illness are still being received where the public health advice about the safe consumption of eggs and the hygienic handling of raw meats especially poultry, is not being followed. It is important that producers, caterers and consumers continue their efforts to control this problem.

Deaths

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the number of deaths of persons classified as of no fixed address for each year since 1980.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

GP Budgets

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many general practices intend to hold their own budget from 1 April.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall make an announcement shortly.

NHS Expenditure

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much cash is currently being spent on the national health service; what was the figure for the year to May 1979 in real and actual terms; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: Expenditure figures for England are available on a financial year basis only. This year gross spending on the NHS in England will be £23·7 billion compared with £6·6 billion, or £16·5 billion in today's prices in 1978-79. This represents a real terms increase of nearly 44 per cent.

Dental Contract

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many dentists in the Bromley area have withdrawn from the national health service since the introduction of the new dental contract.

Mr. Dorrell: Since the introduction of the new dental contract on 1 October 1990, two dentists in the Bromley area have withdrawn from the national health service. This compares with eight withdrawals for the corresponding period in the previous year.

Nurses' Accommodation

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has investigated the amount of surplus nursing accommodation in the London area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The Department recently commissioned a further study of the utilisation of the NHS residential estate and the report of that study is presently being considered. The details of the availability and utilisation rates of health authorities in the Greater London area and the special health authorities for the London post-graduate teaching hospitals are shown in the table.

Gulf Casualties

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans have been made to provide the rehabilitation which may be needed for service personnel injured in the Gulf; and how it will be financed.

Mr. Dorrell: Injuries to service personnel in the Gulf have been mercifully few. We anticipate that any rehabilitation needed after their treatment can be provided within existing plans.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans have been made to provide adequate social services for service personnel wounded in the Gulf; and how these will be financed.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) and the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on 5 February at columns 154-55.

AIDS

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the Government are doing to combat the spread of AIDS.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Government are fully committed to the fight against AIDS. Since 1985, we have allocated more than £500 million of earmarked funding to health and local authorities for the development of AIDS-related services and nearly £8 million to the voluntary sector. During this period we have also allocated over £62 million to support a major public education campaign and made some £50 million available for research into AIDS. In addition, we have played a full part in supporting international initiatives; we are the third largest contributor to WHO's global programme on AIDS.

Achondroplasia

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proposals he has to improve the availability of treatment facilities for achondroplasia.

Mr. Dorrell: It is for local health authorities to decide what services to make available for the treatment of achondroplasia, in the light of their assessment of local health needs and priorities, as against resources.

Hospital Treatment, York

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the numbers of in-patients and day cases treated respectively in the York health authority area were in (i) 1979 and (ii) the latest year for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is given in the table.

In-patients and day cases in York health authority

Taylorplan Services Ltd.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the Bradford hospitals national health service trust assumed responsibility for hospitals in Bradford; when the contract for catering was signed with Taylorplan Services Ltd.; whether he was asked to supply any information about companies tendering for the catering contract; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Bradford hospitals NHS trust was established on 17 December 1990 and has certain functions, which include entering into contracts, before it becomes fully operational on 1 April. The tenders and the contract for catering services are a matter between the Trust and the contractors concerned and the Department has no direct involvement.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library a copy of the technical evaluation by Price Waterhouse of the tender submitted by Taylorplan Services Ltd. to North Lincolnshire district health authority in 1988; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No. The evaluation was a contract matter between Price Waterhouse and the North Lincolnshire district health authority, and formed only part of a wider tendering exercise by that authority. Its contents are commercial in confidence. I can confirm that the authority has awarded two contracts to Taylorplan Services Ltd.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Soviet Union

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made in respect of Boris Nepomniashy of Moscow who has been unsuccessfully applying to leave the Soviet Union.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have included Mr. Nepomniashy's name in the list of cases regularly brought to the attention of the Soviet authorities and will continue to make firm representations in support of his application to leave the Soviet Union.

Israel

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received from the international nuclear-free zone local authorities conference, held in Glasgow last November, concerning the imprisonment in Israel of Mordechai Vanunu.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We are aware of representations made by this body to the Israeli embassy in London. As we have stated on previous occasions, Mr. Vanunu appears to have been treated in accordance with the normal judicial process in Israel and his conditions of imprisonment are compatible with normal Israeli practice.

United Kingdom Embassies

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the role of British military attachés at United Kingdom embassies.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The role of British military attachés at United Kingdom embassies and high commissions is to liaise with defence authorities of host countries on a range of military topics of common interest.

The Gulf

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy on the end of hostilities in the Gulf to investigate the extent to which non-lethal and lethal military technology sold by British firms to Iraq since 1979 was used by Iraq in abuses of the human rights of Kuwaitis or Iraqi dissidents since 2 August 1990.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Such an investigation is neither practicable nor necessary.

Libya

Mr. Ron Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current state of relations with Libya; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We see no prospect of an improvement in Anglo-Libyan relations until we are satisfied that Libya has terminated its support for international terrorism.

Nature and Natural Resources

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, what is Her Majesty's Government's policy on resolution 18/7 which was passed by the 18th General Assembly of the International Union for the Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources in Perth in 1990.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The United Kingdom state delegation to the 18th general assembly of the International Union for the Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources explained that it could not support resolution 18/7 on Antarctica because the resolution endorsed only one possible mechanism for the comprehensive protection of the Antarctic environment. Had the general assembly been required to vote on that resolution the United Kingdom state delegation would have abstained. The state delegations of the United States of America and Norway associated themselves with the United Kingdom's position. A copy of the delegation's statement is being placed in the Library of the House.

Competitive Tendering

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs under what circumstances he would consider it appropriate to seek a single tender rather than open a contract to competitive tender in public relations or similar areas of work.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: It is FCO policy to award contracts on the basis of competitive tender for all kinds of work. Single tender action is used only when there are compelling reasons to do so, for example:

(a) When only one supplier on the bid list submits a bid.
(b) In cases of extreme urgency.
(c) In cases where only one source is acceptable for technical or quality reasons.
(d) When we are seeking extensions to existing contracts.

Hong Kong

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many Hong Kong citizens have applied for United Kingdom passports; what is the likely proportion that will be granted passports; and how many dependants are likely to attach to each passport granted.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: As at 4 March, the total number of applications, including those made by registered post before the 28 February deadline, stands at 65,623. It will not be possible to estimate the proportion of applicants who are likely to succeed, nor how many dependants there may be until all applications have been processed.

Embassy and Consular Staff

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to increase embassy and consular staff in former Warsaw pact countries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: There are no further plans to increase embassy and consular staff in eastern European posts. These were inspected at the end of 1990 when increased staffing levels, authorised during 1990, were endorsed. Future staffing requirements for the Soviet Union are currently under review.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Disability

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many (a) 16 and 17 year-olds and (b) people aged 18 to 25 years have (i) lost entitlement to or (b) been refused income support since the introduction of the age additions in severe disablement allowance;

(2) how many recipients of severe disablement allowance have lost entitlement to income support as a result of the introduction of age-related additions from December 1990.

Miss Widdecombe: It is estimated that up to 5,000 people no longer require income support as a result of the award of age-related additions to severe disablement allowance. This is because their incomes are above income support level. Information about the number of people affected by reference to their ages is not available.

Source: Modelled using data drawn from the 1989 ASE.

Attendance Allowance

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many people aged between six months and two years have (a) claimed and (b) been awarded attendance allowance for each year since 1971; and what is the total number of awards made to two-year-olds since 1971;

(2) how he plans to identify the people who were entitled to attendance allowance before their second birthday prior to the commissioner's decision CA/380/199; and what plans he has for compensating those who have been awarded the benefit following the commissioner's decision.

Mr. Scott: Attendance allowance has been payable to persons aged between six months and two years only since 9 April 1990. Claims decided during the period April 1990 to end of January 1991 are as follows:

	Number
Decisions made	6,800
Awards	5,300

Figures for awards made to two-year-olds could be separately identified only at disproportionate cost. An application for leave to appeal has been lodged against the commissioner's decision CA/380/1990.

Pregnancy

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost of making income support payable to pregnant 16 and 17-year-olds from the date that their pregnancy is confirmed.

Mr. Jack: There is inadequate information on which to make a reasonable estimate, because it is not known how many pregnant 16 and 17-year-olds would prefer to claim income support and not take up youth training, which pays an allowance at, normally, a higher rate than income support.

Child Benefit

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many (a) children and (b) families are in receipt of child benefit in the parliamentary constituencies of (i) Bury, North and (ii) Bury, South;

(2) how many children are expected to be in receipt of the higher-rate child benefit from 1 April in the parliamentary constituencies of (i) Bury, North and (ii) Bury, South.

Mr. Jack: Information relating to child benefit is available only on a national basis and cannot be given for particular areas.

Severe Disability Premium

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will outline the grounds on which payments and backpayments of the severe disability premium are being withheld from those on income support and attendance allowance; and whether he has plans to legislate retrospectively so that payments do not have to be made if the Court of Appeal decides in favour of disabled people.

Miss Widdecombe: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Easington (Mr. Cummings) on 27 February 1991 at column 541.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when his Department last conducted a survey of the ethnic origins of its employees; when it next plans to do so; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The Department last conducted a full survey of the ethnic origins of its employees in June 1989. The survey was by means of a voluntary questionnaire. The data from the survey is routinely up-dated with information on new staff and leavers.

As part of our equal opportunities action plan and in common with other Government Departments, we are committed to improving the results of the last survey to achieve a 90 per cent. response rate. In consequence, some parts of the Department, where response rates were low, are currently conducting a resurvey.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he has taken to recruit members of ethnic minorities in top grades of employment at his Department.

Miss Widdecombe: In addition to steps being taken by the Civil Service Commission on recruitment, the Department has developed an action plan on equal opportunities. This includes several initiatives, to improve the representation of staff from ethnic minorities at all stages from recruitment to promotion.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many and what percentage of officers in each grade (1-7) and overall in the Department are (a) women and (b) from ethnic minorities, respectively.

Miss Widdecombe: The information for the Department at 1 February 1991 is in the table.

Grade	Total	Women		Ethnic minority staff
		Number	Per cent.	Number	Per cent.
3	14	6	43	0	0
4	11	0	0	1	9·1
5	81	19	23	2	2·5
6	190	29	15	16	8·5
7	564	74	13	3	0·5
Others	85,434	57,925	68	3,295	3·9
Total	86,299	58,052	67	3,317	3·8

Note:
Ethnic minority figures are based on questionnaires voluntarily completed by staff (82 per cent. response rate to date).

Social Fund

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many payments were made from the social fund in 1988-89 and 1989-90 analysed by type of payment.

Mr. Scott: Payments were as follows:

	1988-89 thousands	1989-90 thousands
Maternity payments	170	175
Funeral payments	40	45
Community care grants	155	230
Budget loans	505	580
Crisis loans	380	450
Cold weather payments	1	45

Cold Weather Payments

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his parliamentary answers of 22 February, Official Report, column 292, and 15 February, Official Report, column 629, in which newspapers and on what date the local social security office for Clitheroe published the availability of, qualifying conditions for and application forms for special cold weather payments.

Mr. Scott: The Department's Accrington office, which deals with Clitheroe, placed an advertisement in the Citizen and the Herald and Post on 14 February 1991.

Earnings Disregard

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much additional expenditure would be involved if the £15 earnings currently disregarded for benefit purposes were to be increased to £50 per week.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 19 February 1991]: An increase of £35 in the earnings disregard would have effects on people's choices which are difficult to anticipate. However, we estimate that the cost might be in the region of £150 million across the income-related benefits.

Income Statistics

Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish a table in the manner of the tax-benefit model tables showing in 1988-89 and 1990-91 the gross earnings and net income with relevant social security benefits of (i) a married couple with two children aged four and six years with the head in full time work, (ii) a married couple with three children aged three, eight and 11 years with the head in full-time work, (iii) the same family types as in (i) and (ii) but with the head in full-time work and the wife in part-time work assuming average hours and earnings, assuming in all cases that the family types are home owners and paying average mortgages, breaking down their earnings into £10 bands ranging from £100 to £250.

Mr. Jack [holding answer 23 January 1991]: I have placed the information requested in the Library.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Local Government Finance

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the level of general Exchequer grant paid to each district council in Northern Ireland for each financial year since 1985.

Mr. Needham: The information is set out in the table:

Libraries and Information Services Council

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will list the reports produced by the Libraries and Information Services Council for Northern Ireland in each year from 1986.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information is as follows:

1986 — Annual report
1987 — Annual report
1988 — Annual report
1989 — Annual report
1990 — Annual report and
1990 — Library and information plan for Northern Ireland

Housing Waiting Lists

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applicants are at present on the Housing Executive waiting list in categories A1, A2, A3, A4, B1, B2 and B3 in (a) Antrim borough council area and (b) Mossley district office area in Newtownabbey.

Mr. Needham: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive and I am advised by its chief executive that the information requested is as follows:

Number on waiting list as at 26 January 1991

Area	A1	A2	A3	A4	B1	B2	B3
Antrim borough council area	20	26	13	7	485	48	—
Mossley district office area	15	23	10	—	351	114	1

Housing Developments

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) Housing Executive or (b) private housing developments in the Newtownabbey borough council or Antrim borough council areas where building work has ceased for 12 months have (i) portions of road or (ii) portions of pavement still unadopted.

Mr. Needham: The information is not available in the form requested. However, there are (a) four Northern Ireland Housing Executive developments and (b) approximately 40 private developments in the two council areas where building work has ceased for 12 months and which have roads or footpaths still unadopted.

Building Control Fees

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he has proposals to bring building control inspection fees and plan fees to a level closer to the cost of the services.

Mr. Needham: Yes. The Department of Environment for Northern Ireland will be consulting later this year on a proposal to increase fees for prescribed building control functions.

Ballycloughan Primary School

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what was the enrolment at Ballycloughan primary school for each of the past five years;

(2) how many applicants there are for new places at Ballycloughan primary school for the academic year beginning September; how many of these applications have been approved; what is the planned enrolment at Ballycloughan school in September; what proposals there are to provide for increased enrolments at Ballycloughan school; whether parental choice to send children to Ballycloughan school will be respected; and if he will make a statement about future enrolments at this school.

Dr. Mawhinney: The enrolments were as follows:

	Number
January 1987	42
January 1988	44
January 1989	45
January 1990	51
January 1991	53

The South-Eastern education and library board, in consultation with the school's board of governors, is responsible for the determination of the enrolment number and admission criteria for Ballycloughan primary school.

I understand that 23 children sought admission to the school for September 1991; 18 have been offered places and 15 have accepted. The enrolment planned for September 1991 is 63.

The enrolment of a school is limited by its physical capacity. Ballycloughan primary school is oversubscribed for admissions in September 1991 and the school's admission criteria has been applied to determine which children should be admitted. The criteria give priority to children for whom Ballycloughan primary school is the nearest primary school or who have a brother or sister already enrolled.

It is intended that part IV of the Education Reform (Northern Ireland) Order 1989 will be brought into operation for primary schools in September 1992. This will require the Department of Education, in consultation with boards of governors, to determine an enrolment and admissions number for all primary schools. it is not possible to say at this stage what future enrolments at Ballycloughan primary school will be. Under open enrolment generally, parents will have the opportunity to express their preference as to the school they wish their children to attend.

Labour Statistics, Coleraine

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons were employed in the civil service in the Coleraine council area by Department as at 1 January and 1 July in each year from 1985 to 1991; and if he will list the reasons for any substantial change in the numbers year on year.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information in respect of the dates specified is not readily available and could be compiled only at disproportionate cost. However, the table lists the number of non-industrial Northern Ireland civil servants employed in the Coleraine district council area by Department as at 1 April in each year from 1985 to 1991 and as at 1 March in 1991.

The increase in staff numbers in 1986 was a result of expansion in the Department of the Environment's vehicle licensing office and water service and the decrease in 1990 was the result of fluctuations in staff numbers across a number of Departments.

[1]At 1 March.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the number of persons employed by sex in each standard category of employment in the Coleraine council area for 1 January and 1 July for each year from 1985 to 1991.

Mr. Needham: Information on the number of employees by industry (excluding agriculture) and district council area is obtained from the census of employment which has been conducted every two or three years since 1978. The information available from this source from September 1984 onwards by sex and industrial sector is as follows:

[1] Agriculture figures related to Coleraine rural district.
Source: 1984 and 1987 census of employment.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the number and percentage of (i) male unemployed, and (ii) female unemployed in the council area of Coleraine as at 1 January and 1 July for each year from 1985 to 1991; and where Coleraine council area was ranked among all council areas in Northern Ireland for each figure given.

Mr. Needham: The number of male and female unemployed claimants in the Coleraine district council area for the months requested is as follows:

Table 1

Unemployment rates are available only for travel-to-work-areas (TTWAs). Coleraine district council area falls within the Coleraine TTWA which also includes Ballymoney and Moyle district council areas. The table shows the unemployment rates for males and females in the Coleraine TTWA and where each was ranked among the twelve TTWAs in Northern Ireland.

Table 2: Unemployment in the Coleraine travel-to-work-area

The rankings are on the basis of Coleraine's position within the 12 Northern Ireland TTWAs and these were ranked from the highest to the lowest unemployment rate.

Hospital Expenditure

Rev. Martyn Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will provide in tabular form the capital expenditure on hospital provision in each board area for the years 1988, 1989 and 1990.

Mr. Hanley: The information requested is as follows:

Year	Northern board £	Southern board £	Eastern board £	Western board £	Total £
1987-88	1,929,000	1,452,978	10,495,130	3,587,000	17,464,108
1988-89	2,913,000	2,399,613	9,570,042	3,410,000	18,292,655
1989-90	4,256,000	1,614,691	10,337,931	3,761,000	19,969,622

New Hospitals

Rev. Martyn Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the new hospitals provided in each board area from 1970.

Mr. Hanley: The following new hospitals have been provided since 1970:

Eastern board
- Belfast City hospital tower block
- Mater Infirmorum hospital, Belfast, new block

Southern board
- Craigavon area hospital, Portadown
- Daisy hill hospital, Newry
- Mullinure hospital, Armagh

Western board
- Waterside hospital, Londonderry

Terrorism

Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the security statistics for the first half of 1990 are now available, together with details of persons charged with terrorist type offences and convictions for scheduled offences for that period.

Dr. Mawhinney: Yes. The statistics for the first half of 1990 are as follows. (Statistics for earlier years can be obtained from the Library).

Statistics on Security (January to June 1990)
Part I—Statistics of Terrorist Activity

Part III—Convictions and Sentences for Scheduled Offences
Notes on the tables

1. The offence classifications are based on those used by the Crown Court in their annual return.
2. The tables relate to persons convicted at the Belfast Crown Court. This covers all scheduled offences tried on indictment.
3. Some jury trials are included in cases where the Attorney General certified out of the scheduled mode of trial, ie non-terrorist serious offences.
4. Where a person has been convicted of more than one offence only the most serious or that which received the longest sentence is recorded in the statistics.

Storm Damage

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what sums were received from the EC. for the victims of the storms of 5 and 6 January in respect of emergency aid; what sums were received in each of the previous three years for such a purpose; and how the sums for each year were expended and in what areas.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 26 February 1991]: A total of 500,000 ECUs (£340,000 sterling equivalent) has been provided by the European Commission to assist victims in the United Kingdom of the recent storms (December 1990 and January 1991) and arrangements are now being made by the British Red Cross Society for distribution.

Under existing EC priorities, aid is given to relatives of those who have been killed, to those injured and, where appropriate, to those who have suffered material loss.

Following the storms of late 1989 to early 1990, Northern Ireland received and distributed £14,100 in respect of two persons who died and three who were seriously injured as a result of those storms.

Senior Complaints Officer

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applicants applied for the post of senior complaints officer as advertised by the Fair Employment Commission on 15 February; how many of these applicants were (a) Roman Catholics and (b) Protestants; and why it has been necessary to re-advertise this post on 26 February.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 4 March 1991]: When the Commission had received only three applications in response to its first advertisement it decided to re-advertise the position in order to attract more candidates.

The religious affiliation of the applicants will be monitored when the recruitment exercise has been completed.

SCOTLAND

Takare plc

Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he was consulted about any proposal to provide exclusive private sector elderly care units on the land sold by Greater Glasgow health board to Takare plc.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I was aware that Takare was constructing a facility for 240 beds and that the board had entered into a contract for 180 of these.

Forestry

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has any plans to produce a new set of objectives for forestry policy covering environmental needs, public enjoyment and timber production.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: No. The principles of multi-purpose forestry, with a greater emphasis on social and environmental benefits, have been fully adopted. A review of forestry policy would not serve any useful purpose at the present time.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he plans to take any steps to halt the commercial afforestation of hilly areas.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Government's policy is that proposals for the large-scale planting of conifers in the English uplands will not normally be approved. The Government remain of the view, however, that there is scope for such planting in the hills of Scotland and Wales, provided that this is carried out in an environmentally sympathetic way.

Foxes

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many fox destruction societies or clubs are registered with his Department.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Thirty one fox destruction societies or clubs are currently approved for grant purposes by my right hon. Friend.

Schools

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many secondary schools there were in Scotland in 1979-80 and at the latest recorded year;

(2) how many primary schools there were in Scotland in 1979-80 and at the latest recorded year.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: There were 2,530 and 2,372 education authority primary schools and departments at September 1979 and 1990 respectively.

The corresponding numbers of education authority secondary schools and departments were 445 in 1979 and 423 in 1990.

Bilingual Tourism Signs

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to be in a position to respond to Ross and Cromarty district council's proposal to erect seven bilingual tourist signs at points of entry to the district; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Scottish Office has received numerous requests from regional and district councils to further relax the design rules to permit boundary signs to carry more information to help project corporate identities, including a request from Ross and Cromarty district council for bilingual tourist signs. In order to achieve a fair and consistent policy in these matters the Scottish Office propose to issue for consultation by the end of April draft guidance on tourist signposting, which will include proposals for council boundary signs. Decisions will be taken later this year in the light of responses received from consultees.

Hill Livestock Compensatory Allowance

Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many current hill livestock compensatory allowance applications he has received; how many have been processed; and when he expects the payments to be completed and paid.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: A total of 11,326 applications had been received by local offices of the Department by Wednesday 27 February. Payments totalling £25·139 million were issued on 4 March to 7,807 producers, under arrangements announced on 1 March. it is anticipated that the great majority of payments will be made in full by the end of April, although this will depend on the speed with which application forms, still outstanding, are completed and returned to the Department.

Housing

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the detailed burdens and conditions to be built into the title deeds of the heritable property disposed of under the voluntary disposals of former Scottish Special Housing Association housing stock in the Borders region in terms of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988; and what mechanisms and sanctions would be available to Ministers against any future private sector landlords succeeding to the ownership of the stock.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 4 March 1991]: These properties are owned by Scottish Homes and it is a matter for the current owner to determine, on the basis of its own legal advice, which, if any, burdens and conditions should be imposed on the stock to be transferred. As part of the process leading to the ballot these burdens and conditions would be made clear to tenants.

There is no provision in statute which enables Ministers to take any sanction against any future private sector landlords succeeding to the ownership of the stock.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if Scottish Homes has discretionary power to allow two or more options of private sector landlords to proceed to the ballot stage for consideration by tenants under the procedures laid down for the voluntary disposal of former Scottish Special Housing Association housing stock in terms of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 4 March 1991]: In the guidance which my right hon. Friend has given to Scottish Homes, there is nothing which prevents the agency from putting forward two or more options to the ballot stage for consideration by tenants. Scottish Homes procedures of October 1989 allow proposals which have been accepted after initial screening to be processed until they have been rejected by Scottish Homes or by evidence of the ballot of tenants or by the decision of my right hon. Friend.

In practice, tenants will have an opportunity before ballot stage to seek advice from advisers chosen by themselves and financed by Scottish Homes. At each ballot only one proposal for change will be put to the tenants. Where a majority of tenants vote against the proposal they will have the option of remaining as tenants of Scottish Homes.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland under what circumstances he would give consent to public sector housing authorities in rural areas to (i) seek to factor former Scottish Special Housing Association housing stock and (ii) to make bids to acquire former Scottish Special Housing Association housing stock under the provisions for voluntary disposal of housing stock under the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 4 March 1991]: No guidance has been issued on which bodies would be acceptable as factors for Scottish Homes stock. Management arrangements are essentially matters for the landlord, in the first instance, and do not of themselves require the approval of my right hon. Friend.

As indicated in his recent guidance to Scottish Homes, my right hon. Friend would be willing to consider a recommendation from that agency for a disposal to a local authority where Scottish Homes took the view that there were special circumstances relating to those particular houses such that the disposal would not compromise Ministers and Scottish Homes objective of promoting diversity of choice in housing. I would not wish to prejudge the precise circumstances in which that would be the case, but would expect that these would rarely arise.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what is the recommended timescale to allow the published procedures to be carried out for each phase of the voluntary disposal of former Scottish Special Housing Association housing stock by Scottish Homes in the Border region;

(2) if he will delay stage 3 of the prescribed process for considering voluntary disposals of housing stock under the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988 in circumstances where a private sector landlord who entered the bidding at stage 2 of the procedure argues that insufficient time has been allowed to complete their detailed application.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 4 March 1991]: No. The procedures published by Scottish Homes in October 1989 indicated that the evaluation of any proposals should be completed within three months of the proposals being accepted after the initial screening stage. This period should include evaluation within Scottish Homes and any associated negotiation with the prospective new landlord up to the ballot stage.

However, since the publication of those procedures my right hon. Friend has issued additional guidance to Scottish Homes on the handling of the current proposals. I understand that Scottish Homes accepts that the period for processing proposals requires to be reviewed and extended. I will ask Scottish Homes to make public the revised timetable for the proposals in the Borders.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will require Scottish Homes to publish the names of all unsuccessful bids made by private sector landlords to acquire former Scottish Special Housing Association housing stock in the Borders at the end of stage 2 of the procedure for the voluntary disposal of stock and prior to the tenants being balloted;

(2) if he will require Scottish Homes to publish a summary statement of reasons for arriving at conclusions, whether positive or negative, in any proposals submitted by any private sector landlords applying under the provisions of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988 to acquire former Scottish Special Housing Association housing stock.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 4 March 1991]: No. Without the specific authority of the bidders concerned it would be inappropriate to publish reasons for arriving at conclusions without breaching the bidders' commercial confidentiality.

However, Scottish Homes published procedures set out the requirement that tenants affected by particular proposals must be advised of the proposal as soon as the board have approved the Sub-Committee's recommendation to follow the initial screening stage with detailed evaluation. At that time a press release will be made by Scottish Homes. If the proposal is rejected at the initial screening stage, the regional director of Scottish Homes will consider whether there is a requirement to provide any information to tenants at that time.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he proposes to oblige Scottish Homes to undertake to ensure that the private sector landlords who seek to be considered as bidders for the voluntary disposal of former Scottish Special Housing Association housing stock in the Borders at the end of stage 2 of the prescribed procedures are not disadvantaged in any way relative to the party whose initial proposal triggered the process of voluntary disposal under the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 4 March 1991]: The procedures published by Scottish Homes specify the range of information to be provided to all prospective purchasers to facilitate their preparation of formal proposals. These procedures also provide that all proposals will be assessed on the same basis and that all proposals which have been accepted after initial screening will be processed until they have been rejected by Scottish Homes, or by evidence of the ballot of tenants or by the decision of the Secretary of State.

I look to Scottish Homes to ensure that all prospective purchasers have adequate time to prepare their proposals in line with the guidance which my right hon. Friend has issued that fair and proper competition should be undertaken whenever possible.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will commission independent consultants to assess any proposals submitted by any private sector landlords applying under the provisions of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988 to acquire former Scottish Special Housing Association housing stock.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 4 March 1991]: No. Assessment of individual proposals is a matter for Scottish Homes to consider, in terms of its published procedures for considering voluntary disposals of stock, with such assistance as it considers necessary. My right hon. Friend will assess any proposals for disposal which are submitted for his consent, with such assistance as he considers necessary, and will withhold his consent if he is not satisfied that the interests of the tenant have been fully protected.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those areas of housing policy which he would expect Scottish Homes to raise with local statutory housing authorities as a consequence of proposals being submitted by any private sector landlords applying under the provisions of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988 to acquire former Scottish Special Housing Association housing stock located in the local authority area.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 4 March 1991]: In accordance with the guidance which was issued to Scottish Homes in February 1989, in putting forward any proposals for my right hon. Friend's consent, the agency should draw attention to any impact on the local authority's interest and their capacity to meet their statutory obligations. In particular, the impact should be identified on the authority's duties towards those accepted as homeless under the "Homeless Persons" provisions in part II of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987; and under section 36 of Land Compensation (Scotland) Act 1973. The impact of any proposal can best be identified by consultation with the authority concerned, taking into account any current or future provision of housing agreed between Scottish Homes and the authority.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what safeguards will be required by him to protect the interests of tenants of any private sector landlord who acquires housing stock under the provisions of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988 and who subsequently is made bankrupt or goes into liquidation.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 4 March 1991]: Details of which, if any, safeguards are required to be written into any conditions of disposals are presently being considered by Scottish Homes.

I will ask Scottish Homes to make public its decisions on this matter.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what regard to local income levels and economic circumstances has to be paid by private sector landlords who have acquired housing stock under the voluntary disposals procedures under the provisions of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988 when setting future levels of rent.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 4 March 1991]: In terms of Scottish Homes published procedures, the rental proposals for the property will form a part of Scottish Homes assessment of the overall proposal. And it is the overall proposal which will be put to tenants in any ballot. Future rental increases will be determined by the provisions of the tenancy agreement or will be subject to the arrangements for rental increases under assured tenancies under the provisions of sections 24 and 25 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on what instructions he would give to Scottish Homes in the event that he refuses to transfer any of the former Scottish Special Housing Association housing stock in the Borders region to any private sector landlord, in terms of the future factoring arrangements on expiry of the existing contractual arrangements.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 4 March 1991]: Factoring and management arrangements are essentially landlord responsibilities and as such fall to be dealt with by Scottish Homes itself.

The financial memorandum which sets out the arrangements under which grant in aid is payable to Scottish Homes specifies that value for money should be ensured through economy, efficiency and effectiveness in the management of resources and that financial considerations should be borne in mind in all transactions.

The need for further guidance will be kept under review.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to be able to make public the system of valuation to be used when considering the transfer of former Scottish Special Housing Association housing stock in the Borders region to private sector landlords under the provisions of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 4 March 1991]: It is intended that the valuation system to be adopted in any large-scale voluntary transfer of housing stock will be that the houses will be valued on the basis of open market value subject to existing tenancies with account being taken of the condition of the stock.

The district valuer will be invited to assess the market value of the stock and this valuation will subsequently be used as a benchmark against which final decisions will be taken.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland in what circumstances he would consider allowing the transfer of former Scottish Special Housing Association housing stock in the Borders region to private sector landlords under the provisions of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988 at a transfer price which was below the district valuer's assessment of its market value.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 4 March 1991]: Transfer at less than the district valuer's valuation would not normally be acceptable. However, Scottish Homes in agreeing to the terms of a sale may impose conditions on the tenancies which will require financial support to be given to the landlord. Scottish Homes procedures allow for such financial support to be given.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what guidance he has given to Scottish Homes on the procedures to be observed when disposing of amenity land and other open spaces unrelated to housing; and whether such amenity space will form any part of any proposal made by a private sector landlord bidding for former Scottish Special Housing Association housing stock in the Borders region.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 4 March 1991]: The disposal of surplus land by Scottish Homes is governed by the consent of my right hon. Friend and in accordance with the procedures applying to the disposal of land by Departmental public bodies as set out in the paper issued by the Scottish Office in August 1984.

In accordance with Scottish Homes, published procedures on the consideration of voluntary disposals of stock, planned open space in housing developments, which is proposed should be transferred with the properties, should be identified on an appropriate plan of the proposed acquisition. It will be subject to valuation by the district valuer. The procedures require that arrangements for the maintenance of the open space, be determined, identifying how the costs are to be met and apportioned since, in principle, landlords will be expected to assume this responsibility unless there are agreed arrangements to the contrary.

Sports and Recreation

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the average time spent in physical education and sports by children in Scottish schools in (a) 1978, (b) 1984 and (c) 1990.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 8 February 1991]: Information in the form requested is not available. The average proportion of pupil time given to physical education in education authority secondary schools in 1983 was 6·5 per cent.; the corresponding figure for 1989 was 6·6 per cent. ranging from 7·3 per cent in S1 to 4·5 per cent. in S6. Figures for the percentage of time spent separately on sport are not available but arrangements are being made for statistics to be collected in future of time spent on physical recreation as a timetabled activity within the curriculum.

TRANSPORT

Light Dues

Sir David Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what decisions he has taken about light dues in 1991-92; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: After three successive years in which light dues have been reduced, I regret that increases in costs over that period make a 6·7 per cent. increase in the light dues tariff unavoidable this year. This is not unexpected and was anticipated in the light dues statement of my predecessor a year ago. Even with this increase, which is below the rate of inflation, light dues are still below their 1987 level and are at the same cash level as in 1981. In real terms the burden has been reduced by about half in a decade.

Coupled with the tariff change there are two measures which will particularly benefit the regular payers of light dues. First, I am satisfied that there is room for a second year of the "bargain break" introduced in 1990-91 whereby the maximum number of chargeable voyages in the cargo sector will be reduced from seven to six. This will benefit shipping which has contributed in the past to the strength of the liquid funds of the general lighthouse fund. For individual ships the "bargain break" represents a 14 per cent. reduction in their annual liability.

Secondly, in response to representations from the shipping industry, I am revising the dues liability for ships paying on a per voyage basis. From April such ships will be required to pay dues on no more than one voyage per month; and "month" for this purpose will be a rolling, rather than calendar, month. This replaces the present rule under which ships of less than 25,000 net tonnage have been liable to dues on two voyages per calendar month (up to the exemption limit) and ships of 25,000 net tonnage and over have been liable to dues on one such voyage. This will have significant cash flow benefits for most cargo shipping, and for some ships the total liability in the year will also be reduced.

The necessary order to give effect to these changes will be laid shortly.

I have not yet reached a conclusion on the recommendations in the British Ports Federation report about the extension of light dues to pleasure craft, but this matter is being actively considered. Any change here would almost certainly require primary legislation.

Road Construction

Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much he expects his Department to spend on road construction in 1991-92; and what new schemes are expected to start construction.

Mr. Chope: Spending on road construction, including land acquisition, in 1991-92 will total over £1,300 million. A total of 53 new schemes, as listed, are expected to be started. Whether and when individual schemes start depend on the satisfactory completion of the statutory procedures.

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport to which posts in public bodies he appoints individuals where the posts are (a) part-time and (b) remunerated by more than £50,000 per annum.

Mr. McLoughlin: Only one: the chairmanship of the Civil Aviation Authority.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of those employed in his Department are disabled.

Mr. McLoughlin: Of the Department's current staff of 15,274, 187 are registered as disabled (1·24 per cent.). A further 188 staff, who have indicated that they have disabilities, have not registered their disability.

Antares Inquiry

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to publish the results of the inquiry into the sinking of the vessel Antares from Carradale; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 4 March 1991]: I understand that the inspector's inquiry is likely to be completed by the early summer.

Under the Merchant Shipping (Accident Investigation) Regulations, a minimum of two months will then be needed while the report is considered by persons whose reputations are likely to be adversely affected. Unless the Secretary of State finds good reason not to publish, this will follow as soon as possible after the chief inspector has submitted his final report.

Inland Waterways

Mrs. Golding: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he has taken to carry out his duties under section 13 of the Transport Act 1978 to promote a policy for the use of inland waterways for commercial transport.

Mr. Baldry: I have been asked to reply.

The Government wish to see maximum use of rivers and canals for freight transport where it is commercially sensible. But they take the view that customers should be free to choose the mode of transport best suited to their needs. The Government's role is to ensure that conditions of competition are fair and subject to proper safety and environmental standards.

However, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Transport may give grants under section 36 of the Transport Act 1981 towards inland waterway freight facilities. This brings environmental benefits by reducing the number of lorries on unsuitable roads.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Property Marking

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Attorney-General whether it is the policy of the departments for which he is responsible to mark property with an indelible mark or similar means of identification.

The Attorney-General: The Departments for which I am responsible do not at present have a policy of indelibly marking equipment. Each Department records the serial number of equipment where such equipment is so marked.

The Crown prosecution service requires all offices to maintain a register of valuable items of equipment recording serial numbers or other identification marks. Line managers are required periodically to check equipment against the register.

The Treasury Solicitor's Department is introducing an asset register identifying assets within the Department and recording date of purchase, type of asset, and its location.

Katyn Massacre

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Attorney-General, pursuant to his answer of 6 February, Official Report, column 140, if he will now reconsider the status of the eight documents contained on the file with Public Record Office references FO 371/34563-345900 and currently identified as withheld.

The Attorney-General: The eight papers referred to from the 1943 Foreign Office file on Polish-Soviet relations are retained by that Department under section 3(4) of the Public Records Act 1958. My noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor is satisfied, on advice from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, that the documents are properly retained in accordance with the arrangements set out in paragraphs 28 to 31 of the White Paper "Modern Public Records", Cmnd 8531, March 1982.

Omar Bakri Mohammed

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Attorney-General whether the Director of Public Prosecutions will initiate proceedings to prosecute Omar Bakri Mohammed for incitement to murder.

The Attorney-General: I understand that the Metropolitan police are investigating possible offences by Omar Bakri Mohammed in the light of statements attributed to him by the media. The result of the investigation will be reported to the Director of Public Prosecutions.

Authorised Conveyancing Practitioners Board

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Attorney-General whether the Lord Chancellor has decided whom he proposes to appoint as members of the Authorised Conveyancing Practitioners Board.

The Attorney-General: My noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor has today appointed the following people to serve as members of the Authorised Conveyancing Practitioners Board.

Alan Brakefield
Tamara Goriely
Alan Mills
Kate Mortimer
June O'Dell, OBE.

The chairman of the board is John Sadler CBE, whose appointment was announced by the Lord Chancellor on 20 December 1990.

Advisory Committee on Legal Education and Conduct

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Attorney-General whether the Lord Chancellor has decided whom he proposes to appoint as members of the Lord Chancellor's advisory committee on legal education and conduct.

The Attorney-General: My noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor has today appointed the following people to serve as members of the Lord Chancellor's advisory committee on legal education and conduct:

Mrs. Liliana Archibald
Professor Richard Card
His Honour Judge John Gower, QC
Eric Hammond, OBE
Brian Harvey
John Hosking, CBE
Patrick Lefevre
Luke March
The Reverend Dr. Colin Morris
Dr. Claire Palley
Ms. Usha Prashar
Nicholas Purnell, QC
Peter Scott, QC
Graham Smith, CBE
David Ward
David Wilkins.

The chairman of the advisory committee is Lord Griffiths MC, whose appointment was announced by the Lord Chancellor on 16 October 1990.

CIVIL SERVICE

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service whether he will make a statement on the progress of monitoring exercise carried out in the civil service in accordance with the codes of the Commission for Racial Equality and the Equal Opportunities Commission.

Mr. Renton: Departments, agencies and the Civil Service Commission continue to make good progress in carrying out monitoring exercises and taking follow-up action in accordance with the Commission for Racial Equality and Equal Opportunities Commission codes of practice. My office monitors overall progress.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Building Control Fees

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to what extent the increase in building control inspection fees and planning fees has fallen behind inflation since 1980.

Mr. Needham: Building control inspection fees are related to the cost of providing the service rather than the rate of inflation. Fees were first introduced in 1982. The retail prices index shows an increase of 65 per cent. between January 1982 and January 1991. Building control fees for the erection, alteration or extension of small domestic buildings rose by 52 per cent. in the same period. The sliding scale of fees for larger construction work is linked to the cost of the works.

Renewable Energy

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) when he will establish a policy for 1991 renewables non-fossil fuel obligation in respect of Northern Ireland.

(2) what action he proposes to encourage hydro-electric generation from sites in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply which I gave the hon. Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) on 11 February 1991 at column 324-25.

Bus Services

Mr. Fishburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made towards implementation of the recommendations contained in the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's report of June 1989 on the bus services in Northern Ireland provided by Ulsterbus Ltd. and Citybus Ltd.; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: The initial response announced to the House on 24 April 1990 indicated that there had been a positive reaction to the recommendations, none of which was rejected. The follow-up response, which I have today placed in the Library of the House, confirms that 32 of the 58 recommendations have already been implemented and the remaining 26 are in the process of implementation. The response was produced in consultation with the Northern Ireland Transport holding company and the bus companies.

I am pleased to report that, among the more important developments, a new market-led approach with emphasis on customers' needs is now firmly established; capital expenditure on all major projects is subject to investment appraisal and post-completion audit; and a new unit, under an inspector general, ensures that quality of service is accorded high priority.

The Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland will keep the implementation of the recommendations under periodic review to gauge the improvement in bus services and management of the companies. I will report the progress to the House in due course.

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to which posts in public bodies he appoints individuals where the posts are (a) part-time and (b) remunerated by more than £50,000 per annum.

Dr. Mawhinney: There are no part-time posts in public bodies in Northern Ireland remunerated by more than £50,000 per annum.

HEALTH

Waiting Lists

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is the percentage of those waiting for non-urgent operations who wait longer than (a) six months, (b) one year and (c) two years, (i) nationally and (ii) in the South Manchester health authority area;

(2) what was the number and percentage of patients waiting for non-urgent operations in 1980, 1985 and 1990 (i) nationally and (ii) in the South Manchester health authority area.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information requested is given in the tables. Since March 1987 information on waiting lists has not been classified according to urgency of condition. Figures for 1990 therefore relate to all patients waiting for in-patient treatment in the surgical acute specialties.

It is the time people wait which is important. Since 1980 the number of patients waiting for over one year for in-patient treatment in the surgical acute specialties has fallen by 1 per cent. in South Manchester health authority and by nearly 11 per cent. in England as a whole.

Numbers of non-urgent cases waiting on surgical specialty lists for in-patient treatment

Devon Health Authorities

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what brief has been given to Touche Ross regarding a merger of North Devon, Torbay and Exeter health authorities; on what date this survey was commissioned; and by what date it will report.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I understand that South Western regional health authority has commissioned Touche Ross to conduct a preliminary examination of the case for mergers between health authorities in Devon. My hon. Friend may wish to contact Mr. Charles Stuart, the chairman of South Western regional health authority for details.

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will make it his policy not to approve formally any merger between Torbay and North Devon health authorities without prior consultation with the right hon. and hon. Members representing the county;

(2) pursuant to his answer of 28 February, what is the timetable for any regional decision, consultation and formal approval for any merger between Exeter, Torbay and North Devon health authorities.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I understand that South Western regional health authority is still considering whether to propose any amalgamation of health authorities in Devon. Should it decide to do so, it would formally consult all interested parties, including right hon. and hon. Members representing the county. The regional health authority would consider the responses before deciding whether to recommend any amalgamation of Devon health authorities to my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State.

New Hospitals

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what effect including a calculation of capital charges in a business plan for a bid to build a new hospital would have on its financial viability;

(2) how capital charging has affected the planning of the building of new hospital projects.

Mr. Dorrell: The existing methodology for appraising options for NHS building plans takes account of the costs of capital, including the opportunity cost. The introduction of capital charges will have a similar effect in appraising options.

From April 1991, when considering plans to alter service provision, provider units will also need to ensure that purchasing authorities are willing and able to meet any additional costs which may arise.

Census Enumerators

Mr. Blair: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many advertisements for census enumerators were placed in jobcentres in January; and how many of these vacancies were filled by Friday 1 February.

Mr. Dorrell: The Office of Population Censuses and Surveys and the General Register Office for Scotland made arrangements with the employment service to display a special poster advertising census enumerator posts in all job centres throughout Great Britain from early January 1991. A total of 117,550 enumerators are due to be appointed by 22 March 1991. By 1 February 91,041 people had applied, either to jobcentres or direct to the census offices; and 2,324 appointments had been made. The latest information available centrally is for 20 February. By then 185,960 people had applied and 24,671 appointments had been made.

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Health to which posts in public bodies he appoints individuals where the posts are (a) part-time and (b) remunerated by more than £50,000 per annum.

Mr. Dorrell: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is responsible for approximately 1,213 part-time appointments to public bodies. Details of these posts can be obtained from the Cabinet Office publication "Public Bodies 1990". A copy of which is available in the Library.

None of our part-time or full-time posts receives salaries in excess of £50,000 per annum.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of those employed in his Department are disabled.

Mr. Dorrell: A total of 0·74 per cent. of staff working in the Department are registered as disabled. The Department also employs a number of people with disabilities who are not registered as disabled.

Mortality Statistics

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will update his replies to the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East on 21 October 1987, Official Report, columns 808-09 and 2 December 1988, Official Report, columns 439-40, regarding mortality statistics.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is shown in the following table.

The data for 1990 are provisional, and the later months in particular are likely to be affected by late registration.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prison Education

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set a date to give every prisoner the right of access to prison education and to make the escorting of prisoners to education classes a duty for prison officers; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Government are already considering the recommendation of the third report from the Education, Science and Arts Committee on this matter and will now wish to take into account the various recommendations that have been made by Lord Justice Woolf and His Honour Judge Stephen Tumim in the report of their recent inquiry into the prison disturbances, April 1990. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has said that the Government plan to issue a White Paper later this year, but we have already made clear the importance which we attach to education as part of a positive and constructive regime and that we want to see more prisoners taking up education courses. Escorting inmates, where necessary, to enable them to attend educational classes or to take part in other regime activities is already part of the task of prison officers.

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department to which posts in public bodies he appoints individuals where the posts are (a) part-time and (b) remunerated by more than £50,000 per annum.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The chairman of the Independent Television Commission is the only post in a public body to which I have appointed someone who is part-time and remunerated by more than £50,000 per annum.

Homicide

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many recorded cases of homicide remain unsolved since 1960; whether these files remain open; and what guidance his Department is giving to police forces on whether to pursue investigations of unsolved homicides.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No central record is kept of the number of recorded cases of homicide which remain unsolved since 1960. Figures for recorded homicides where no subject was charged during the year in question are set out in the table; figures for years prior to 1979 are not available. The police are always ready to investigate unsolved murders further. Decisions about whether to pursue such investigations are operational matters for chief officers of police. The clear-up rate for homicide cases is high; in 1989 it was 92 per cent.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of those employed in his Department are disabled.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The Home Office currently employs 138 registered disabled persons, which represents 0·32 per cent. of the total number of staff. No record is kept of staff with disabilities who have chosen not to register.

Data Protection Act 1984

Mr. Conway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he plans to review the registration fee payable under the Data Protection Act 1984.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The triennial registration fee is intended to recover the costs of the Office of the Data Protection Registrar. Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary order, the Government propose to increase it from £56 to £75 from 1 June 1991.

Prison Escapes

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Mojisola Soetan, Gena Aina and Aderinjola Absosede Agbabiaka who escaped from East Sutton Park on 5 April 1990 and 22 April 1990 have since been recaptured.

Mrs. Rumbold: No. These three women are still unlawfully at large.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Bernadette Ambrose, Mavis mary Sasu and Kudi Balogun who escaped from Drake Hall on 4 February 1990 and 25 February 1990 have since been recaptured.

Mrs. Rumbold: Bernadette Ambrose has been recaptured. The other two women remain unlawfully at large.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many absconders from open prison were recaptured in 1990.

Mrs. Rumbold: A new system of recording data on the recapture or surrender of absconders was introduced in November 1990. From that date until the end of 1990, a total of 190 prisoners unlawfully at large from open prisons were recaptured or surrendered. This figure includes prisoners who had failed to return to prison having been granted temporary release. The information requested prior to November 1990 is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners absconded from open prisons in 1990.

Mrs. Rumbold: During 1990 1,148 prisoners absconded from open prisons.

Iraqi Citizens (Entry Visas)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if entry visas have been granted to the Iraqi citizens M. Ibrahim Hammadi and Qahman Al Azzawi since January 1986.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have been unable to trace any record of the issue of a visa or of the entry to the United Kingdom of a Mr. Hammadi or a Mr. Al-Azzawi from the information provided.

Police

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the 700 extra police posts approved by him have been taken up by the local authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. Friend announced on 20 December 1990 the allocation in 1991-92 of 564 police posts for the provincial forces, 100 for the Metropolitan police and 36 for the regional crime squads. Of the 564 extra posts that have been allocated to 34 provincial forces 26 have not yet been taken up, by two police authorities which have so far been unable to confirm that they will be able to meet their share of the additional cost.

Private Medical Treatment

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people who entered Britain on a visa, in the last year for which figures are available, did so for the purposes of receiving private medical treatment; what proportion were required to produce medical records; and what is the procedure if their medical records are not available.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Those coming for medical treatment are not distinguished in statistical records from visitors arriving for other purposes. Under paragraph 23 of the published immigration rules passengers may be required to produce evidence that arrangements have been made for consultation or treatment but production of medical records would not normally be a matter for the immigration officer.

Crime, Leicestershire

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department by what percentage reported crime has increased in Leicestershire since 1979; and what proportion of that increase was in crimes of violence.

Mr. John Patten: In the 12 months to the end of September 1990, the number of recorded crimes in Leicestershire was 122 per cent. higher than in 1979. Six per cent. of the increase was attributable to crimes of violence.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

European Bank for Reconstruction and Development

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received concerning the location of premises selected for the European bank for reconstruction and development; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The choice of a permanent headquarters building will be made by the European bank for reconstruction and development. Meanwhile the Government have provided transitional accommodation for the bank in the City. I refer the hon. Member to the Overseas Development Administration departmental minute laid before the House on 17 December 1990.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many United Kingdom citizens are to be employed by the European bank for reconstruction and development; and what roles they will perform.

Mrs. Chalker: The president-designate of the bank is responsible for staff recruitment from among member states of the bank and he will make his choices on merit. I am pleased to note the bank has selected Mr. John Flemming, previously with the Bank of England, for the senior position of chief economist.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will estimate the cost to Her Majesty's Government of the establishment of the European bank for reconstruction and development in London.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington) on 17 December 1990. In addition, we are meeting transitional accommodation and office support costs estimated at £2 million to enable the bank to prepare for operations.

THE ARTS

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Minister for the Arts to which posts in public bodies he appoints individuals where the posts are (a) part-time and (b) remunerated by more than £50,000 per annum.

Mr. Renton: The appointments which I make of trustees, board members, etc., to posts in public bodies, are part-time. None is remunerated by more than £50,000 per annum; most are unpaid.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Mortgage Interest Relief

Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the total amount of mortgage interest relief that would be withdrawn per £1 billion existing relief per year if the relief percentage were reduced by (i) 1 per cent., (ii) 5 per cent. and (iii) 10 per cent. in England and in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Maude: Available estimates for the United Kingdom in 1990-91 are given in the following table.

Reduction in the rate of mortgage interest relief	Reduction in mortgage interest relief per £1 billion of relief
Percentage points	£ million
1	40
5	190
10	370

Separate estimates in respect of England are not available.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the total amount of mortgage interest relief that would be saved per £1 billion existing relief per annum if the eligible loan ceiling for such relief for standard rate payers were reduced to (i) £29,000, (ii) £25,000, (iii) £20,000 and (iv) £15,000 in England, the United Kingdom and London and the south-east.

Mr. Maude: Available estimates for the United Kingdom in 1990-91 are given in the table. They relate to all mortgagors and exclude behavioural effects. Estimates for England, London and the south-east are not separately available.

Limit on Mortgage interest relief £	Direct revenue yield per £1 billion of relief £ million
29,000	10
25,000	90
20,000	190

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the amount of mortgage interest tax relief going to each economic planning region of the United Kingdom in 1990-91; and what is the average amount of subsidy per person in each region with a mortgage.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 25 February 1991]: Broad estimates, based on the regional distribution of mortgage interest relief recorded in the family expenditure survey for 1988 and 1989, are as follows:

Mortgage interest relief 1990-91

	Total cost £ million	Average cost per mortgagor £
Northern	360	680
Yorkshire	530	670
North West	770	680

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to which posts in public bodies he appoints individuals where the posts are (a) part-time and (b) remunerated by more than £50,000 per annum.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: My right hon. Friend does not make any appointments to posts which are both part-time and remunerated by more than £50,000 per annum.

Manufacturing Investment

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will provide the information on United Kingdom manufacturing investment given in his answer to the hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) on 5 June 1990, Official Report, column 406, at constant prices for the latest year available.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 5 March 1991]: The table provides revised and updated information for the years from 1985.

[1] OECD National Accounts Volume 2 1976-88. The percentage changes are based on figures, at 1980 prices, of gross fixed capital formation by owners engaged in manufacturing. The coverage is therefore not exactly comparable to the United Kingdom figures which differ, in particular, by the inclusion of leased assets.

[2] Figures of gross fixed capital formation in manufacturing are not available for a number of OECD countries. It is not possible to produce average change figures covering the group of countries for which figures are available because all figures are expressed in national currencies.

Inflation

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the annual rate of inflation for the fiscal years 1989-90 and 1990-91; and what is his estimate of the rate of inflation for fiscal year 1991-92.

Mr. Maples [holding answer 5 March 1991]: All-items RPI inflation averaged 7·8 per cent. in the financial year 1989-90. The comparable figure for the market price GDP deflator was 6½ per cent. (adjusted for the distortion caused by the abolition of domestic rates). Complete data for 1990-91 are not yet available. The autumn statement forecast was for an increase in the GDP deflator of 8 per cent. in 1990-91 and 6 per cent. in 1991-92; no such forecast is published for the RPI. A new forecast will be published with the Budget.

Research and Development

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list, for each year since 1979, for each of the G7 countries, the amount of (a) civil research and development expenditure undertaken by private firms, (b) civil research and development expenditure undertaken by governments and (c) each of the above as a percentage of gross domestic product.

Mr. Maples [holding answer 5 March 1991]: In 1989 civil research and development undertaken by industry in the United Kingdom was £5,730 million which represents 1·1 per cent. of GDP. Prior to 1989 information collected did not distinguish between civil and defence R and D. Comparable information for other countries is not readily available.

The available information on Government civil R and D in G7 countries (except Canada) is given in tables 6.8 and 6.9 of the 1990 edition of the "Annual Review of Government Funded Research and Development", a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Mortgage Rates

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effects of (a) annual and (b) six-monthly changes in mortgage rates set by building societies on fluctuation in the monthly figures for the retail prices index.

Mr. Maples [holding answer 5 March 1991]: The mortgage interest payments component of the RPI is calculated using the current rates of interest charged by building societies and banks in order to reflect the changes in liabilities as they accrue for typical mortgage payers. The RPI is an index of prices rather than payments and it is not appropriate to reflect the various arrangements where payments are fixed for set periods.

North Sea Oil

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the total revenues to the Exchequer from North sea oil since May 1979, expressed in 1990 prices.

Mr. Maples [holding answer 5 March 1991]: The total over the period since 1979-80 is estimated at around £98 billion at 1990 prices.

Business Expansion Scheme

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for each of the years of the existence of the business expansion scheme, what was (a) the regional distribution of BES funds and the associated cost to the Exchequer, (b) the distribution of BES investments by two-digit SIC and (c) the average size of investment.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 25 February 1991]: Information on the companies receiving investments through the business expansion scheme is published in chapter 7 of "Inland Revenue Statistics 1990". Further information that is readily available is as follows:

Income Tax

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the annual reduction in income tax for a person on an annual income of (a) £10,000, (b) £20,000, (c) £30,000, (d) £40,000, (e) £70,000 and (f) £150,000 as a result of income tax changes since the 1988 Budget.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 25 February 1991]: The information is in the table, which compares the income tax liability in 1990-91 with liability under 1988-89 rates of tax with allowances and thresholds indexed to 1990-91 levels by reference to movements in the RPI. The calculations are for a single, non-aged person with no reliefs or allowances apart from the personal allowance.

Annual income £	Increase in tax liability £
20,000	0
30,000	225
40,000	225
70,000	225

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average individual cumulative gain (a) in current prices and (b) in 1990-91 prices to those earning £5,000, £10,000, £15,000, £20,000, £25,000, £30,000, £40,000, £50,000, £60,000 and £70,000 a year as a result of changes in income tax since 1979.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 25 February 1991]: Latest estimates of the annual change in income tax liability resulting from the changes in tax rates, allowances and thresholds are in the table. The 1978-79 income tax regime has been indexed to 1990-91 levels of reference to the statutory formula, and allowing for independent taxation.

For the purposes of these calculations the indexed regime of 1978-79 is applied directly to the income base of 1990-91. In practice, retention of the regime, indexed as appropriate, for the intervening years would have led to changes in the income base.

Average reduction in income tax per individual[1] in 1990-91 compared with 1978-79 indexed regime

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many tax units and individuals had (a) earned income and (b) total income in the top (1) 1 per cent., (2) 5 per cent. and (3) 10 per cent., and the bottom (i) 10 per cent. and (ii) 50 per cent. of the earnings and income distribution, respectively.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 27 February 1991]: In 1990-91 it is estimated that there are 26·5 million individuals liable to income tax of whom 26·3 million have earned income. Information is accordingly as follows:

Thousands

	Number of individual taxpayers in 1990-91 Earned income distribution	Total income distribution

Incomes

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total and average investment income and earned income in 1989-90 and 1990-91 of (a) the top 1 per cent., (b) the top 5 per cent., (c) the top 10 per cent., (d) the bottom 70 per cent., (e) the bottom 50 per cent., (f) the bottom 10 per cent., of taxpayers and (g) all taxpayers.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 25 February 1991]: Estimates are in the table.

n/a Estimates not available.

All estimates are provisional and subject to a wide margin of error since they are based on a projection of the 1988-89 survey of personal incomes and the coverage of investment income in the survey is incomplete. In some cases investment income on which basic rate liability is satisfied by deduction at source is not reflected in the survey. Information on the investment income of the bottom 10 per cent. of taxpayers is not available.

European Regional Support

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action he is taking to ensure that moneys provided by the European Community in support of regional need are neither classed as items of United Kingdom public expenditure nor limited because of any curb on public spending imposed by Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Mellor: The estimated moneys provided by the European Community in support of regional need, as with other receipts from the European Community, are taken into account in setting our public expenditure programmes, which are thus higher than they would otherwise be.

EMPLOYMENT

South Glamorgan TEC

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether, pursuant to his answer of 26 February, Official Report, column 480, his Department was aware of the involvement of E C Harris, quantity surveyors, in the proposed new South Glamorgan TEC headquarters building project prior to 24 September 1990.

Mr. Jackson: The Department was aware before 24 September that E C Harris has been commissioned by South Glamorgan TEC to undertake some preliminary work which preceded the tendering process.

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment to which posts in public bodies he appoints individuals where the posts are (a) part-time and (b) remunerated by more than £50,000 per annum.

Mr. Howard: The public bodies sponsored by the Employment Department Group are listed on pages 18 to 22 of the Cabinet Office publication "Public Bodies 1990" which is available in the House of Commons Library. The list shows the appointments and the salaries paid. Part-time appointments are printed in light type and bold type denotes full-time appointments.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of those employed in his Department are disabled.

Mr. Jackson: The Employment Department Group employed 3·2 per cent. registered disabled staff at 1 June 1990, which is the latest available figure. The group also employs people with disabilities who have chosen not to register. The group complies with the code of practice on the employment of people with disabilities issued by the Office of the Minister for the Civil Service, and aims to increase the representation of those with disabilities especially at higher grades. The group as an employer has adopted the disability symbol it recently launched.

Nursery Courses

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will restore funding to the nursery nurses course at Basford Hall college of further education, Nottingham to enable those students currently on the course to complete their studies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: My Department's Greater Nottingham area office is seeking ways to support the continuation of training for trainees currently undertaking NNEB courses in nursery nursing at Basford Hall college of further education.

All trainees will be given the opportunity to complete their period on employment training.

Gulf Casualties

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans have been made to provide suitable jobs for service personnel permanently disabled in the Gulf.

Mr. Jackson [holding answer 5 March 1991]: It is too soon to say how many United Kingdom service personnel who sustained injuries in the Gulf crisis might be discharged on medical grounds.

Service personnel who are medically discharged because retention in the relevant service is not a possible option are helped by the resettlement officers of each service both before and after discharge. These officers work in close liaison with disablement resettlement officers (DROs) from the employment service, and with a variety of other organisations which can provide resettlement, rehabilitation and training assistance, to ensure that the needs of the service personnel when re-entering civilian life are met most effectively.

In particular, DROs are invited to resettlement panels run by the services and can offer advice and guidance there. Anyone who requires further help, perhaps in their home area, in identifying, gaining and retaining suitable work can obtain it from the employment rehabilitation service and from DROs and other employment service staff.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make it his policy to issue guidance on conflicts of interest to the chairmen or women and all board members of all training and enterprise councils.

Mr. Jackson [holding answer 5 March 1991]: The revised TEC operating agreement which will come into force from April this year includes new clauses on conflicts of interest.

ENERGY

Natural Gas

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the location and estimated reserves of natural gas in Scotland.

Mr. Moynihan: Exploration and appraisal to date indicate only minor amounts of natural gas in onshore oil and gas discoveries in Scotland.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what proportion of those employed in his Department are disabled.

Mr. Wakeham: At 1 June 1990, 1·18 per cent. of my Department's staff were registered disabled persons.

My Department's staff also included at this date other people with disabilities who had chosen not to register. No separate records are kept of unregistered disabled people.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Manufactured Trade Balance

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the balance of manufactured trade between (a) Britain and the United States of America and (b) Germany and the United States of America in 1980, 1983, 1986, 1988, 1989 and 1990.

Mr. Sainsbury: The information is in the table. Figures for 1990 are not available for Germany's trade with the United States of America.

Crude trade balance[1] in manufactures[2] with United States of America

Iraq

Mr. Ron Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what was the value of goods and services supplied to Iraq last year; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what was the value of goods and services supplied to Libya last year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: This information is available in Business Monitor MM20: Overseas Trade Statistics for the United Kingdom (December 1990) Table 1b. A copy is available in the Library.

Data on United Kingdom trade in services are not available by partner country.

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to which posts in public bodies he appoints individuals where the posts are (a) part-time and (b) remunerated by more than £50,000 per annum.

Mr. Leigh: The chairmanship of British Shipbuilders.

Rechar

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what expenditure has been undertaken under the terms of the European Rechar programme in the United Kingdom and in each of the other EC member states.

Mr. Leigh: The question does not arise, since implementation of most Rechar programmes, including those in the United Kingdom, has yet to begin. Decisions from the European Commission are awaited.

Argentina

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what subjects the Minister for Trade raised with the Argentine Government on his recent visit.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 1 March 1991]: Among the subjects discussed were the improvement in relations between Britain and Argentina, the increase in our bilateral trade, the progress of the Uruguay round, opportunities for British investors and exporters, the Argentine economy and the country's plans for privatisation.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Pensions

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much was paid out as (a) incentive bonuses and (b) rebates to persons opting out of (i) SERPS and (ii) occupational pension schemes for each year since 1986; and how many persons opted out in each case during each of these years.

Mr. Jack: The main objective of the pensions reforms was to reduce the long-term costs of SERPS by encouraging the growth of alternative forms of pension provision.

The Government Actuary estimates that the numbers opting out of SERPS (either in contracted-out occupational schemes or with personal pensions) are as follows:

Great Britain, Millions

	Number in contracted-out schemes	Number with personal pensions	Total contracted-out
1987-88	9·1	3·1	12·2
1988-89	9·3	3·1	12·4
1989-90	9·4	4·0	13·4

The revenue forgone in respect of rebates and incentives is estimated to be as follows:

Great Britain, £ billions

	Rebates to schemes	Rebates to personal pensions	Rebates Total	Incentives to schemes and personal pensions
1987-88	4·7	1·0	5·7	0·3
1988-89	4·8	1·0	5·8	0·4
1989-90	5·3	1·5	6·8	0·6

The amounts paid are shown against the year to which they relate rather than the year in which payment was made.

Maternity Pay

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what is the average amount of maternity leave taken, in weeks, by women in receipt of statutory maternity pay;

(2) if he will estimate the proportion of women in receipt of statutory maternity pay who receive the lower rate only throughout the maternity pay period;

(3) if he will publish figures showing the number and proportion of women in receipt of statutory maternity pay who receive less than the maximum 18 weeks' statutory maternity pay entitlement.

Mr. Jack: Detailed statistics about statutory maternity pay are not collected centrally from employers. It is not possible, therefore, to provide sufficiently accurate estimates of the information requested at this time. It is hoped that the information will be available to allow such estimates to be made when a survey of maternity rights being carried out by the Policy Studies Institute is published later this year.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate how many women lost entitlement to the earnings-related element of statutory maternity pay as a result of the 1987 changes which changed the qualifying week to the 15th week before expected confinement.

Mr. Jack: Information is not available of the numbers of women who either gained or lost the earnings element of statutory maternity pay (SMP) as a result of the 1987 change in the qualifying week.

Residential Care Homes

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what guidance he will issue to local adjudicating officers on arrangements for care for claimants in former local authority homes who (a) are existing residents in a former local authority home, (b) are new residents nominated by the local authority entering the home after transfer, (c) are new residents not nominated by the local authority and (d) live in homes where (i) staff employment remains the local authority's responsibility, but the new provider manages the scheme, (ii) property is leased to fall-back provisions and (iii) a fund is made available by the local authority to cover necessary top-ups of fees;

(2) what guidance he will issue to local adjudicating officers to assist them in determining the eligibility of individual claimants to enhanced levels of income support when local authorities have transferred elderly residents' homes to independent trusts or voluntary bodies.

Miss Widdecombe: Eligibility for income support is defined by regulation. Decisions regarding claims to benefit will be made at local level by the independent adjudication officers, who are provided with guidance on the interpretation of the regulations by the chief adjudication officer in the published adjudication officers' guide.

No special arrangements have been made for when homes are transferred out of local authority control. The existing guidance issued to adjudication officers is available to assist in determining eligibility for income support in such cases.

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what guidance he will give to local adjudication officers about eligibility of claimants to income support when they are in nursing homes where arrangements made by health authorities rely on patients claiming income support and where (a) premises are transferred from health authorities to independent providers, (b) beds are reserved through health authority contracts, (c) health authorities have arranged with a third party for sums of money to be available for top-up of income support and (d) health authorities retain rights, or continue to employ staff directly.

Miss Widdecombe: Eligibility for income support is defined by regulation. Independent adjudication officers are provided with guidance on the interpretation of the regulations by the chief adjudication officer (rather than my right hon. Friend) in the published adjudication officers guide.

The NHS has a responsibility for providing medical and nursing care. This is mainly provided in NHS accommodation. Health authorities (HAs) can enter into contractual arrangements with independent nursing homes for the treatment of NHS patients. They cannot charge people when they do so. Patients in private homes under these arrangements are NHS in-patients and cannot be charged and therefore cannot receive income support as that benefit is designed to provide help with actual charges. HAs cannot make topping-up payments.

Property Identification

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether it is the policy of his Department to mark property with an indelible mark or similar means of identification.

Miss Widdecombe: General guidance on security matters recommends that portable equipment should be given an identification mark. In addition, standards laid down for the housing of IT equipment emphasise the need for it to be kept in secure accommodation.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been the annual total saving to his Department derived from reducing the level of income support payment granted to asylum seekers.

Miss Widdecombe: Asylum seekers are entitled to 90 per cent. of the appropriate personal allowance. If the full allowances were paid, the estimated additional cost would be around £2·5 million per year.

Income Support

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people, excluding asylum seekers, are granted less than 100 per cent. of the normal rate of income support payments since the change in social security legislation in April 1988; and if he will outline the reason for not granting the full rate of income support in such cases.

Miss Widdecombe: Income support urgent cases payments are available to certain people from abroad, including asylum seekers, and to people who have not received income which they are due and who would, in consequence, suffer hardship. The personal allowance for adults is reduced by 10 per cent. because recipients are not entitled to (or are entitled to less) income support under the normal rules. Allowances in respect of any children together with any premiums are paid in full. No information is available about the number of people receiving urgent cases payments.

State Earnings-related Pension Scheme

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the average state earnings-related pension scheme payment for people retiring in the April of each year since 1979 who are in receipt of SERPS.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is not available in the precise form requested. The available figures are as follows:

People retiring in	Gross additional pension payable[1] £
8 months ending 30 November 1979	0·70
6 months ending 31 May 1980	0·83
13 months ending 30 June 1981	1·54
6 months ending 31 May 1982	2·43
6 months ending 31 March 1983	3·52
6 months ending 31 March 1984	4·47
12 months ending 31 March 1985	5·65
6 months ending 31 March 1986	7·37
12 months ending 30 September 1987	9·32
6 months ending 31 March 1988	10·43
6 months ending 31 March 1989	12·10

[1] Includes a notional amount which would have been paid to those who were contracted out of the state earnings related scheme.

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security to which posts in public bodies he appoints individuals where the posts are (a) part-time and (b) remunerated by more than £50,000 per annum.

Miss Widdecombe: My right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State makes the following part-time appointments to public bodies:

Public Body	Number of appointments
Attendance Allowance Board	8
Industrial Injuries Advisory Council	17
Occupational Pensions Board	13
Central Advisory Committee on War Pensions	25
Social Security Research Policy Committee	8
Total	71

My right hon. Friend does not make any part-time appointments where remuneration is in excess of £50,000 per annum.

Local Offices

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received about the level of funding of community care loans and grants at his Department's offices in Greenock and Port Glasgow; what has been his response; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: No representations have been received concerning either office. However, following a recent exercise to identify offices whose budgets were under severe pressure, an additional allocation of £30,000 for the loans budget at Greenock was made on 22 February.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what change there has been in the numbers of claims and the time involved in (a) the assessment of a claim and (b) the notification of the assessment to the claimant in Greenock and Port Glasgow, following the installation of computer systems.

Miss Widdecombe: The installation of the computer systems in Greenock and Port Glasgow local offices to assess and pay claims for income support and retirement pension was completed in August 1990.

From the latest information available, in January 1991, Port Glasgow local office received 341 claims for income support which were cleared in an average of 0·7 days. Prior to computerisation, in May 1989, the office received 327 claims for income support which were processed in an average of 1·7 days. In January 1991, the office also received 21 claims for retirement pension which were dealt with in five days. In May 1989, 25 claims for retirement pension were received which were also cleared in five days.

In January 1991, Greenock local office received 850 claims for income support which were cleared in an average of 0·7 days. Prior to computerisation, in March 1990, the office received 626 claims for income support which were processed in an average of 1·3 days. In January 1991, the office received 113 claims for retirement pension which were dealt with in 9·7 days. In October 1989, 112 claims for retirement pension were received which were cleared in 19·4 days.

In general, the time taken to receive notification of entitlement depends on the type of payment. If payment is due within three days a girocheque is issued automatically by the computer system and sent by first-class post, with the entitlement notice enclosed. Alternatively, if payment is by order book, the book is issued to the Post Office by first-class post, and the pick-up notice, with entitlement information are sent second class direct to the recipient.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to alter the operations, or relocate workloads, from or to his Department's offices in Greenock and Port Glasgow; what plans he has to reduce staffing levels in these two offices; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The management of the Department's local office network is being restructured because changes as a result of the operational strategy project and the setting up of the Contributions Agency meant that the existing offices no longer formed viable management units. This restructuring will result in a modest overall staff saving at managerial level, but there are no plans to reduce the number of offices open to the public. A voluntary redundancy scheme is in place for staff.

District managers will be responsible for drawing up detailed plans to provide the best possible service to local customers in the most effective way. These plans will be drawn up in consultation with interested parties, including constituency Members.

Medical Appeal Tribunals

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what is the total number of consultants to medical appeal tribunals in Scotland who are aged (a) under 40 years, (b) 40 to 50 years, (c) 50 to 65 years and (d) over 65 years;

(2) how many female consultants have been appointed to medical appeal tribunals in Scotland in each year since 1979.

Miss Widdecombe: The administration of medical appeal tribunals is the responsibility of the president of social security and medical appeal tribunals, His Honour Judge Derek Holden. The hon. Member may care to contact his office direct to obtain this information.

Child Benefit

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many children are expected to be in receipt of the higher-rate child benefit from 1 April in the parliamentary constituency of Greenock and Port Glasgow.

Mr. Jack: Information relating to child benefit is available only on a national basis and cannot be given for particular areas.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of those employed in his Department are disabled.

Miss Widdecombe: I refer the hon. Member to the reply to the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) on 22 November 1990 at column 214.

Care Home Trusts

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has now made of the likely financial implications for his Department of the creation of local authority care home trusts.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 29 January 1991]: Decisions on eligibility for income support are made individually for each case by local adjudication officers, and data on these decisions is not collated centrally.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what guidance he has issued to local adjudication officers with regard to the payment of income support to residents in local authority care home trusts;

(2) what guidance he has issued to local adjudication officers regarding the eligibility for income support of individuals suffering from senile dementia who are unable to exercise personal choice and are placed by a local authority in a care home trust.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answers 29 and 31 January 1991]: Eligibility for income support is defined by regulation and is available in respect of fees, up to certain limits, to residents of registered residential care homes and in certain other types of homes. Independent adjudication officers are provided with guidance on the interpretation of the regulations by the chief adjudication officer (rather than my right hon. Friend) in the published adjudication officers guide. Where an individual suffering from senile dementia is unable to act for himself a suitable person would be appointed to act on his behalf and eligibility for income support would be determined in the usual way, taking account of all the relevant circumstances.

Income Support

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people claim income support at the local offices of his Department in (a) Leeds, West, (b) Leeds metropolitan district council area, (c) West Yorkshire and (d) England both as a figure and as a percentage of total population.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 4 March 1991]: Data are not available for the total adult population on the date and for the precise geographical areas to which the information relates. The number of claimants receiving income support is as follows:

	Number
Leeds West	10,830
Leeds Area	62,244
West, Yorkshire	181,528
England	3,693,297

Note:

All data derived from 30 November 1990 count of cases in action, which include a number of cases where payment has ceased but other action is continuing. Data are provisional and subject to amendment.

Claimants

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people are dependent on (a) income support, (b) family credit and (c) housing benefit broken down into claimants, dependants and children for (i) Leeds, West, (ii) Leeds metropolitan district council area, (iii) West Yorkshire and (iv) England.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 4 March 1991]: Information for Leeds, West, Leeds metropolitan district council area and West Yorkshire is unavailable and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The information in respect of England is as follows:

	Income Support[1]	Family Credit[2]
Claimants	3,429,000	264,000
Dependants	599,000	164,000
Children	1,688,000	569,000
TOTAL	5,716,000	997,000

[1] Data derived from 1989 Annual Statistical Enquiry

[2] Data derived from 5 per cent. sample of Family Credit caseload at 31 July 1990.

Information for Leeds, West is unavailable and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The information in respect of the metropolitan borough of Leeds, West Yorkshire and England is as follows:

	Claimants[1]	Dependants[1]	Children	Total[1]
Metropolitan Borough of Leeds	63,700	18,000[2]	n/a	81,700
West Yorkshire	159,100	44,800[2]	n/a	163,900
England	3,153,000	902,000[2]	n/a	4,055,000

Income Support, Leeds

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many income support claims in the Leeds metropolitan district council area are from (i) pensioners, (ii) families, (iii) single parents and (iv) people with disabilities as a figure and as a percentage of all income support claims.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 4 March 1991]: The information is not available in the form requested. It is, however, possible to identify the number of current claims from pensioners and lone parents aged less than 60 in the five local offices in the Leeds metropolitan area. This information is in the table.

	Total number of claims	Percentage of claims in the Leeds area per cent.
Pensioners	23,198	38.5
Lone Parents	11,016	18.3

Note:
Data derived from 30 November 1990 count of cases in action, which include a number of cases where payment has ceased but other action is continuing. Data are provisional and subject to amendment.

WALES

Common Land

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will make a statement on the progress made with the designation of common land in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: I assume that the hon. Gentleman is referring to the registration of common land in Wales.

Current information on the progress of registration is not held centrally as statutory responsibility for this function lies with local authorities.

The Arts

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has on the number of people attending events associated with the arts in Wales in each of the past five years; what was the total amount spent by the general public on arts events during the same period; what has been the total turnover of the arts in Wales over the past five years; and what are the total figures for employment in the arts over the past five years.

Sir Wyn Roberts: This information is not held centrally.

Local Authority Complaints

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish for each year since the establishment of the Commission for Local Administration in Wales (i) the number of complaints submitted against each local authority, (ii) the number of complaints investigated, (iii) the number of complaints of maladministration upheld and (iv) the number of (iii) as a ratio of the electorate of the local authority area.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The investigation of maladministration by local authorities in Wales is a matter for the Commissioner for Local Administration in Wales. Much of the information the hon. Gentleman requires can be obtained from a study of the annual reports of the Commissioner published each year since 1975.

Secure Accommodation (Juveniles)

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consideration he has given to the requirement for secure establishments in Wales for juveniles awaiting trial to be provided and operated by commercial companies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: None. Private provision of secure accommodation for young people was ruled out during the passage of the then Children Bill; the Secure Accommodation Regulations 1991, to be made under the resulting Children Act 1989, will specifically prohibit the provision of secure accommodation in voluntary or registered children's homes.

Administrators

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report, for each local authority in Wales, the number of administrators employed in (a) education departments and (b) social services departments.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Information on the numbers of administrators employed in local authority education departments is not held centrally. The following staff, who are not directly employed in the delivery of services, were employed in local authority social service departments at 30 September 1990.

	Number	Whole time equivalent
Clwyd	167	156·0
Dyfed	139	127·9
Gwent	203	190·0
Gwynedd	111	105·0
Mid Glamorgan	339	319·0
Powys	52	48·5
South Glamorgan	240	225·6
West Glamorgan	183	178·1
Wales	1,434	1,350·1

Note: The following staff groups are included:
Senior directing, managing, professional and advisory staff who carry a high level of responsibility for particular areas of work (eg consultants, advisors, inspectors, etc.), senior staff concerned with administration, finance or resources and also telephonists and other administrative, clerical and secretarial staff based at headquarters, area offices and hospitals.

Multi-disabled Young People

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many multi-disabled, visually impaired young people under the age of 20 years there are in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: This information is not held centrally.

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales to which posts in public bodies he appoints individuals where the posts are (a) part-time and (b) remunerated by more than £50,000 per annum.

Mr. David Hunt: The chairmanship of the Welsh Development Agency—four days per week at a salary of £58,750.

Amputees

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will review the national health service contract with Vessa Ltd. for the supply of artificial limbs and appliances for amputees in Wales in the light of the proposed 30 per cent. rundown in local supply, fitting and manufacture at the ALAC centre at Rookwood hospital, Cardiff.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The terms of the contract with Vessa Ltd. and any issue of contract compliance are matters for the Welsh Health Common Services Authority.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received from ex-service men's organisations and others regarding the artificial limb and applicance services available to amputees in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: None. Nor would I expect to since management and operational responsibility for the artificial limb and appliance service was transferred to the Welsh Health Common Services Authority on 1 April 1988.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will make it his policy to restore the standard supply of one spare artificial limb to amputees requiring artificial limbs.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Decisions on such matters are for the management of the service taking account of the specialist clinical advice available to it. I understand that there has been no change of policy on the supply of spare artificial limbs.

Libraries and Information Services Council

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the reports produced by the Libraries and Information Services Council for Wales in each year from 1986 to 1990.

Sir Wyn Roberts [holding answer 27 February 1991]:
Year and publication.
1986
Annual Report 1985-86.
1987
Annual Report 1986-87.
1988
Annual Report 1987-88.

Coal and Steel

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the level of investment profitability and manpower in the coal and steel industries in Wales in 1990 and in 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 4 March 1991]: The information is given in the following table:

Industry	Capital[5] investment £ million	Profitability[1] £ million	Manpower[2]	Output/man shift ('000 tonnes)	Output ('000 tonnes)
1979

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when his Department last conducted a survey of the ethnic origins of its employees; when it next plans to do so; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: After a number of regional pilot studies in the early 1980s the Department completed its survey in 1987 of the ethnic origins of staff by means of voluntary questionnaires. The database is kept up to date with the addition of information on new staff and leavers.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many and what percentage of officers in each grade (1-7) and overall in the Ministry are (a) women and (b) from ethnic minorities, respectively.

Mr. Curry: The information requested, as at 1 April 1990, is set out in the table. Ethnic origin figures derive from a voluntary questionnaire which about 90 per cent. of staff completed. Programmes of action to achieve equality of opportunity for women and people of ethnic minority origin in the civil service are in place in the Department.

By grade and grade equivalent	Number of women	Women as percentage of total staff	Ethnic minority respondents to ethnic origin questionnaire	Ethnic minority respondents as percentage of total respondents
1	—	—	—	—
2	—	—	—	—
3	1	4·2	—	—
4	—	—	—	—
5	10	9·0	1	0·93
6	10	7·6	1	0·79
7	121	12·5	9	0·99
All staff	4,624	44·7	399	4·10

Mr. Janner: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he has taken to recruit members of ethnic minorities in top grades of employment at his Ministry.

Mr. Curry: The Department is committed to a policy of equal opportunities. Senior grades are recruited on the Department's behalf by the Civil Service Commission following the principles of fair and open competition. The Commission has taken a series of measures to aid recruitment of members of the ethnic minorities including action on publicity, training and selection policy.

Illegal Poisoning

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the number of reported incidents of poisoning of (a) birds, (b) wild animals and (c) household pets by illegal baits in the latest year for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: The current figures for England and Wales for 1990 are as follows:

Total number of incidents of suspected poisoning reported was 343

	Numbers reported	Confirmed involvement of pesticides	Illegal poisonings by pesticides
Birds	132	50	37
Wild animals	102	15	11
Household pets	96	40	31

Note: Animals from more than one category may be involved in a single incident.

In addition, there were 16 suspected illegal poison baits reported. Of these, nine were confirmed as illegal baits.

The hon. Member will be pleased to know that a long-term campaign against the illegal poisoning of wildlife has been launched today. It is a joint initiative by this Department together with the other Agriculture Departments, the Department of Environment, and many non-government organisations which have interests in farming, gamekeeping and conservation. It will give a clear message—that the practice is cruel, dangerous, a threat to wildlife, and unnecessary.

To back up the campaign we will be co-ordinating the efforts of enforcement agencies; ensuring that those landowners, gamekeepers and farmers with genuine pest control problems know where to go for advice; and keeping a careful check on the present statutory controls on those substances most abused.

The campaign is a long-term one aimed at changing permanently the attitudes of the minority who abuse pesticides, thereby safeguarding our wildlife against cruel and unnecessary suffering.

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to which posts in public bodies he appoints individuals where the posts are (a) part-time and (b) remunerated by more than £50,000 per annum.

Mr. Curry: All ministerial appointments to public bodies are listed in "Public Bodies" published annually by the Cabinet Office (OMCS), a copy of which is in the Library of the House. All such appointments by MAFF are part-time, but none is remunerated at more than £50,000 per annum.

Fruit Juices

Mr. Speed: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his Department has been carrying out quality and sample tests of fruit juices for domestic consumption; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: As stated in the reply of 8 February to my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), a report from the food safety directorate on "Comparison of Methods for the Detection of Added Substances in Orange Juice" indicated that a large proportion of samples of orange juice on retail sale did not fully match the description on the packaging. Ministry officials are now carrying out further investigations into the sources of these wrongly described products.

Agriculture Council

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Agriculture Council held in Brussels on 4 and 5 March.

Mr. Gummer: I represented the United Kingdom at this meeting of the Council accompanied by my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon, the Parliamentary Secretary in my Department.

There was a first debate on the Commission's proposals for 1991-92 farm prices. I offered broad support for the Commission's proposals, but suggested a number of detailed ways in which they might be improved. I stressed in particular the need to adapt policies so that expenditure can be contained within the guideline in 1991 and the following years. I emphasised that proposals must be consistent with the need to increase agricultural efficiency and avoid discrimination between producers or member states.

The lack of realism among many member states in the face of the mounting budget overrun was particularly disappointing.

Veterinary Investigation Service

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the outcome of the review of the veterinary investigation service.

Mr. Gummer: I set up a review team, led by Dr. P. S. Dawson, the assistant chief veterinary officer with responsibility for the veterinary investigation service (VIS), to examine ways of improving the quality, efficiency and cost-effectiveness of the services provided by the VI centres. My concern was to ensure that the VIS is organised and equipped to provide the highest quality of diagnostic, advisory and consultancy services to Government and to the livestock industry generally.

I have now received the report of the review team and I have accepted its main conclusions.

The report recommends that the work of the VI service should be concentrated on a smaller number of centres where the facilities available and the level of expertise should be upgraded. The recommendation is that we should move from the present structure of 19 centres in England and Wales to one based on 13 centres. The centres at Wye, Truro, Bangor and Lincoln will, therefore, be closed. The VIS quality control unit at the Lincoln VIC will be relocated in new purpose-built facilities at another centre.

The statutory and policy work carried out at the centres to be closed will be transferred to one of the remaining centres. The work from Wye will go to the Winchester VIC, that from Truro to the Starcross VIC, that from Bangor to the Aberystwyth VIC and the Lincoln work to Sutton Bonington VIC. Private veterinary surgeons will be asked to submit samples for examination to these alternative centres.

The Cambridge and Norwich centres, both of which are inadequate for present-day needs, will close and their work will be amalgamated at a new purpose-built centre near Bury St. Edmonds. The existing centre at Worcester, which again is unsatisfactory, will be relocated at another new purpose-built centre in Warwickshire. This relocation and the enhancement of the facilities at the Winchester VIC will enable the Reading VIC to be closed.

The closures at Wye, Truro, Bangor and Lincoln will go ahead as soon as possible. The other changes, including the construction of the new centres at Bury St. Edmonds and in Warwickshire, will be completed over the next three to four years.

A programme of investment in new capital equipment and up-to-date technology is being carried forward to enable the VIS to achieve the highest quality standards as laid down in "The Principles of Good Laboratory Practice". Staffing levels will be increased in some centres to enable additional workloads to be handled. The reorganisation will involve the loss of some posts. Everything possible will be done to help staff find alternative jobs and to keep redundancies to a minimum.

I believe that the implementation of these recommendations from the review team will result in significant improvements in the quality, efficiency and cost-effectiveness of the VI service. This is important if we are to have a VI service which is well equipped to meet our national needs over the years ahead.

I am placing a copy of the findings of the review team in the Library of the House.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to which posts in public bodies he appoints individuals where the posts are (a) part-time and (b) remunerated by more than £50,000 per annum.

Mr. Chris Patten: I make appointments to part-time posts in the magistracy and shrievalty of Lancashire, Greater Manchester and Merseyside and to various educational bodies. None of the individuals appointed is remunerated.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Spelling and Grammar

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what assessment his Department has made of the degree to which changed requirements for accuracy of spelling and grammar in the 1991 examination syllabuses may act as a discouragement for some children.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend's intention is to encourage pupils and teachers to pay greater attention to spelling. He sees no reason why this should discourage them from entering for GCSE examinations. The only significant group of pupils who might reasonably be discouraged are those suffering from dyslexia. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State has therefore invited the three main dyslexia organisations to suggest what concessions might fairly be adopted to enable dyslexic candidates to compete on an equal basis with their peers when the change is introduced.

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what consultations took place between his Department and (a) the examination boards and (b) local education authorities concerning the policy of setting aside a proportion of examination grading for spelling and grammar before this policy was introduced.

Mr. Eggar: We have not considered it necessary, in view of the widespread public concern, to conduct formal consultations on the desirability of using GCSE examinations to improve spelling standards. The School Examinations and Assessment Council has, however, consulted the GCSE examining groups on the various policy options for effecting change in this area and is currently consulting the groups on the specific proposal, subsequently put to them by my right hon. and learned Friend, that up to 5 per cent. of marks should be deducted for poor spelling. The local education authorities have not been specifically consulted.

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what research his Department proposes to undertake or commission into fundamental causes of spelling difficulties in children.

Mr. Eggar: The Department is supporting a £250,000, three-year research project to study the problems of dyslexic children and how schools can tackle them, based at the Harris city technology college in Croydon. There are no immediate plans to commission research into causes of spelling difficulties unrelated to dyslexia. Teachers already have expertise in using a range of techniques for tackling spelling difficulties.

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations his Department has received concerning the timing, relative to the 1991 examination cycle, of the introduction of the policy to set aside a proportion of examination grades for spelling and grammar from (a) parents, (b) examination boards and (c) local education authorities; and what response he has made.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend and I have received about 250 representations, concerned primarily with the timing of the introduction of this policy, from parents and pupils. None has been received from examination boards or local education authorities. We have responded by saying that we see no unfairness in introducing this change at an early date since what is proposed does not differ greatly from what the groups do at the moment, and examination candidates can hardly be unaware that they need to spell correctly in their GCSEs, just as they need to write legibly and present their work well generally.

Student Teachers

Mr. Walden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what the average A-level scores of teacher recruits were in 1980, 1985 and 1990.

Mr. Fallon: Information is given in the table.

Initial teacher training in England
United Kingdom domiciled first-year undergraduate students with A-level entry qualifications

	Academic year
	1980-81	1985-86	[1] 1989-90
Total number[2]	4,220	6,005	6,201
Average A-level points score[3]	5·4	5·4	5·7

[1] Data for academic year 1990-91 are not yet available.
[2] Covers students studying BEd., Cert. ED and other undergraduate ITT with qualified teacher status.
[3] Refers to the average A-level points score of those recorded on USR and FESR as having A-level entry qualifications. A-level points scores have been calculated in the customary way, by allocating 5 points for an A grade, 4 points for a B grade, etc.

Haberdashers' Aske's CTC

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) on what date the funding agreement for Haberdashers' Aske's city technology college was signed and executed on his behalf;

(2) what security will be provided by the Haberdashers' Aske's Hatcham college trust to guarantee its capacity to make any repayments of capital grants that may fall due under the provisions of section 105(5) of the Education Reform Act 1988;

(3) whether the terms under which the land and buildings of the existing Haberdashers' Aske's Hatcham schools will be leased for the purposes of establishing the Haberdashers' Aske's city technology college have been agreed and approved by the Charity Commissioners.

Mr. Eggar: A funding agreement with the Haberdashers' Aske's city technology college trust was signed on 21 December 1990. The entry into force of this agreement is conditional on the granting of a lease of the schools and their premises to the trust in a form agreed with the Secretary of State. Discussions on this subject between all concerned, including the Charity Commissioners, are currently taking place. Paragraph 24(A)iv of the funding agreement describes how repayment would have to be made.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the items of works and supplies on which he has determined the total amount of his contribution towards the capital costs of establishing the Haberdashers' Aske's city technology college, including his current estimate of the cost of each item; and in respect of the building works, whether they are planned to be carried out on the boys' or the girls' site of the city technology college.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend has agreed to make available £5·5 million towards the capital costs of establishment of the Haberdashers' Aske's city technology college, which may be apportioned as follows:

	£K
New Build	2,090
Repairs/refurbishment	1,420
External works	330
Furniture and Equipment	700
Fees	460
VAT	500
Total	5,500

An approximately equivalent amount is to be spent on refurbishment of both sites, although some additional 15,000 sq ft of new build is to be provided at the girls' site, but this will be for shared use.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of any overrun on initial capital costs of establishing the Haberdashers' Aske's city technology college he has agreed to meet under the equivalent of paragraph 8(iv)(a) of the model CTC/CCTA funding agreement placed in the Library on 31 October 1990.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend has agreed to meet up to 80 per cent. of any overrun of initial capital costs which, in accordance with paragraph 8(iv)(a) of the model funding agreement are deemed necessary and could not have been foreseen at the time the cash limit was set.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) under the funding agreement for the Haberdashers' Aske's city technology college, what is the total cash limit that has been agreed for the capital expenditure necessary to establish the college; and how much of this capital expenditure will be borne by him and how much by the private sponsors of the city technology college;

(2) what account he has taken of the availability of cash in private sponsorship towards the Haberdashers' Aske's city technology college in determining the amount of capital funding required from public sources to establish the college; and what part of this will be contributed toward the initial capital costs of the college;

(3) how the private contribution towards the capital costs of establishing the Haberdashers' Aske's city technology college will be divided between (a) the value of the land and buildings of the existing Haberdashers' Aske's Hatcham schools and (b) other capital costs of establishing the college; and on what basis the value attributed to the private sponsors under (a) has been varied from the earlier assessment of the district valuer referred to in his reply of the 13 November 1990, Official Report, column 101.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend has agreed a total cash limit for the project of £8·945 million, of which he will provide £5·5 million and the sponsors a 99-year lease of the sites and premises of the schools, currently valued at £3·445 million, for educational purposes. No further valuation has been sought from the district valuer since my reply of 13 November 1990, Official Report, col. 101. In addition, the Haberdashers' Company has agreed to underwrite sponsorship of £1 million, which may be contributed towards capital costs.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what arrangements have been written into the funding agreement for the Haberdashers' Aske's city technology college relating to the payment, including the timing of the payments, of capital costs for establishing the college.

Mr. Eggar: As stated in paragraph 8(iv) of the funding agreement, the arrangements, including the timing of capital payments, will be in accordance with annex 2 of the agreement.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has included any variations from the terms of paragraph 9 of the model CTC/CCTA funding agreement placed in the Library on 31 October 1990 in the funding agreement for the Haberdashers' Aske's city technology college.

Mr. Eggar: There are several small amendments to the funding agreement to take account of the circumstances relating to this particular project.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the total number of pupils (a) under and (b) over school leaving age that he has agreed to fund at the Haberdashers' Aske's city technology college from September 1991; and what is the total number of pupils in each age group that is planned for the college once it has reached its full capacity.

Mr. Eggar: It is intended that the college will open at capacity with 900 pupils under school leaving age and 200 pupils over school leaving age on roll. Actual numbers may vary slightly from these figures.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of those employed in his Department are disabled.

Mr. Eggar: Of the Department's staff, 2·7 per cent. are registered as disabled. There are other staff in the Department with disabilities who have chosen not to register and who are not included in this figure.

ENVIRONMENT

Labelling

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he will be making at the EC Environment Council on 18 March in respect of a Community-wide labelling scheme for environmentally friendly products.

Mr Baldry: My right hon. Friend will be welcoming the fact that the Commission has now tabled a draft proposal and will be calling for rapid progress. He will, however, be making a number of comments on the detail of the scheme designed to make it more effective and less bureaucratic.

The Gulf

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he will be making at the EC Environment Council on 18 March in respect of an international operation to alleviate the environmental effects of the Gulf conflict.

Mr. Heseltine: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 27 February to the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) at column 531.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what contribution Her Majesty's Government are making towards rescuing the natural environment in the Gulf region; what representations he will be making to allied coalition partners in respect of the clean-up operation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine [holding answer 5 March 1991]: The actions taken as part of our initial response to the oil spillages in the Gulf were set out in my letter of 6 February to hon. Members, a copy of which is in the Library. I will continue to assess urgently any specific requests we receive from the Gulf states. The International Maritime Organisation has continued to co-ordinate offers of assistance from member states, including coalition members, and I welcome their establishment of a trust fund to facilitate further clean-up action in the Gulf.

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what further progress he has to report on combating oil pollution in the Gulf.

Mr. Heseltine: I set out some of the initial steps we have taken in response to oil spills in the Gulf in my letter to hon. Members of 6 February, copies of which are in the Library. Since then we have continued to look closely at how we can respond further to requests from the Gulf states and the international organisations seeking to co-ordinate assistance. These include the International Maritime Organisation (IMO), the specialised agency of the UN concerned with shipping and oil pollution issues, which has co-ordinated offers of assistance of expertise and equipment from Governments of member states.

Recently it has become clear that while deflection operations and protective booms have been successfully deployed, extensive damage has occurred and substantial quantities of oil remain at sea. On 1 March the Secretary General of the International Maritime Organisation called for establishment of a trust fund to facilitate provision of equipment and services to tackle oil pollution in the Gulf. Reports available to me indicate that there is now an urgent need to begin oil recovery operations if further damage to ecologically sensitive sites is to be minimised.

In order to assist the Governments of the Gulf states my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport and I are together contributing £1 million to the International Maritime Organisation Gulf oil pollution disaster fund. Each Department is contributing £0·5 million.

With other contributions which the International Maritime Organisation is seeking from its members and the resources of the Gulf states this should enable those on the spot to put into operation the plans now being developed by the responsible national agencies assisted by international experts, including those from the United Kingdom.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is his Department's latest estimate of the area of water in the Gulf that is currently affected by oil slicks;

(2) what is his Department's latest estimate of the length of coastline around the Gulf that is currently affected by oil slicks.

Mr. Heseltine: The reports available to us indicate that oil has affected most of the Saudi Arabian coastline between Khafji and the island of Abu Ali. This includes 400 km of coastline, with the worst damage occurring in the heavily indented southern part of the coast. Around 50,000 tonnes of oil in this area are estimated to remain at sea. In addition areas of light oil or sheen have been observed up to 70 miles offshore and up to 50° 20′ east and 29° 5′ north. No detailed information is yet available on coastal or offshore pollution within the former war zone in the northern Gulf.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when his Department last conducted a survey of the ethnic origins of its employees; when it next plans to do so; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine: The Department undertook a voluntary survey of the ethnic origins of staff in post in 1987. This was supplemented by a series of follow-up surveys in 1990. A final survey is about to be carried out, in addition to a continuous survey of job applicants.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he has taken to recruit members of ethnic minorities in top grades of employment at his Department.

Mr. Heseltine: There are few top grade posts filled by direct recruitment. Where necessary, it is carried out through the Civil Service Commission; posts are advertised in the national press and relevant specialist publications on the basis of fair and open competition. Advertisements state that the Department is an equal opportunities employer.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many and what percentage of officers in each grade (1-7) and overall in the Department are (a) women and (b) from ethnic minorities, respectively.

Mr. Heseltine: The latest available information on the numbers of (a) women and (b) ethnic minorities in grades 1 to 7 in my Department is:

(a) Women at 1 March 1991			(b) Ethnic minorities[2] at 1 February 1991
Grade	Number of Women	Percentage of Women	Grade	Number of ethnic minorities	Percentage of ethnic minorities
1	0	0	1	0	0·0
2	1 (two from 30 April 1991)	13 (25 from 30 April 1991	2	0	0·0
3	[1]5	[1]13	3	0	0·0
4	0	0	4	0	0·0
5	24	16	5	2	1·4
6	19	7	6	2	0·7
7	122	16	7	5	0·7
Total	170	13	Total	9	0·8
All Grades	3,210	43	All Grades	450	7·1

[1] Changes at Grade 3 level consequent on promotion to Grade 2 not yet determined.
[2] Based on information gained from voluntary surveys of staff; non-respondents not included.

Antarctic

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what members of his Department were represented at the special consultative meeting of the Antarctic treaty parties in Chile, and if his Department will be represented at the April meeting of the Antarctic treaty parties which will discuss environmental protection for the Antarctic.

Mr. Heseltine: One official from my Department was a member of the United Kingdom delegation for the special consultative meeting in Chile. United Kingdom representation for the April meeting has not yet been decided.

Rent Arrears

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on (a) the reasons why individual council tenants fell into arrears with rent, (b) the number in arrears who are in receipt of housing rebate, (c) the level of income per household of tenants in arrears, and (d) the number of children per household of tenants in arrears; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: The most recent available information on the characteristics of tenants in rent arrears asked about in the question was given in my Department's report "Preventing Rent Arrears", which was published by HMSO in 1983, when copies were placed in the Library. My Department is currently planning a repeat of this large-scale study, the results of which will be available towards the end of 1992.

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment to which posts in public bodies he appoints individuals where the posts are (a) part-time and (b) remunerated by more than £50,000 per annum.

Mr. Heseltine: This information is contained in the Cabinet Office publication "Public Bodies 1990", a copy of which is available in the Library of the House. Responsibility for appointments to the Sports Council and the regional councils for sport and recreation was transferred to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science on 29 November 1990.

None of the appointments to public bodies created since 1 July 1990 for which I am responsible attracts remuneration of more than £50,000 per annum. The bodies are the Nature Conservancy Council for England and the Joint Nature Conservation Committee. All the appointments to these bodies are part-time.

Rechar

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those projects which have been or will be directly assisted by European moneys under the Rechar programme; and whether these payments have been classed as public expenditure as far as United Kingdom financial monitoring is concerned.

Mr. Yeo: No projects have been aided by the European Commission Rechar programme as the Commission has not yet approved the United Kingdom's proposals which are currently being considered, nor do we know, at this stage, which projects will be aided as they will have to be submitted to and approved by the relevant programme co-ordinating committee, once the programme itself has been approved.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those projects within South Yorkshire which have been assisted by the European Rechar programme.

Mr. Yeo: None, as the Rechar programme for South Yorkshire has not yet been approved by the European Commission.

Dearne Valley

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made in his assessment of funding levels for the local authorities of the annual cost which will be incurred by the current plan for regeneration of the Dearne valley; how many years he expects this project to take; and what central support he expects to provide during this period.

Mr. Key: We are today announcing a package of additional Government assistance for the Dearne valley including increased derelict land grant and urban programme allocations to the local authorities of Barnsley, Doncaster and Rotherham and two city grants to the private sector to stimulate economic regeneration in the area. Revenue support for local authorities is assessed annually. This is based on a broad set of principles which take account of the social, demographic and physical characteristics of each area.

Toxic Waste

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects the toxic waste held at Wath upon Dearne, Rotherham which arrived in the summer of 1989 to be removed; and if he maintains contact with the appropriate agencies and Rotherham borough council in regard to the problem.

Mr. Baldry: There is no immediate prospect of the waste being removed by agreement, for the reasons we have explained in correspondence. The Department is no longer in contact with those previously involved in discusssions about the waste but we are, of course, prepared to consider any further initiatives that they and the local authorities might wish to offer.

Leeds Development Corporation

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many compulsory purchase orders have been issued by Leeds development corporation in each financial year of its existence.

Mr. Portillo: Sixteen compulsory purchase orders have been promoted by Leeds development corporation; three in 1988-89, seven in 1989-90, and six in 1990-91. Of these, decisions have been issued on six of the orders, five orders were withdrawn by the development corporation prior to determination and five orders are currently proceeding to inquiry.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment of the sites affected by compulsory purchase orders issued by Leeds development corporation; how many have been subject to redevelopment; and if he will list them.

Mr. Portillo: Land at Lowfold, South has been redeveloped. Work on three sites at Skelton Grange road, Goodman street and Sardinia street is currently under way and work will shortly be commencing on two sites at Knostrop and at Beza road.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those firms which have been relocated by Leeds development corporation and the sites to which they have been moved.

Mr. Portillo: Some of this information was provided to the Leeds development corporation on a commercial-in-confidence basis. I advise the hon. Member to discuss with the chairman of the development corporation what information he is free to divulge.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those firms, and the numbers employed, which have been moved since the inception of the Leeds development corporation because of development plans initiated by that corporation.

Mr. Portillo: The list of the relevant firms is as follows:

LIST OF FIRMS RELOCATED

Local Authority Dwellings

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many local authority dwellings (a) were vacant and available for letting on 1 April 1989 and (b) became available for letting between 1 April 1989 and 31 March 1990 (i) through new build, (ii) through acquisition, modernisation or conversion and (iii) through other means in (1) inner London, (2) outer London, (3) non-metropolitan areas of the south-east, (4) non-metropolitan areas outside the south-east, (5) metropolitan areas outside London and (6) England as a whole;

(2) how many households local authorities accepted between 1 April 1989 and 31 March 1990 (a) as homeless and (b) as homeless and in priority need, in (1) inner London, (2) outer London, (3) non-metropolitan areas of the south-east, (4) non-metropolitan areas outside the south-east, (5) metropolitan areas outside London and (6) England as a whole;

(3) how many households were registered on the local authority housing waiting lists on 1 April 1990 in (a) inner London, (b) outer London, (c) non-metropolitan areas of the south-east, (d) non-metropolitan areas outside the south-east, (e) metropolitan areas outside London and (f) England as a whole;

(4) how many dwellings were let by local authorities between 1 April 1989 and 31 March 1990 (a) to new secure tenants and (b) to new secure tenants who were homeless households in (1) inner London, (2) outer London, (3) non-metropolitan areas of the south-east, (4) non-metropolitan areas outside the south-east, (5) metropolitan areas outside London and (6) England as a whole;

(5) how many dwellings were let by local authorities between 1 April 1989 and 31 March 1990 (a) to new non-secure tenants and (b) to new non-secure tenants who were homeless households in (1) inner London, (2) outer London, (3) non-metropolitan areas of the south-east, (4) non-metropolitan areas outside the south-east, (5) metropolitan areas outside London and (6) England as a a whole;

(6) how many households and how many homeless households took up nominations by local authorities to housing association dwellings between 1 April 1989 and 31 March 1990 in (a) inner London, (b) outer London, (c) non-metropolitan areas of the south-east, (d) non-metropolitan areas outside the south-east, (e) metropolitan areas outside London and (f) England as a whole;

(7) how many dwellings were let between 1 April 1989 and 31 March 1990 (c) in total and (b) to homeless households (i) through the national mobility scheme, (ii) through HALO and (iii) through other mobility schemes in (1) inner London, (2) outer London, (3) non-metropolitan areas of the south-east, (4) non-metropolitan areas outside the south-east, (5) metropolitan areas outside London and (6) England as a whole.

Mr. Yeo: Following are estimates from local authorities' annual housing investment programme returns (HIP1) for April 1990:

Local authority lettings 1 April 1989 to 31 March 1990

Disabled Employees

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of those employed in his Department are disabled.

Mr. Heseltine: The Department employs 68 staff who are known to be registered disabled and a further 86 who are known to have a disability without being registered. The total represents some 2·5 per cent. of the DOE work force.

Waste

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to publish advice to local authorities on the separation of their functions as waste regulators and as waste disposers under the Environmental Protection Act 1990.

Mr. Trippier: We have today issued a draft circular which gives guidance on the new arrangements under the Environmental Protection Act 1990 for the separation of waste disposal and waste regulation functions in local authorities which are both waste regulation authorities and waste disposal authorities under the Act.

The draft circular gives guidance on the functions assigned to waste regulation and waste disposal authorities under the Act and on the extent of separation that will be required.

From May this year, local authorities will have to arrange for the administrative separation of the two functions so that the waste regulation authority can set the highest practicable environmental standards free from pressures arising from the local authority's role as a waste disposer. It is vital that waste regulation decisions are fair to all waste disposers and seen to be fair.

These changes with other provisions of the Act, particularly those on the transfer of local authority waste disposal operations to arm's length companies or to the private sector announced on 22 February, will help provide the basis for higher standards and fair competition.

Wrecks

Sir Gerrard Neale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on the payment of commission to receivers of wreck in respect of historic material recovered from wrecks.

Sir George Young: I am pleased to be able to announce that further to the measures announced in the Government's response to the "Heritage at Sea" report on 20 December, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Transport has agreed that receivers of wreck will no longer charge a commission of 7·5 per cent. of the value of any property delivered to them. It has also been decided that museums purchasing coins over 100 years old from receivers will not be required to pay that proportion of the price which has until now been retained by the Crown. Both these changes will be introduced for items recovered from wreck sites on or after 1 April next.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what grant per poll tax payer is received by (a) Salford, (b) Wigan and (c) Westminster.

Mr. Key [holding answer 5 March 1991]: Government grants in 1990-91 consist of revenue support grant, special grants, specific grants in aggregate external finance, community charge benefit grant and transitional relief grant. Government grants per head of relevant population in 1990-91 are £565 in Salford, £306 in Wigan and £980 in Westminster.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

COCOM

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals were put by the United Kingdom delegation to the most recent COCOM meeting; and what decisions were agreed at the meeting.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The main United Kingdom objective for the COCOM meeting held at executive committee level on 27 to 28 February was to achieve as much progress as possible in the exercise to reform the COCOM controls by drawing up a new "core list" of industrial dual-use equipment and technologies.

Much progress was made. Agreement was reached on new control parameters in most sectors. Work continues to solve remaining issues so that the next COCOM high-level meeting can establish the core list.

The executive committee meeting also agreed to extend to Poland the provisions of a procedure under which greater access to dual-use items is allowed on the basis of safeguards against diversion. Hungary and the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic have already had the procedure extended to them.

The Gulf

Sir Richard Luce: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the Hong Kong Government have agreed to make a contribution to Her Majesty's Government for the purpose of general work in the Gulf following the liberation of Kuwait; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Hong Kong Government announced on 8 February 1991 a contribution to the United Kingdom of approximately £15 million towards the cost of the Gulf operation. We very much appreciate this generous gesture.

News Department

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the number of staff working in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's news department and the expenditure on that department for each year since 1983.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Staffing levels, including administration, clerical and secretarial support, in, and expenditure for, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office diplomatic wing news department and the aid wing press office are as follows:

Year	Staff	Running costs £ million
1983-84	26	·43
1984-85	26	·43
1985-86	26·5	·53
1986-87	25·5	·53
1987-88	19	·45
1988-89	18	·45
1989-90	18	·56
1990-91	18	·56

Cyprus

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussion he has had with the Secretary General of the United Nations on the ongoing occupation by the Turkish army of northern Cyprus; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We maintain regular high-level contacts with the UN Secretary-General and all parties involved in the intercommunal dispute and actively support the Secretary-General's efforts to promote a comprehensive, just and lasting settlement.

Soviet Union

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made in respect of Mikhail Lidsky of Kiev who has been unsuccessfully applying to leave the Soviet Union.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We can certainly raise Mr. Lidsky's case with the Soviet authorities, but to make our representations most effective we shall need further details.

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made in respect of Iosef Meerson who has been unsuccessfully applying to leave the Soviet Union.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We can certainly raise Mr. Meerson's case with the Soviet authorities, but to make our representations most effective we shall need further details.

Press and Public Relations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's expenditure on (a) advertising and (b) press and public relations for each year from 1979.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Total expenditure by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on advertising from 1979-80 to 1989-90 and estimates for 1990-91 are:

	FCO (Dip Wing)	FCO (ODA Wing)
1979-80	110,226	214,739
1980-81	116,532	145,697
1981-82	162,988	207,964
1982-83	229,711	135,506

Figures for the period before 1983-84 are not available on a comparable basis.

Kuwait

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps the British Government will be taking to protect Palestinians who are currently in Kuwait; and if he will discuss in the United Nations the future of Palestinian workers who fled Kuwait during the invasion and who now wish to return.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We are seriously concerned at these reports. We have urged the Kuwait authorities at a high level to ensure that law and order is restored in Kuwait as quickly as possible and at all costs to avoid a witch-hunt against suspected collaborators.

Information Department

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the number of staff working in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's information department and the expenditure of the information department for each year since 1983; and if he will break down these figures into (i) guidance and verbatims, (ii) publications, (iii) overseas press, (iv) information policy and administration, (v) overseas visitors and London correspondents' service (vi) BBC World Service and Wilton Park (vii) exhibitions and (viii) films, television and radio.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The number of staff working in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's information department since 1983 have been:

Year	Number
1983	66
1984	59
1985	59

Research Department

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the number of staff working in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's research department and the expenditure on the research department; and if he will list the functions of the research department, for each year since 1983.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Staffing levels, including administration, clerical and secretarial support, and expenditure for research and analysis department are as follows:

Year	Staff	Running costs £ million
1983-84	89	1·8
1984-85	89	1·8
1985-86	89	2·0
1986-87	90	2·1
1987-88	91	2·3
1988-89	93	2·5
1989-90	92	3·1
1990-91	90	3·4

The function of the department is to contribute to the formulation of overseas policy through the provision of assessments and advice based on specialist experience.

Kashmir

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations the Government have made to the Indian and Pakistan Governments concerning the situation in Kashmir.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: As I told the House on 14 February, in our regular contacts with the Indian and Pakistani Governments, we have made clear our belief that their dispute over Kashmir should be settled by peaceful agreement between them. At the same time we have condemned the use of violence for political ends and emphasised our concern that human rights must be respected.

Public Bodies Appointments)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to which posts in public bodies he appoints individuals where the posts are (a) part-time and (b) remunerated by more than £50,000 per annum.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The most recent information available for part-time public appointments for which the diplomatic and aid wings of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office are responsible is as follows:

Public body	Number of appointments
Imperial War Museum (Board of Trustees)	2
British Council Board	2
Imperial College of Science and Technology (Governing Body)	1
Great Britain China Centre	1
Great Britain East Europe Centre	1
Great Britain USSR Association	1
Marshall Aid Commemoration Commission	10
Universities China Committee	1
School of Oriental and African Studies (Governing Body)	3
Advisory Board to the Wilson Chair of International Politics, University College of Wales, Aberystwyth	1
Irish Pensions Appeal Tribunal	2
Commonwealth Institute: Chairman of the Scottish Committee	1
Commonwealth Institute: Board of Governors	12
Sightsavers	2
Commonwealth Foundation	1
Diplomatic Service Appeal Boards	8

Bureau of Hygiene and Tropical Diseases	6
Overseas Service Pension Scheme	4
Indian Family Pension Scheme	8
Institute of Development Studies	21
Commonwealth Development Corporation	8
Crown Agents	7
Advisory Committee for the Purchase of Wine	2

No part-time appointments are remunerated at more than £50,000 a year. This figure applies to only one full-time appointment—the managing director of the Crown Agents, who in 1989 received a salary of £63,000.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of those employed in his Department are disabled.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The proportion of registered disabled staff currently employed in the diplomatic wing of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office is 0·38 per cent. The proportion in the aid wing is 1·4 per cent.

The Foreign and Commonwealth Office also employs a number of non-registered disabled staff but holds no statistics on them.

Global Technical and Management Services International

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information his Department has on the activities of the firm Global Technical and Management Services International in Iraq prior to 29 March 1990.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: It is not—and never has been—the practice to reveal details of our contacts with individual companies.

Military Equipment Experts

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in which international forum the export of lethal and non-lethal military equipment is discussed.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: There are several forums including the co-ordinating committee for multilateral export controls, the missile technology control regime, groupings of nuclear suppliers and the Australia group, whose aim is to strengthen export controls on chemical and biological weapons. The subject is also discussed in the United Nations.

EC Political Union

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report a statement on the outcome of the ministerial meeting of the intergovernmental conference on political union on 4 March.

Mr. Hurd: The ministerial meeting of the intergovernmental conference on political union on 4 March, which my hon. Friend the Minister of State and I attended, discussed democratic legitimacy and the powers of the European Parliament. Both democratic legitimacy and a common foreign and security policy were also discussed at an inter-institutional conference between the European Parliament and the member states on 5 March.

At the IGC, my hon. Friend the Minister of State took the opportunity to emphasise the importance we attach to the role of national Parliaments. Following consultation on both sides of this House and in another place, he outlined ideas for recognising the role played by national Parliaments and reinforcing the links between them and the European Parliament.

The Minister of State suggested a recognition of the importance of national scrutiny procedures for EC legislation and the desirability of encouraging their application in all member states; an undertaking that Council procedures should provide adequate opportunity for national scrutiny in advance of final decisions; improving the flow of information about Community business to national Parliaments; encouraging closer contacts between European and national Parliaments.

Foreign Ministers will consider common foreign and security policy in detail later this month. The United Kingdom has put forward proposals on this, building on the success of European political co-operation and the provisions of title III of the Single European Act. Our proposals would strengthen the obligation on the Twelve to formulate and implement a common foreign and security policy.

In the increasing number of areas where our interests converge, the Twelve should play a more active role on the international scene, but member states should not be obliged to accept policies contrary to their national interests. We are therefore insisting on retention of the principle of consensus.

Our proposals also set out the Twelve's relationship with NATO and the Western European Union. We favour intensifying discussion among the Twelve on security issues such as non-proliferation. We also think it right that Europe should take on greater responsibility for its own defence, but without in any way undermining the collective security provided by NATO and the WEU. The mutual defence commitments undertaken in these organisations will continue to make an essential contribution to Europe's security. We believe the right way forward to be through strengthening the WEU which, by developing links with the Twelve, can act as a bridge between the Twelve and NATO. We do not envisage the Twelve taking on a defence role.

Finally, our proposals would improve the efficiency and speed of the machinery by which the Twelve conduct foreign and security policy.

Foreign Affairs Council

Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report a statement on the outcome of the Foreign Affairs Council on 4 March.

Mr. Hurd: A meeting of the Foreign Affairs Council took place in Brussels on 4 March. My hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office and I represented the United Kingdom.

Ministers reviewed the situation in the Soviet Union and approved in principle measures to provide some £177 million food assistance and £350 million as a credit for food purchases for the Soviet Union, subject to strict monitoring to ensure that the food went to those in need. The Council asked the Commission to resume preparatory work for a proposal to give technical assistance to the Soviet Union. A decision on whether to implement this proposal will be taken by the Council later in the light of the prevailing political and economic situation. Ministers also approved in principle £70 million food and medical assistance for Romania and Bulgaria.

Ministers discussed EC assistance to Israel and the occupied territories to counter the effects of the Gulf war. They agreed in principle that the Community should guarantee a loan of some £110 million to Israel, to be raised commercially with £19 million interest rate subsidy from the Community budget, and should provide the occupied territories with £42 million in grants.

The Commission reported progress in the GATT Uruguay round. The United Kingdom and most other member states welcomed the resumption of negotiations and called for an early and successful outcome.

The Commission reported on the negotiations with EFTA and identified the outstanding issues. It was agreed that work on this dossier should be intensified.

Over lunch, Ministers discussed the need to strengthen EC-Turkey relations. They also discussed Yugoslavia and agreed that the presidency would appeal to all Yugoslav parties to continue their dialogue.

Ministers discussed the situation in the Gulf and middle east following the suspension of hostilities. Ministers agreed to a Commission proposal to remove Kuwait from the scope of the EC embargo. They confirmed their support for the efforts of the countries of the region to ensure its future stability.

They agreed on the importance of maintaining close contact with those countries and with the United States and the Soviet Union. In this connection, the presidency is arranging ministerial troika visits to the middle east. Ministers confirmed their support for an international peace conference at an appropriate time, but agreed that the present situation called for urgent, quick diplomatic efforts within a visible framework of contacts and discussions.

Ministers discussed the situation in the Baltic states. They noted that the results of the referendums held in these states could not be ignored and their satisfaction that they had taken place in peace and without interference. They called for an early opening of a serious and constructive dialogue between the Soviet and Baltic authorities.

SCOTLAND

Public Expenditure

10. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much is public expenditure per head in Scotland in the current year.

Mr. Lang: In 1989-90, the latest year for which a figure is available, identifiable public expenditure per head in Scotland was £2,962.

M8 Motorway

21. Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has made any assessment of the environmental impact of increased usage of the M8 motorway.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: An assessment of future traffic growth on the M8 motorway is being carried out as part of the trunk and key principal road network review. Should plans for any major improvement schemes on the M8 be adopted in the light of the review's findings these would be the subject of detailed environmental assessments in the usual way.

Drinking Water

22. Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when all Scottish drinking water sources will conform to European Community safety standards for aluminium.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The EC standard for aluminium in drinking water is based on aesthetic considerations and is not a safety standard. Most of the 129 supply zones for which improvement undertakings have been given by water authorities are programmed to meet the standard before the end of 1994.

NHS Trusts

23. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make it his policy not to approve applications for national health service trust status which are not supported by the majority of the relevant medical staff.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Neither this nor previous Governments have made decisions on major changes in the national health service dependent on this criterion.

37. Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which hospitals in Scotland have now expressed an interest in trust status.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Six expressions of interest have been received from South Ayrshire, Foresterhill (Aberdeen), RSNH (Larbert), Forfar, Victoria Infirmary (Glasgow) and the west Grampian group of hospitals.

A77

24. Mr. McKelvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will outline the progress being made in upgrading the A77.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Considerable progress is being made in upgrading the A77. The Balsalloch-Balcreuchan realignment scheme was completed in December 1990 and the adjoining Benane Hill bypass is at present under construction. Extensive safety fencing work has been undertaken on central reserves. Six further major schemes are in preparation. My right hon. Friend has recently allocated Strathclyde regional council an additional £1·4 million capital consent, to enable the council to make early progress on advance earth works on the local road section of the Ayr road route between the M77 and the Glasgow city boundary.

Right to Buy

26. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the number of homes sold under the right-to-buy legislation.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Almost 205,000 homes in Scotland were sold under the right-to-buy legislation from October 1980 to end December 1990. Some of the Scottish Homes properties were sold under voluntary arrangements. The total level of sales demonstrates clearly the success of the Government's policy of extending the level of home-ownership in response to the aspirations of a large percentage of the population in Scotland.

Scottish Homes

27. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next intends meeting the chairman of Scottish Homes to discuss its budget.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I met the chairman of Scottish Homes on 4 March to discuss Scottish Homes budget.

28. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will approve the regional allocation of the budget for Scottish Homes for 1990-91.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In approving Scottish Homes programme for any year, my right hon. Friend agrees the amounts which Scottish Homes proposes should be spent on particular functions. The allocation of funds to specific areas is then a matter for Scottish Homes.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what proportion of Scottish Homes grant-in-aid allocations has been spent in Dundee in 1989-90 and 1990-91, giving both the percentage figure and the actual cash sums spent.

(2) if he will publish in the Official Report Tayside district's share of the allocation to the north region of grant-in-aid to Scottish Homes for 1989-90, 1990-91 and 1991-92, where those figures are available;

(3) if he will publish in the Official Report the bids made by north region for its share of the grant-in-aid allocations to Scottish Homes in 1989-90, 1990-91 and 1991-92, and the actual allocations to north region in each of those years for which figures are available.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 5 March 1991]: The information sought is not held by the Scottish Office Environment Department as allocations to Scottish Homes regions or districts are a matter for Scottish Homes itself.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will consider giving Scottish Homes grant-in-aid allocations for three years to enable longer-term planning between Scottish Homes, local authorities, housing associations and communities in peripheral estates.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 5 March 1991]: No. The present system permits sufficient flexibility. In preparing its strategic plan, Scottish Homes is given planning indicators of Government funding for the forward year. This itself gives an indication of the future funding levels since Scottish Homes has the ability to forward commit up to 80 per cent. of its current year programme into the next. This enables the agency to plan for future years, but allows sufficient funding for new priorities or projects emerging in the following year.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the grant-in-aid to Scottish Homes in 1989-90, 1990-91 and 1991-92; and what was the allocation to north region in each of those years for which figures are available.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 5 March 1991]: The grant-in-aid for Scottish Homes is set out in the table:

	£ million
1989-90 (Actual; including £36 million National Loans Fund repayments)	229·1
1990-91 (Estimates Provision; including £7·7 million National Loans Fund repayments)	266·4
1991-92 (Estimates Provision; including £169 million National Loans Fund repayments)	443·2

The allocation of these totals to Scottish Homes regions is a matter for Scottish Homes.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the estimated figures for capital receipts in the capital allocations to Scottish Homes in 1989-90, 1990-91 and 1991-92; and what were the actual outturn capital receipts in those years for which figures are available.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 5 March 1991]: The information requested is set out the the table:

	Estimated £ million	Outturn £ million
1989-90	110	115
1990-91	110	[1]
1991-92	100	—

[1] Not yet available.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the capital allocations to Scottish Homes in 1989-90, 1990-91 and 1991-92, showing both budget and outturn figures where those are available.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 5 March 1991]: The information in relation to Scottish Homes total gross expenditure is set out in the table:

	Planned £ million	Outturn £ million
1989-90	349	348
1990-91	357	[1]
1991-92	543	—

Tourism

29. Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with the Scottish tourist board on joint promotions with the Northern Ireland tourist board of both regions.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I have had no such discussions.

Steel Industry

30. Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has any plans to meet the chairman of British Steel to discuss future steel investment in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend has, at present, no plans to meet the chairman of British Steel. My right hon. Friend met the company's chief executive on 21 February, when he was informed of the decision to reduce Ravenscraig to single furnace working. The Scottish Development Agency's study of the prospects for the steel industry in Scotland has identified two potential opportunities and these will be discussed further with British Steel.

Local Government Finance

31. Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the progress of the poll tax review.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is continuing to discuss with colleagues a wide range of options concerned with the financing and structure of local government.

35. Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the representations he has received on the case for abolishing or reviewing the community charge; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations about different aspects of the community charge arrangements. These are being considered carefully as part of the current review of the community charge.

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the qualifying date relating to residence in a property for eligibility for the community charge reduction scheme in Scotland in 1991-92.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The community charge reduction scheme will operate with backdated effect from 1 April 1990. Reductions to personal community charge liabilities will be calculated on the basis of the difference between a person's or a household's former rates liability and their actual personal community charge (not including water) at 1 April 1989. One of the criteria for eligibility, therefore, will be that the charge payer is resident in the same property as he or she was solely or mainly resident on 1 April 1989. If the person moves after 1 April 1990, the date from which the new scheme is effective, entitlement will normally cease on the day of moving.

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the maximum number of assumed poll tax charges that will be used per household for the purposes of calculating help under the community charge reduction scheme in Scotland in 1991-92.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The community charge reduction scheme is to be based on actual community charges (less water charges) set by local authorities in 1989-90 and will operate with backdated effect to 1 April 1990. A maximum of two charges per household will be used for calculating entitlement. Additional assistance is available for the elderly and the disabled who were not former ratepayers.

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people benefited from the poll tax transitional relief scheme in Scotland; and what was the average annual payment to each person who qualified.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Regional and islands councils are required to provide information on the numbers of people who have received relief under the original and the enhanced transitional relief schemes together with information on the total amounts of relief disbursed when making their claims for reimbursement to the Department. Final claims have not yet been received from all local authorities and the information requested is therefore not yet available centrally.

Red Deer

32. Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals he has to increase the number of red deer in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have no proposals to increase the number of red deer in Scotland. The Red Deer Commission has the general function of furthering the control and conservation of red deer. The Commission has recommended that the hind population of around 160,000 should be reduced by approximately 50,000 to achieve a hind/stag ratio of no more than 1·3 to 1.

Erythropoetin

33. Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many renal patients in Ninewells hospital, Dundee, receiving treatment with erythropoetin, had the drug withdrawn because of lack of funds.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: None. Everyone involved recognises that clinical judgments about which drugs to prescribe for patients should not be inhibited by financial considerations. That has always been the case and has not changed. Of course, health boards are entitled to debate with clinicians whether the treatments that they propose to offer patients are the most cost-effective or whether there are better and more economical alternatives that could be considered. And many hospitals have drug and therapeutic committees and subject prescription practices to peer review. But, if ultimately a clinician's judgment is that a particular drug is the only suitable treatment for a patient, the board's responsibility then becomes finding the resources necessary to enable that treatment to be offered.

The drug erythropoetin (EPO) was the subject of trials being conducted in Tayside health board. Those trials have now been completed. However, Tayside health board has confirmed that it is to find the resources to provide EPO when prescribed to all who require it.

Labour Statistics

34. Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to reduce unemployment in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: There has been a fall of 6,600 in seasonally adjusted unemployment in Scotland over the past year. The Government will continue to pursue sound monetary, fiscal and exchange rate policies to reduce inflation, and to promote investment, enterprise and the recovery of economic growth. This is the best means of reducing unemployment. Moreover, for those without a job, there is a wide range of employment and training measures available, particularly for the young and long-term unemployed, to help them back into employment.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has on the number of job losses in the period 1 June 1990 to 1 February 1991 in (a) the Greenock travel-to-work area, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Information in the form requested is not available. There are no comprehensive statistics on redundancies. The following table shows the number of confirmed redundancies involving 10 or more workers notified to the Employment Department from June 1990 to January 1991 for the areas requested.

Confirmed redundancies[1,2]
June 1990 to January 1991

	Greenock TTWA	Strathclyde region	Scotland
1990
June	Nil	383	1,007
July	Nil	533	981
August	Nil	111	560
September	Nil	281	683
October	Nil	615	1,115
November	Nil	326	1,439
December	Nil	244	1,086
1991
January	Nil	113	370
TOTAL	Nil	2,606	7,241

[1] All figures are provisional.
[2] For a variety of reasons, not all redundancies are notified to the Employment Department, and not all those that are notified are eventually confirmed.

Job losses, however, should not be viewed in isolation: in any dynamic economy, jobs are also being continually created. Over the latest year for which figures are available (to September 1990), the civilian work force in employment in Scotland increased by 48,000, or by over 900 per week.

Representative Office, Brussels

36. Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has had calling for his Department to establish a representative office in Brussels.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I am aware of the views that some hon. Members and others have expressed. The Scottish Office is already represented very effectively in Brussels by the United Kingdom permanent representation and we have no proposals for change.

Interest Rates

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the impact of the Government's interest rate policy on the levels of unemployment in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The reduction in United Kingdom inflation seen over the last few months is the result of the Government's firm commitment to a prudent interest rate policy.

Reducing inflation is the best means of promoting investment, enterprise and economic growth in Scotland. Only in this way can Scottish unemployment be set on a sustainable downward trend.

Personal Disposable Incomes

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the trends of personal disposable incomes in Scotland over the past 15-years.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Over the 15-year period between 1973 and 1988, personal disposable income per head in Scotland increased by over a third in real terms, to £5,236 per head by 1988. Personal disposable income per head in Scotland grew slightly faster than in the United Kingdom as a whole—from 94·6 per cent. of the United Kingdom average in 1973 to 97·3 per cent. in 1988. In 1988, personal disposable income per head in Scotland was higher than in all parts of the United Kingdom except the south-east and south-west.

Property Identification

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether it is the policy of his Department to mark property with an indelible mark or similar means of identification.

Mr. Lang: The methods used to protect official property are kept under constant review and measures are taken as appropriate.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether it is the policy of the Lord Advocate's departments to mark property with an indelible mark or similar means of identification.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It is not the policy of the Lord Advocate's departments to mark property with an indelible mark. Where appropriate, property is identified with a discreet security marking.

Disabled People

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how statistical data are collated in respect of the employment and training of people with disabilities in Scotland by his Department or other Government offices or agencies; and if he will publish the most recent statistics.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Statistics on the employment and training of people with disabilities in Scotland are available in a number of different formats from various sources. The main sources of information on the employment and training of disabled people in Scotland are described as follows.

Data on those on Government training programmes who have disabilities are based on information supplied by the training provider about each trainee starting a training programme. Providers are asked to identify disabled trainees on the basis of "those who on account of injury, disease or congenital deformity are substantially handicapped in obtaining or keeping employment or undertaking work on their own account of a kind which apart from that injury, disease or deformity would be suited to their age, experience and qualifications".

The latest information for Scotland is that, between April and December 1990, some 1·2 per cent. of those who started on YT and 5·6 per cent. of those who started on ET were recorded as disabled by their training provider.

Some data are collected about registration as disabled under the terms of the Disabled Persons (Employment) Acts 1944 and 1958, and on the extent to which employers are complying with the provisions of the quota scheme —which was established by the 1944 Act.

This Act places a duty on employers who have 20 or more workers to employ a quota of registered disabled people. The standard quota is at present 3 per cent. of an employer's total work force. It is not an offence to be below quota. However, when in this situation an employer has a further duty, under the Act, to engage suitable registered disabled people if any are available when vacancies arise. An employer who is below quota must not engage anyone other than a registered disabled person without first obtaining a permit to do so from the employment service's local disablement resettlement officer, and must not discharge a registered disabled worker without reasonable cause. The provisions of the Act are not legally binding on the Crown, but Government Departments and the national health service have undertaken to accept the same responsibilities as other employers.

The disabled persons register is kept at the employment service's local offices and local education authority careers offices. The numbers registered are counted annually in April to provide local, regional and national totals.

The employment service's local offices, which also monitor compliance with the provisions of the quota scheme, conduct an annual inquiry, which takes place in May and is concluded on 1 June, into the extent to which employers in their areas who are subject to quota are employing registered disabled people.

In April 1990 there were 34,082 registered disabled people in Scotland; and on 1 June that year, the average percentage of registered disabled people in the work forces of Scottish-based employers subject to the quota provisions was 0·7 per cent. This latter figure compares with 0·8 per cent. for Great Britain as a whole.

However, data about registered disabled people and their employment under the quota scheme do not provide an accurate picture of the employment position of people with disabilities. Registration as disabled is voluntary, and it has been established by recent research commissioned by the employment service—"Employment and Handicap", SCPR 1990, a copy of which is in the Library—that the majority of people with disabilities who would be eligible to register choose not to so so. Data on compliance with the quota relates only to registered disabled people and to employers with 20 or more workers.

There is a further complication, in that the quota responsibilities are placed on employers in respect of their total work forces, not separately for individual branches or establishments. In the case of employers with more than one branch, compliance is monitored by the employment service's local office in which the employer's headquarters is located. As a consequence, statistics provided from local office records in Scotland do not take account of registered disabled people working in Scotland for employers whose headquarters is elsewhere in Great Britain, but will include data in respect of those working elsewhere in Great Britain for employers based in Scotland.

In the spring of each year, the Department of Employment publishes an article in the Employment Gazette showing the number and proportion of registered disabled people employed by a range of public sector employers. Information is given for the main central and local government employers including those in Scotland. The latest article, which gives information for May 1990, was published in the February 1991 edition.

Until January 1990, the employment service maintained information on the number of disabled people registered for work at jobcentres and careers offices. However, this information needs to be treated with considerable caution because, from October 1982, it has not been compulsory to register for employment as a condition for the receipt of unemployment benefit. Because of their limited value, the collection of these figures was discontinued in January 1990. At that date, there were 1,928 unemployed registered disabled also registered for work at jobcentres and careers offices in Scotland, and an additional 4,521 unemployed people with disabilities registered at jobcentres and careers offices who were not also registered as disabled.

The annual "Labour Force Survey" collects a wide range of information about the United Kingdom labour market. This is a sample survey of households which can provide analyses for the Scottish labour market. Some information is collected in the survey about those with health problems or disabilities in response to the question

"Do you have any health problems or disabilities which limit the kind of paid work you can do?"

This covers a much wider range of people than those recorded as disabled on Government training programmes and than those registered as disabled under the 1944 Act. It should also be noted that, since the "Labour Force Survey" is a household survey, disabled people living in hostel or institutional accommodation will not be included in the survey.

The latest information from this survey is that of an estimated 444,000 people of working age in Scotland in spring 1989 with health problems or disabilities which limit the kind of paid work they can do, 34 per cent. were in employment, 10 per cent. were unemployed and 56 per cent. were economically inactive.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many assisted places pupils attended each of the schools involved in the assisted places scheme.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information is as follows:

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland to which posts in public bodies he appoints individuals where the posts are (a) part-time and (b) remunerated by more than £50,000 per annum.

Mr. Lang: The posts in public bodies to which I appointed individuals as at 1 July 1990 are set out in pages 77 to 88 and 113 of the Cabinet Office publication "Public Bodies 1990", a copy of which is available in the Library.

The majority of these appointments are on a part-time basis, none of which is remunerated by more than £50,000 per annum.

Strathclyde Police

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many additional uniformed police officers have been authorised to be added to the strength of the Strathclyde police force in each year from 1975 to 1990.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: None. Strathclyde regional council made only one application—in 1983—during this period for the Secretary of State's consent to an increase in the authorised police establishment of Strathclyde police. Consent was withheld on the ground that the force was being required by the council to operate substantially below its existing authorised establishment.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many crimes were (a) recorded and (b) detected by the Strathclyde police force in each year from 1975 to 1990.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Statistics of crimes and offences recorded and cleared up in each police force area are published annually in the reports of Her Majesty's chief inspector of constabulary for Scotland, copies of which are available in the Library. Figures for 1990 are not yet available.

Cervical Cancer

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many women have died from cervical cancer in each of the past 10 years; and if he will give the figures by health board area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The number of deaths in each health board area with malignant neoplasm of the cervix uteri (ICD[1] 180) recorded as the underlying cause of death is shown in the following table.

[1] International Classification of Diseases, Ninth revision.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cervical smear tests have been carried out on women for each year since 1980 in each of the health board areas; and by health board area how many have yet to be dealt with by the appropriate medical agencies.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The number of tests carried out from 1980 to 1989, the latest available year, is shown in the table. Information is not collected centrally about the number of smears outstanding. Since December 1990 health boards have been set a target of 14 days maximum for reporting of test results, which is to be achieved no later than 31 May 1991.

These figures relate to smears analysed by laboratories in each health board area.
Smears taken from women in one health board area may be analysed in laboratories in other health board areas.

Bankruptcies

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many companies have gone into liquidation or have declared bankruptcy in (a) Strathclyde and (b) Scotland as a whole in each of the past three years; and in which areas of economic activity they were to be found.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The table gives the available information on Scottish registered companies for the past three years. There is no information on company liquidations for areas within Scotland. The term bankruptcy does not apply to companies.

Surplus School Places

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the current level of surplus places in each education authority in both primary and secondary schools.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The current level of surplus places in schools in Scotland is substantial. It is for education authorities to assess the scale of the problems in their area and to seek to achieve rationalisation of their school provision accordingly.

Community Charge

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has held recent discussions with local authorities concerning the subject of the reimbursement of poll tax income forgone by those service men and service women serving in the Gulf war; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment announced on 19 February in answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Critchley) a special scheme to compensate local authorities for community charge income forgone where service personnel normally resident in their area have been posted to the Gulf. The announcement made it clear that the scheme would apply in Scotland and my Department wrote to all Scottish authorities about the matter on 26 February. I am arranging for a copy of their letter to be placed in the House Library.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the current waiting list for each specialty in (a) the catchment area for the Argyll and Clyde health board and (b) the Greater Glasgow health board; and what is the number of people in each area who have waited (i) for one year and (ii) for more than two years.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Figures are currently available as at 31 March 1990. These are set out in the tables. The figures relate to each health board area and not to area of residence of patient.

Inverclyde

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his most up-to-date estimate of the number of jobs that have been created by the Inverclyde initiative; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The latest information available shows that the total number of jobs created by projects which have been assisted by the Inverclyde initiative between March 1985 and May 1990 is approximately 3,840. The initiative's period of operation officially expired in March 1990.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his most up-to-date estimate of the jobs that have been created by the Inverclyde enterprise zone; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The latest information available on jobs in the Inverclyde enterprise zone shows that at September 1990, 356 new jobs had been created with 362 existing jobs secured. In addition, 1,083 new jobs were forecast in companies locating in the zone.

Private Care Homes

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what provisions are made to recompense social work departments for the cost implications of administering private care homes which are struck off the register.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: There are no specific statutory provisions relating to these circumstances. Local authority functions relating to the registration and inspection of such homes are financed by a combination of charges on owners of homes and provision in aggregate external finance.

Ambulance Service

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the present established strength of officer, control assistant grades and ambulance crews of the ambulance service; and what plans there are for changes.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The current establishment is 149 officers, 79 control assistants, 1,347 accident and emergency and 587 non-emergency crew staff. From the additional £8 million which I have made available to the ambulance service for 1991-92, plans are being formulated to improve the service by increasing double manning and the number of staff with extended training skills.

Industrial Development

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next expects to meet the chief executive of the Scottish Development Agency to discuss industrial development.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend has no immediate plans to meet the chief executive of the Scottish Development Agency; but he did meet the chairman of the agency informally last week to discuss a range of matters of mutual interest.

Forestry

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans the Government have to improve the delivery of their forestry policies and to reorganise the Forestry Commission.

Mr. Lang: The Government's forestry policies have been developed and refined over recent years. We are encouraging more planting on better quality land than hitherto and the creation of forests close to major centres of population. As noted in the Environment White Paper, the Government have also taken steps to build environmental objectives into forestry policy. A much greater emphasis is being placed, for instance, on the planting of broadleaves and on the conservation of existing forests and woodlands. At the same time, the value of forestry output is increasing in line with the steady rise in timber production and processing. We are committed to the concept of multi-purpose forests, with all that they can offer in economic, social and environmental terms.

Against that background, we have been concerned to ensure that the Forestry Commission is organised to take full advantage of the new opportunities now opening up for forestry. This will require a strong and flexible Commission, which can focus its resources to deliver our policies for the development of forestry as cost-effectively as possible. To this end, we see advantage in changes being made to the Commission's management structure to achieve a clearer administrative distinction between those staff concerned with its regulatory and advisory duties as a Government Department and those engaged in the management of its forests. We have therefore endorsed a proposal by the Forestry Commissioners that the commission should be reorganised along these lines.

The commission's staff will be given more precisely defined responsibilities and goals. This will improve the effectiveness of the authority, which will have a responsibility to oversee the work of the enterprise as well as the private sector. Enterprise managers will be free to concentrate on the efficient management of the commission's forest estate, with clear commercial, environmental and social objectives.

I emphasise that this will be an internal reorganisation. Last year, in responding to its report "Land Use and Forestry", we rejected a recommendation by the Agriculture Committee that the commission should be split up. This reorganisation fully accords with that decision.

The implementation of the reorganisation will now be put in hand by the Forestry Commissioners.

Residential Properties

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, what is the estimate of the number of empty residential properties in the private sector; and what is the estimate of the percentage this represents of the total number of residential properties in the private sector.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 28 February 1991]: Information is not collected on the private sector alone. It is estimated that at 30 June 1990, some 99,000 dwellings in Scotland were vacant: this represented 4·7 per cent. of the total housing stock. In addition, it is estimated that there are about 29,000 second or holiday homes; a total of some 127,500 houses may be vacant all or part of the time.

DEFENCE

The Gulf

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations he has received about the postal service to troops serving in the Gulf; and what further measures his Department has taken to ensure the provision of a low-cost and efficient postal service.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A number of representations have been received about the postal service to troops serving in the Gulf.

Forces concessionary rate mail, in addition to the forces free airletter facility, provides a low-cost and efficient postal service to the Gulf. I also welcome the initiative by United Parcels in helping to deliver parcels at low cost or free of charge to the defence postal and courier service depot in London. All forces mail to the Gulf is being carried by RAF aircraft which depart daily.

Over 1 million kilograms of mail has been moved to the Gulf from the United Kingdom, as well as over 100,000 kilograms from Germany. I believe that the postal service has performed well, often in difficult circumstances. The situation is regularly monitored, but at present I have no plans to introduce any change to current arrangements.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the United States armed forces contingency hospitals based at RAF Feltwell, Bicester, Little Rissington, Nocton Hall, Upwood, Kemble, Bordan, Newton and Waterbeach will be available for the treatment of United Kingdom armed forces casualties returning from the Gulf.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The United States armed forces have activated their contingency hospitals at RAF Little Rissington, Bicester and Nocton Hall. Although these contingency hospitals are primarily designed for the treatment of United States military personnel, casualties from any allied nation would be admitted in an emergency.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many troops there are in the Gulf from each allied country; and how many tanks and armed personnel carriers from each allied country are in the Gulf.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) on 25 February at column 389. The United Kingdom committed about 43,000 personnel to the operation in the Gulf.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the targets of British aircraft during each of the last three days of the war.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: RAF aircraft continued to attack military targets and facilities supporting Iraq's occupation of Kuwait, particularly in support of coalition ground forces.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if Her Majesty's Government will offer United Kingdom medical facilities in the Gulf to Iraqi non-prisoner wounded where capacity is available.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No injured or wounded person of any nationality would be refused emergency medical treatment in United Kingdom medical facilities in the Gulf.

Nuclear Tests

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if studies undertaken by the National Radiological Protection Board on the morbidity rate of service personnel involved in nuclear tests on Christmas Island have been subject to independent review; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The NRPB/Imperial Cancer Research Fund study covered mortality and cancer incidence in United Kingdom participants in nuclear tests in both Australia and Christmas Island. It was based on mortality rather than morbidity rates, though incomplete data on cancer incidence (morbidity plus mortality) for the limited period over which United Kingdom records exist were not at variance with the main conclusions. The report was subject to stringent peer review before it was accepted for publication in the British Medical Journal.

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make available to hon. Members the records of the environmental monitoring studies relating to British nuclear tests.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Ministry of Defence holds extensive records of raw environmental monitoring data. Some records of environmental monitoring were published in 1985 by the Australian royal commission into United Kingdom nuclear tests in Australia. Further monitoring around Maralinga was carried out by the Australian technical advisory group (TAG) which reported in November 1990. We have no plans to prepare and publish a compilation of these extensive data.

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what unpublished records of nuclear tests are held by his Department; and what plans he has to publish them.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The MOD holds a very large amount of unpublished, classified information on the United Kingdom nuclear tests. This is reviewed for possible release to the Public Record Office 30 years after creation, as is the practice for all other classified MOD reports. Decisions on publication are based soley on consideration of national security.

There are no plans to review and publish all these reports though all available information on exposures of test participants to ionising radiation has been released to NRPB and was analysed in their report published in 1985.

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements have existed for veterans of British nuclear tests to undergo medical examination.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: During their service, test participants would have had access to medical examination whenever it was required. Civilian test veterans, including ex-service personnel, would no doubt seek advice from their general practitioner when appropriate.

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what published records for which his Department is responsible are available of previous nuclear tests; where they are held; and when were they published.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Records of previous nuclear tests, compiled for the Australian royal commission into United Kingdom nuclear tests in 1985, are at the Public Record Office at Kew, class description DEFE 16. Other documents are lodged in the British Library. A comprehensive list of such documents could not be compiled without disproportionate cost.

Mr McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to arrange for the medical examination of the children and grandchildren of British nuclear test veterans; whether such tests have been carried out; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There are no current plans to arrange for the medical examination of the children and grandchildren of British participants in the nuclear test programme, nor have such tests been carried out in the past.

Property Marking

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether it is the policy of his Department to mark property with an indelible mark or similar means of identification.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: It would not be practicable or necessary to mark every item of MOD property, but many are readily identifiable. Stores and equipment are protected by a range of security measures.

HMS Endurance

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what duties are performed in the south Atlantic by HMS Endurance.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: HMS Endurance undertakes a range of representational, scientific and support duties, including assistance and support to the British Antarctic survey on an ad hoc basis.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to withdraw HMS Endurance from her station in the south Atlantic.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my answer of 19 February at col. 138 to my hon. Friend the Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Field).

RAF Fairford

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what measures are taken to inform the local fire brigade when bomb-laden aircraft take off from RAF Fairford.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A close working relationship exists between the local fire brigade and the United States Air Force fire department at RAF Fairford, but advance notification of operations is not given to civil agencies for operational security reasons.

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence to which posts in public bodies he appoints individuals where the posts are (a) part-time and (b) remunerated by more than £50,000 per annum.

Mr. Alan Clark: None. I refer the hon. Member to "Public Bodies 1990" issued by the Office of the Minister for the Civil Service; pages 12 to 14 list Ministry of Defence appointments.

Walter Somers Ltd.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will now state the nature of the two telephone conversations between Walter Somers Ltd. and a Ministry of Defence metallurgical expert in 1988, referred to in his reply of 2 May 1990, Official Report, column 601.

Mr. Alan Clark: The conversations were concerned with technical aspects of the steel tubes which Walter Somers Ltd. proposed to export to Iraq.

Equipment

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has had with his NATO counterparts regarding the distinction between lethal and non-lethal defence equipment.

Mr. Alan Clark: None.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his assessment of the financial effect on his equipment procurement budget of the export of British defence equipment.

Mr. Alan Clark: It is not possible accurately to quantify the full effect.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment his Department has made of the activities of the Space Research Corporation that relate to the actual or possible export of non-lethal or lethal defence equipment, referred to in his answer of 2 May 1990, Official Report, column 602.

Mr. Alan Clark: The assessment of my Department is that SRC was not directly involved in the production and export of the equipment referred to. This was undertaken by another firm, ATI, which was controlled by SRC's founder, Dr. G. V. Bull. It is believed that the equipment consisted of large calibre gun parts destined for Iraq.

Arms Sales

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether it is his policy to discuss arms sales to non-NATO countries with other NATO countries.

Mr. Alan Clark: As the need arises, I discuss the sale to non-NATO countries of collaboratively developed defence equipment with participating NATO partners. Defence officials are involved in discussions with appropriate NATO and other countries, bilaterally and multilaterally, on matters relating to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, missile technology control regime and measures to prevent chemical and biological weapon proliferation.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the conference of national armaments directors has discussed arms sales to non-NATO countries; and whether there are any plans for the conference of national armaments directors to discuss arms sales to non-NATO countries.

Mr. Alan Clark: No substantive discussion of this subject has taken place in the conference of national armaments directors and we have no plans to raise the subject in this forum.

Iraq

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is his assessment of the effect that the activities of the Matrix Churchill Company have had on the development of the Iraqi defence industry;

(2) what is his assessment of the effect that the activities of the Ali Arabi Trading Co. have had on the development of the Iraqi defence industry.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Ali Arabi Trading Company was the ultimate holding company for the British Company, Matrix Churchill. In the light of charges laid against individuals and continuing investigations being carried out by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise it would not be appropriate to comment further.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his assessment of the source of the technology used by the Iraqi defence industry to manufacture 155mm artillery shells.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Iraq has acquired technology for its defence industry from a large number of countries.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information was supplied to the commanders of British forces in the Gulf region relating to British exports of non-lethal defence equipment to Iraq.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The commander of the British forces in the Gulf region was fully briefed on the known composition of enemy forces.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information has been supplied to his Department by foreign Governments regarding their exports to Iraq of defence equipment.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Her Majesty's Government have been in contact with allied and other Governments about their past defence exports to Iraq. Details of any information received remain confidential.

Middle East

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has had with his NATO counterparts regarding the development of defence industries in the middle east region.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: None.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of those employed in his Department are disabled.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Some 0·9 per cent. of staff in the MOD are registered disabled. In addition, there are a number of staff with disabilities working in the MOD who have not formally registered themselves as disabled.

Defence Quality Assurance

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will consider 14MU RAF Carlisle for the relocation of the directorate general of defence quality assurance.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: We are considering a number of options for the relocation of DGDQA and will come to a decision as soon as possible.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Attorney-General what steps he has taken to recruit members of ethnic minorities in top grades of employment in the Law Officers Department.

The Attorney-General: Recruitment at senior grades in the civil service is carried out by the Civil Service Commission. The Commission has taken various steps to aid recruitment of members of the ethnic minorities.

ER

Mr. Janner: To ask the Attorney-General how many and what percentage of officers in each grade (1-7) and overall in the Law Officers Department are (a) women and (b) from ethnic minorities, respectively.

The Attorney-General: In the Departments for which I am responsible the number and percentage of officers in each grade from 1 to 7 and overall who are (a) women and (b) from ethnic minorities respectively as at 1 April 1990 (4 March 1991 in the case of the Crown prosecution service) are as follows:

Mr. Janner: To ask the Attorney-General when the Law Officers Department last conducted a survey of the ethnic origins of its employees; when it next plans to do so; and whether he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The Departments for which I am responsible, other than the Crown prosecution service and the Serious Fraud Office, took part in the nationwide survey of non-industrial civil servants which was completed in 1988.

The Crown prosecution service conducted a survey in January 1990.

The Serious Fraud Office has not previously undertaken a monitoring exercise because the origins of the individuals have been known to management, due to the small size of the Department. In the Serious Fraud Office the setting up of an equal opportunities review will be undertaken by the recently appointed grade 7 head of finance and establishment officer. As a result, it is expected that a formal monitoring and review system will be in place by the summer of this year.

In the other Departments, information on the ethnic origins of staff has been kept up to date.

Mortgage Repossessions

Mr. Battle: To ask the Attorney-General how many court actions relating to mortgage repossessions occurred in the Selby and York county court in each year since 1979.

The Attorney-General: The number of mortgage actions for possession entered and orders made for possession in York county court in each year since 1986, the first year for which figures are available, are shown in the table.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Student Loans

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the total number of students attending all designated courses for student loans who are potentially eligible for student loans in (a) England and (b) Wales.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Separate figures for England and for Wales are not available. The Department recently estimated that 547,000 students domiciled in England and Wales are eligible for a loan in the academic year 1990-91. The estimate may be revised as further data become available.

Grant-maintained schools

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what would be the total cost in payment of capital grants, assuming that the present average payment was maintained, if every local education authority school opted for grant-maintained status;

(2) what would be the total cost in payment of special purpose grants, assuming that the present average payment was maintained, if every local education authority school opted for grant-maintained status;

(3) what would be the total cost in payment of transitional grants, assuming that the present average payment was maintained, if every local education authority school opted for grant-maintained status.

Mr. Eggar: The levels of these grants are reviewed annually in the light of the Government's spending priorities for education and other services. It is not therefore possible to project a figure for the total cost if every local authority school opted for grant-maintained status.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the average amount paid per school in (a) transitional grants, (b) special purpose grants and (c) capital grants for those schools that have opted for grant-maintained status.

Mr. Eggar: The table sets out the total amount of these grants paid to grant-maintained schools in 1989-90, the only year in respect of which final figures are available.

	£K
Transitional grants	746
Special purpose grants	455
Capital grants	2,013

The actual grants paid to each GM school reflect the particular circumstance of an individual school, including its size, and the date within the financial year on which it became grant-maintained.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the amount paid in capital grants for each school that has opted for grant-maintained status.

Mr. Eggar: Final figures are only available in respect of the 1989-90 financial year. The total amount paid in capital grants in that year to GM schools was as follows:

Schools incorporated in September 1989	£K
London Oratory School	1,039·7
Old Swinford Hospital	750·1
Skegness Grammar School	180·2

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the amount paid in transitional grants to each school that has opted for grant-maintained status.

Mr. Eggar: Transitional grants are available to help with preparing for and taking on grant-maintained status. The transitional grants paid to grant-maintained schools incorporated on or before September 1990 are as follows:

Notes:

1. A further 20 schools have yet to submit their final bids for transitional grant. Of these, six schools were incorporated as grant-maintained schools on 1 January 1991, 12 schools will be incorporated in April 1991 and two schools will be incorporated on 1 September 1991.
2. Schools incorporated as grant-maintained schools on or before September 1990 were eligible to apply for transitional grant of £15,000 plus £15 per pupil up to a ceiling of £30,000. This grant could only be paid prior to the date of incorporation.
3. It was announced on 10 October 1990 that all secondary schools and primary schools with 200 or more pupils incorporated from 1 January 1991 would be eligible to apply for £30,000 plus £30 per pupil in transitional grant. Smaller primary schools will be eligible to receive £20,000 plus £30 per pupil. Financial regulations have now been laid before the House allowing schools to spend grant after incorporation.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the amount paid in special purpose grants to each school that has opted for grant-maintained status.

Mr. Eggar: Final figures are available only in respect of the 1989-90 financial year. The total amount paid in special purpose grants in that year to GM schools was as follows:

Higher Education

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what discussions he has had with the chairman of the Universities Funding Council about future capital expenditure programmes on academic buildings and student accommodation for the expansion of higher education up to the year 2000.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My right hon. and learned Friend and I meet the chairmen of both funding councils from time to time to discuss a range of higher education issues, including capital funding for teaching and research in higher education. Provision of student accommodation is a matter for institutions.

Standard Assessment Test

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what advice he is giving to local education authorities and to schools in England regarding those pupils whose parents are refusing to allow them to take the standard assessment test at key stage 1.

Mr. Eggar: Parents do not have a right to withdraw their children from any part of the national curriculum, including the standard assessment tasks at key stage 1.

If children are absent from school without leave, local education authorities may need to investigate, through their established procedures, whether a breach of the parental duty to secure regular attendance is taking place.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Palestinians

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what aid Her Majesty's Government are giving, and proposing to give, to the Palestinians in the occupied territories.

Mrs. Chalker: In 1990-91 we are providing about £1·2 million in support of United Kingdom voluntary agency activities in the west bank and Gaza strip and for training awards in the United Kingdom for Palestinians. We hope to maintain at least the same level of support in 1991-92. In addition we are contributing to UNRWA's activities in the occupied territories—United Kingdom contribution of £5·5 million in 1990 and £6·0 million in 1991—and through the EC budget which in 1991 has provision for 102 million ecu for food aid, project assistance, and emergency relief to the Palestinians. The United Kingdom share of this will be around £12 million.

The Arts

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the level of arts services budgets in each local authority in Wales for each year between 1980 and 1990.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Available expenditure information is given in the following tables. It is not possible to give figures separately for theatres and civic halls.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he has taken to recruit members of ethnic minorities in top grades of employment at the Welsh Office.

Mr. David Hunt: The Civil Service Commission is responsible for most recruitment into senior grades in the Welsh Office. It has introduced a number of initiatives to encourage applications from members of ethnic minorities.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many and what percentage of officers in each grade (1-7) and overall in the Department are (a) women and (b) from ethnic minorities, respectively.

Mr. David Hunt: The details are as follows:

	Women[1]
	Number	Percentage
Grade 1	—	—
Grade 2	—	—
Grade 3	1·0	9
Grade 4	1·0	17
Grade 5	7·5	13
Grade 6	15·0	17
Grade 7	15·0	10
Department	1,042·0	48

[1] Total as at April 1990.

	Members of Ethnic Minorities
	Number	Percentage
Grades 1—6	—	—
Grade 7	2	1·4
Departmental Total	24	1·1

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when his Department last conducted a survey of the ethnic origins of its employees; when it next plans to do so; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: My Department carried out a survey of the ethnic origin of its employees in May 1988. The ethnic origin of all new entrants and leavers is monitored and I have no plans for another survey. Since 1990 my Department has been concentrating on the implementation of a programme of action to consolidate the equality of opportunity offered to people of ethnic minority origin.

Housing Repairs, Merthyr

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will place in the Library a list of local authority properties surveyed under the Welsh housing conditions survey to determine the level of repair costs to Merthyr borough council.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: I have today placed a copy of the list in the Library of the House.

Corlan Housing Association

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the inquiry commissioned by Tai Cymru into the affairs of the Corlan housing association.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: On 25 May 1990, and exercising its powers under section 28 of the Housing Associations Act 1985, Tai Cymru asked the Housing Association Consultancy and Advisory Service (HACAS) to conduct an inquiry into the affairs of Corlan housing association. Tai Cymru had already established by that date that Corlan faced significant difficulty. The HACAS report expresses concern in four main areas. First, it points to instances of what appear to have been overvaluations of site work and premature claims for housing association grants. Secondly, the report suggests that Corlan's internal administrative and other arrangements were not sufficiently robust to ensure that a development programme of the scale and nature undertaken by the association could be managed with appropriate care and thoroughness. Thirdly, shortcomings in the management of development projects were apparently compounded by deficiencies of financial control. Lastly, it is suggested that the association allowed uncertainties to arise over establishing the delegated responsibilities and development control mechanisms essential to good management in any organisation.

The report concludes that the committee of management believed that management mechanisms needed to be consolidated and were making efforts to bring this about. It also makes it clear that the Committee was completely unaware of any overvaluation or overclaiming—and would not in any circumstances have approved if such proposals had been put to it. The inquiry found no evidence to suggest that any individual staff member had sought to benefit financially from what occurred. The report has been prepared for issue by Tai Cymru, notably to chairmen and committees of management; and I understand that copies are being placed in the Library of the House.

With the help of Wales and West housing association, Tai Cymru was able to devise arrangements to secure the position of all Corlan's tenants, and to retain the association's housing stock, including those sites under development. Tai Cymru also set out to ensure that the relevant lessons had been learnt from what took place at Corlan. Following its creation in April 1989, Tai Cymru had already taken steps to introduce performance monitoring procedures for housing associations of greater breadth than those associated with conventional financial audit. After it became clear that Corlan faced serious difficulties, Tai Cymru took the following further measures. In addition to submitting audited annual accounts, all housing associations were required to present management accounts, balance sheets and 12-month cashflow forecasts on a quarterly basis. Special arrangements were made to scrutinise these new submissions from housing associations: as an additional safeguard, Tai Cymru made it clear that grant payments could be automatically suspended if the submissions were not returned to timetable. The procedures for validating grant claims and for preventing overclaiming were strengthened. New technical guidance was issued on the treatment of valuations. In addition, and following detailed discussions with the Welsh Federation of Housing Associations, a fixed charge is to be applied to all new schemes in order to provide additional security for public assets.

As for committees of management, Tai Cymru is to organise a programme of seminars this year to help members in tackling their financial and management responsibilities. In the light of discussion at those seminars they will make recommendations on whether any other support, such as the provision of special training, might be of assistance to members. Officials of Tai Cymru and the Welsh Office will set up a joint working group to review those new measures and consider whether any additional steps need to be taken in the light of what happened at Corlan. I am confident that the measures already taken by Tai Cymru will strengthen the capacity and performance of housing associations in Wales to the considerable benefit of the movement, now and for the future.

Operations (Statistics)

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list (a) for each health district in Wales and (b) for each of the last three years (i) the number of scheduled sessions held in operating theatres, (ii) the number of scheduled sessions that were cancelled, (iii) the number of cases operated on in scheduled sessions, (iv) the number of cases operated on outside scheduled sessions and (v) the total number of cases operated on.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman and place a copy of my letter in the Library of the House.

Leybucht Bay

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with (a) the National Rivers Authority and (b) the Countryside Council for Wales concerning the decision in the Leybucht bay case determined by the European Court of Justice on 28 February.

Mr. David Hunt: None.

ENVIRONMENT

Homelessness

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many additional units of accommodation have been provided for homeless households under the homeless initiative for housing associations in 1990-91 by (a) the local authority area in which they have been provided, (b) the number of units provided through repairs to empty housing association homes, (c) the number of units provided through off the shelf purchasing by housing associations and (d) the number of homes becoming available through tenants incentive scheme payments.

Sir George Young: This is a matter for the Housing Corporation. I have therefore asked the corporation to respond to the hon. Member direct.

Yorkshire, Humberside and Leeds

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson) of 21 February, Official Report, column 196, if he will provide a breakdown by programme of his Department's expenditure in (i) Yorkshire and Humberside and (ii) the metropolitan district of Leeds at (a) 1990-91 prices and (b) as a percentage of the 1990-91 expenditure.

Mr. Key: A breakdown of the Department's main programmes is given in the table for the years 1986-87 to date, at 1990-91 prices, (a) for Yorkshire and Humberside region and (b) for the metropolitan district of Leeds. The figures are also expressed as a percentage of the 1990-91 expenditure. Changes in programme definition and the introduction of new capital and revenue support systems mean that figures for individual years may not be directly comparable.

Hostel Deficit Grant

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether new hostel deficit grant approvals will be issued after 1 April in respect of any eligible schemes in respect of hostel deficit grant receiving project approval before that date but not having been processed due to Housing Corporation delays; and whether he will keep the situation under review and issue a further progress report in March;

(2) what is the current backlog of schemes awaiting budget approval from the Housing Corporation in respect of hostel deficit grant; and when the backlog will be cleared;

(3) what monthly target the Housing Corporation would need to meet to eliminate the backlog of schemes awaiting budget approval in respect of hostel deficit grant by the due date; what performance is currently being maintained against this target; and how many schemes have been approved and how many rejected in each of the last three calendar months.

Mr. Yeo: The Housing Corporation does not have a backlog of new projects awaiting HDG budget approval and it will be able to give in principle budget approval, as appropriate, for all schemes which receive project approval during 1990-91.

In the last three months the corporation has dealt with the following new HDG budget applications:

Month	Approved	Rejected
December	14	11
January	20	17
February	13	8

Council Land

Mr. Richard Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number of applications submitted in each of the years since 1980 by Walsall metropolitan borough council, for the sale of council land, under section 123 of the Local Government Act 1972; and how many of these were approved, rejected or withdrawn.

Mr. Yeo: Since 1980, Walsall metropolitan borough council has applied twice to the Secretary of State for his consent under section 123(2) of the Local Government Act 1972 to dispose of land at less than the best consideration that can reasonably be obtained. Both applications were in 1985: one was withdrawn; and, in the second case, consent was granted for disposal of land for a community centre.

EC Environment Research Budget

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment has been made of the benefits accruing to the United Kingdom from the allocation to the European Commission's joint research centre at Ispra as a supplement to the EC's environment research budget 1990 to 1994.

Mr. Baldry: The activities of the joint research centre under the third framework programme on research and technological development (1990 to 1994), including those relating to environmental matters, will be the subject of a Council decision later in the year. The Government will assess the merits of the Commission's proposal when this becomes available and will make a full contribution to the decision-making process relating to it.

Derelict Land

Mr. Andy Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the annual amount of grant given to local authorities in Nottinghamshire and Sherwood constituency during the past 10 years for regeneration and cleaning up derelict land.

Mr. Yeo: Records of derelict land grant payments to local authorities in Nottinghamshire and the Sherwood constituency are not available for the full period covered by the question. However, the expenditure incurred by those authorities on derelict land grant-approved schemes in the same period was as follows:

Derelict land grant: Nottinghamshire and the Sherwood constituency

Local Government Finance

Mr. Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has of the number of domestic heriditaments in the London borough of Hackney in which the rates payable in 1989-90 were less than £720.

Mr. Key: No information is available centrally on the number of domestic hereditaments in the London borough of Hackney in which the rates payable in 1989-90 were less than £720.

Street Lighting

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will include a provision specifically for street lighting in the urban programme.

Mr. Key: Urban programme resources are not allocated to particular project types. It is for each local authority to decide whether it wishes to include projects involving street lighting improvements in its individual programme. However, the recently published guidance for urban programmes for 1992-93 indicates that UP resources may be used to good effect to support lighting schemes in residential areas.

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the relationship between the quality of urban living and the effectiveness of street lighting.

Mr. Key: Our action for cities objectives acknowledge the relationship between the quality of life in inner cities and reducing crime in these areas. Current research commissioned and being carried out by the Home Office is assessing the effect of improved street lighting on crime and the fear of crime. Additionally, this Department is currently undertaking a review of known research and information about a wide range of housing-related crime prevention measures. This includes a more detailed analysis of the effects of street lighting improvements on the incidence of robbery and autocrime in inner urban areas.

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will include an assessment of the energy efficiency savings of new public street lighting when considering applications under the inner area programme.

Mr. Key: Applications for urban programme funding are considered on their merits in the light of the policy framework set out in annual programme guidance. Projects will only be approved for funding which have direct benefits for those who live and work in inner city areas.

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will include an assessment of the impact of improved street lighting on the reduction of the fear of crime and actual crime when considering bids under the inner area programme.

Mr. Key: Applications for urban programme funding are considered on their merits in the light of the policy framework set out in annual programme guidance. Projects will only be approved for funding which have direct benefits for those who live and work in inner city areas. The Home Office are currently considering the results of research undertaken by the university of Southampton to assess the impact of improved street lighting on crime and the fear of crime in the London borough of Wandsworth. In addition, they are monitoring the link between lighting improvements and crime in four other urban programme areas in England.

Guidance Notes

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those companies which have been contracted to work for Her Majesty's inspectors of pollution on the preparation of guidance notes for implementation of part I of the Environmental Protection Act 1990.

Mr. Trippier: No companies have been specifically contracted to work on the production of guidance notes. However, the following companies have been contracted to undertake research which will be of use in the preparation of the notes:

DTI Warren Spring Laboratory
UKAEA
Cremer & Warner Ltd
Clayton Environmental Consultants
Ove Arup & Partners

Badgers

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice he has given to planning authorities concerning the conservation of badger setts during the consideration of planning applications.

Mr. Trippier: Advice to planning authorities on all aspects of nature conservation is contained in DOE circular 27/87, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has concerning the number of badgers and the current number of active badger setts in England; how many such setts have been destroyed during the last three years; and for what reasons.

Mr. Trippier: The Nature Conservancy Council has recently published a book entitled "The History, Distribution, Status, and Habitat Requirements of the Badger in Britain" which gives these figures for England, as well as for Scotland and Wales. A copy of this book is in the Library.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the number of sites of special scientific interest which were originally notified under the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949 and the number awaiting re-notification under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981.

Mr. Trippier: The numbers are 4,026 and 119 respectively.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what assessment he has made of the impact of the Leybucht Bay judgment of the European Court of Justice on 28 February on the economic and recreational development proposals affecting sites of special scientific interest in the United Kingdom;

(2) what consultations he has had with the chairman of the Nature Conservancy Council regarding the Leybucht Bay judgment in the European Court of Justice; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: An official English translation of the judgment is not yet available. Careful consideration will be given to its implications in due course. No consultations have taken place with the chairman of NCC regarding the judgment.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the number of sites of special scientific interest which have been damaged by operations granted planning permission in each of the last three years.

Mr. Trippier: This information is set out in the NCC's annual reports, copies of which are in the Library.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total number of staff who were employed by the Nature Conservancy Council on a contract basis since 1981 in order to assist with the re-notification of sites of special scientific interest.

Mr. Trippier: The information is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Game Birds

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to secure the future survival and status of the red grouse and other game birds in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Trippier: The Nature Conservancy Council undertakes research into the populations of all game birds on an annual basis. In addition, they are involved in several studies relating to the survival of the red grouse and other game bird species, and to the effective management of their habitats. The results of the studies will be made available to the Department.

Blackpool Beach

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether European Court action against the United Kingdom over Blackpool beach is still active.

Mr. Trippier: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) on 13 February, Official Report, columns 471-72.

London Zoo

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he intends to increase the financial reserves available to London Zoo; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: No. I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Countryside to the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells) on 7 February, Official Report, columns 223-24.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about communications and discussions between his Department and London zoo about the zoo's future.

Sir George Young: No. The future of London zoo is a matter for the Zoological Society of London.

Business Rates

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will explain how parish councils receive income from the unified business rates; if he will publish the formula; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: Under the new system of local government finance, business rates are paid into the national non-domestic rates pool and redistributed on the basis of adult population. Together with revenue support grant, special grants and community charges, the amounts of business rates received from the pool are paid into charging authorities' collection funds, out of which are met precepts and the charging authorities' own demands for revenue. To the extent that the precept of a parish and the demand of the charging authority on its collection fund are together equal to or less than the charging authority's standard spending assessment (SSA) per head, that expenditure is met in part from redistributed business rates. Spending above SSA is met entirely from community charges.

Leeds Development Corporation

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much of the Leeds development corporation budget has been spent in every year since its establishment in (1) west Leeds, (2) south Leeds and (3) Leeds central (a) in total and (b) broken down into (i) grants to existing employees, (ii) assistance with relocation, (iii) development of land, (iv) development of property, (v) environmental improvements, (vi) administration, (vii) publicity, (viii) job creation at 1991 prices and (ix) other.

Mr. Key: Information is not available in this form. Urban development corporations produce annual reports of their activities and copies of these are placed in the House of Commons Library. The hon. Member may also wish to speak to the chairman of the Leeds development corporation.

Dereliction

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what sum will be provided from central funds to assist the clearance of dereliction in 1991-92.

Mr. Yeo: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning on 7 February 1991 to my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell), Official Report, column 226. Further resources for the clearance of dereliction will be available through city grant, but it is not possible accurately to identify the proportion devoted to the reclamation of derelict land. It is estimated that £23 million will be spent under the urban programme on derelict and vacant land improvement and £48 million is earmarked to be spent in the urban development corporations on land reclamation and site preparation.

Water Research Centre

Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has reviewed the arrangements by which copies of reports produced by the Water Research Centre for his Department are placed in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: In an answer given to the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) on 16 February 1984, an undertaking was given to place in the Library of the House copies of reports of studies commissioned by the Department from the Water Research Centre (WRC). The usefulness of this arrangement was to be reviewed.

A review rather later than envisaged discloses that there does not seen to be sufficient interest shown in the Water Research Centre's reports to warrant the continuation of this special arrangement. In addition the Water Research Centre has since become a private company and it would not be equitable for their reports to be treated differently from those of their competitors.

For these reasons, I propose to terminate this arrangement and I have today written to the hon. Member accordingly.

Effluent Discharges

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress the National Rivers Authority has made towards introducing a scheme of charges for consents to discharge effluent to water.

Mr. Baldry: The National Rivers Authority introduced charges for applications for discharge consents from 1 October last year. It has now put forward proposals for annual charges to be levied on consent holders from 1 July this year. Copies of the proposals have been placed in the Library. Interested parties have until 30 April to comment on the proposals, which can be put into effect only if approved by my right hon. Friend.

Rural Housing

Mr. Patrick Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will announce the allocation of resources to local authorities under his Department's rural housing programme for 1991-92.

Sir George Young: Local authorities which have been successful in bidding for resources under my Department's rural housing programme for 1991-92 are being informed today.

The response from authorities has been excellent, and the £50 million of supplementary credit approvals are being targeted on those local authorities in rural areas with the greatest need for low-cost rented housing. All the schemes will be undertaken by housing associations, and this programme will complement the Housing Corporation's own programmes for shared ownership and rented housing in rural areas.

The allocations which I am announcing today should result in the creation of 1,422 new housing units in 1991-92, from 187 schemes in 119 local authorities.

A schedule of allocations has been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

European Political Union

Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals the United Kingdom will be putting forward to the inter-governmental conference on European political union for strengthening the environmental dimension of European Community policy.

Mr. Heseltine: The United Kingdom has made two proposals designed to strengthen the link between the Community's environmental policy and its other policies. First, we have proposed an amendment to article 2 of the treaty of Rome which sets out the Community's fundamental objectives. Those objectives derive from an era when environmental considerations were not seen as a constraint on economic activity, and currently take no account of the subsequent development of EC environmental policy. We have therefore proposed adding a new objective of "promoting throughout the Community sustainable growth which respects the environment."

Secondly, we have called for an agreement that in future new proposals for Community legislation or action, in whatever field, should include a statement on the environmental effects of the proposed measures. This is intended to ensure that environmental requirements and implications are taken properly into account in the formulation of all areas of Community policy.

In our White Paper "This Common Inheritance" we stressed the need to improve Community environment policies. We believe these ideas would be of important practical value in ensuring that different areas of Community policy do not act in conflict, and that environmental considerations are given the priority they require.

Woodlands (Disposal)

Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his present policy in respect of the disposal of woodlands by the Forestry Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have been asked to reply.

Our policy on the disposal of Forestry Commission woodlands was set out by my right hon. and learned Friend the then Secretary of State for Scotland on 16 June 1989, Official Report, columns 544-45.

PRIME MINISTER

The Gulf

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister if Her Majesty's Government have made any assessment of the number of (a) Iraqi military, (b) Kuwaitis, (c) Palestinians and (d) other nationals who were killed by Allied forces on the Kuwait to Basra road in the retreating convoy before a ceasefire was declared.

The Prime Minister: Allied forces had instructions to attack retreating Iraqi units which could continue to pose a threat. We have no information on casualties sustained in these attacks.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister when he expects all prisoners of war held in (a) Iraq and (b) the United Kingdom to be released.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 5 March 1991]: Further coalition prisoners of war were handed over to the International Committee of the Red Cross yesterday and we hope that all Kuwaiti and third-country nationals will be released as soon as possible. Arrangements are being made with the International Committee of the Red Cross for those Iraqis being held in the United Kingdom to be released as soon as possible.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister what consideration Her Majesty's Government gave to securing the release of prisoners of war before agreeing to a ceasefire in the Gulf conflict.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 5 March 1991]: Allied offensive operations in the Gulf are currently suspended. The release of all prisoners of war remains a top priority before a formal ceasefire is declared. In adopting resolution 686, the United Nations Security Council has called on Iraq immediately to arrange access to and release of all prisoners of war and detainees, under the auspices of the International Committee of the Red Cross.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for 7 March.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Missile Technology Control Regime

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his statement on the commitment to be sought from Iraq to destroy its ballistic missiles and weapons of mass destruction, Official Report, 28 February, column 1117, if he will make available to the United Nations appropriate resources and technical expertise to permit the supervision to which he refers.

The Prime Minister: We are considering what type of international supervision would be necessary for the destruction of such weapons. We would be willing to consider making available appropriate resources and technical expertise if necessary.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister if, pursuant to his statement of 28 February, Official Report, column 1117, he will make it his policy to give consideration to inviting Iraq to join the missile technology control regime.

The Prime Minister: We have no plans to do so.

Immigrant Workers, Kuwait

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister what steps Her Majesty's Government intend to take to alleviate economic hardship of immigrant workers in Kuwait made redundant by the Gulf war.

The Prime Minister: British nationals returning to the United Kingdom from Kuwait after the Iraqi invasion were eligible to receive travel grants and loans, and where appropriate, other assistance from the Department of Social Security. Assistance for those returning to their homes in other countries is a matter for their own Governments.

Gulf Casualties

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Prime Minister if he will appoint a Minister, with special responsibility for co-ordinating the provision of essentials services to service personnel disabled in the Gulf including counselling, psychiatric care, rehabilitation, social services, jobs and adapted housing.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 5 March 1991]: No. There are well-established arrangements for providing advice and assistance to personnel disabled in the course of their military service.

Economic and Political Union

Mr. Cash: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on progress on the intergovernmental conferences on (a) economic and monetary union and (b) political union; and if he will make it his policy to place the submissions made by each member state or the European Commission on (a) and (b) in the Library within one week of their being available to Her Majesty's Government.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 6 March 1991]: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer reported to the House on 1 March on progress in the EMU intergovernmental conference, and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary reported to the House yesterday on the progress in the political union intergovernmental conference. The proceedings and documents of these conferences are confidential as was the case for the intergovernmental conference that resulted in the Single European Act.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what checks are made to ensure that car dealers who advertise special discounts to people in receipt of mobility allowance grant these discounts in addition to those generally available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh: No official checks are made by the Department with regard to the advertising of special discounts to people in receipt of a mobility allowance.

If an advertisement is suspected of being misleading under part III of the Consumer Protection Act 1987, which deals with misleading price indications, it should be referred to the local trading standards department.

In addition, the Advertising Standards Authority, which regulates advertising in the United Kingdom for the print, cinema, poster and direct mail media, stipulates in its code of practice that all advertisements should be legal, decent, honest and truthful. Any complaint against an advertiser may also be brought to the attention of the ASA.

Regional Development

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has yet considered the business plans of the English regional development organisations; and what level of financial support he proposes for 1991-92.

Mr. Leigh: I have studied the current performance and future plans of the five English regional development organisations. I am pleased to say that they continue to make a significant contribution to the overall success of the United Kingdom in attracting inward investment. In recognition of this, I have today offered the five English regional development organisations the full allocation of £4·5 million of grant aid for their inward investment promotion activities for 1991-92, £500,000 more than in 1990-91. This increase in funding, added to the extra £1 million allocated last year, is to enable the United Kingdom to remain competitive in promoting its locational advantages in the face of competition from the rest of Europe for mobile inward investment in the single European market. I have allocated the grant aid as follows:

RDO	1991-92 Grant £'000	Per cent. share of total grant
Northern Development Company (NDC)	1,330	29·5
INWARD Ltd. (in the North West)	990	22
Yorkshire and Humberside Development Association	970	21·5
West Midlands Development Agency (WMDA)	670	15
Devon and Cornwall Development Bureau (DCDB)	540	12

Grant is offered on an annual basis according to past performance and ability to absorb additional funding effectively, and for an agreed programme of future activities, with proper regard to value for money. It is Government policy to encourage direct inward investment to the United Kingdom because it contributes significantly to economic growth. Inward investment brings benefits to the country as a whole and more specifically to the assisted areas.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proportion of those employed in his Department are disabled.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 6 March 1991]: The proportion of the Department's staff who are known to be disabled is 1·5 per cent. This figure includes both registered and unregistered disabled officers.

TRANSPORT

British Rail

Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total amount of public money spent on British Rail in the period 1961 to 1990.

Mr. Freeman: The total of external finance required by British Rail, from 1976-77 to 1990-91 inclusive, was some £11·2 billion in cash, equivalent to around £18·8 billion in current prices. There are no readily available figures for earlier years which cover Government grants and net borrowing.

Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the British Rail establishments which have been closed since 1961 broken down by (a) size of establishment and (b) number of employees.

Mr. Freeman: This information is not held by the Department and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Roads Expenditure

Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total amount of public money spent on (a) roads and (b) motorways from 1961 to the present date.

Mr. Chope: The total amount spent on all public roads in England from 1961-62 to 1989-90 was £39 billion—£96 billion at 1989-90 prices. It is not possible, except at disproportionate cost, to produce a comparable figure for motorways.

Motorways

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he has to remove litter from and clean up the motorways.

Mr. Chope: We are reviewing current practices to ensure that the standards set out in the code of practice for litter and refuse are achieved and that the duties placed on the Department of Transport by the Environmental Protection Act 1990 are fully discharged.

BR, Swinton

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has received any proposals from BR to close the railway station at Swinton near Rotherham; and if he will meet the chairman of British Rail to discuss means of securing its future.

Mr. McLoughlin: No proposals have been received concerning Swinton. My right hon. and learned Friend has regular meetings with the chairman of BR.

A1-M1 Link

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport by what date he expects the A1-M1 link road to be completed, and what type of road he considers to be appropriate in this case.

Mr. Chope: I understand that the hon. Member is referring to the A635 Dearne towns link road proposed by Barnsley metropolitan borough council. I have recently made resources available which will enable the council to begin construction of one phase of this scheme in September 1991. The council hopes to complete the scheme by 1996 and progress would depend on the whole scheme being accepted for transport supplementary grant. The council has proposed that the road should be a 7·3 m single carriageway with local widenings at junctions and crawler lanes.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he next expects to meet his French counterpart to discuss freight transport facilities from the United Kingdom to the continent through the channel tunnel.

Mr. Freeman: I plan to have discussions with the French Ministry in April.

War Risk Re-insurance

Mr. Malins: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the war risk re-insurance he has been providing for British aircraft under the Marine and Aviation (War Risks) Act 1952.

Mr. Rifkind: Copies of agreements concluded under section 1 of the Marine and Aviation (War Risks) Act 1952, covering aircraft owned by British Airways plc and Magec Aviation Ltd. have been laid before each House of Parliament. The agreement in respect of British Airways facilitated the maintenance of scheduled flights to the Gulf area before and during the recent hostilities. With the improvement in the situation in the Gulf, it is no longer necessary for the Government to reinsure aircraft, and the two agreements were accordingly terminated on 5 March. No claims have arisen in respect of aircraft reinsured.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

The Gulf

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what additional costs were incurred by the United Kingdom missions to the United Nations in (a) New York and (b) Geneva, since 2 August as a result of the invasion and liberation of Kuwait; and what consideration has been given to increasing the resources available to United Kingdom diplomatic missions to the United Nations.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Increases in local costs at the two posts have been offset by savings made elsewhere in their local budgets. Additional staff have been provided on a temporary basis to the missions to help them deal with short-term increases in work load, and we have improved security and communications facilities where necessary.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to offer economic assistance to the families of men from the Indian sub-continent killed accidentally by allied military activity in the Gulf war, where evidence exists that the dead civilians were the sole economic provider for the families in Kuwait or the sub-continent.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No, although we naturally regret all civilian casualties resulting from the recent hostilities in the Gulf. Security Council resolution 674, which has now been accepted by the Government of Iraq, reminded Iraq of its liability for any loss, damage or injury ensuing in regard to Kuwait and third states and their nationals as a result of its invasion and illegal occupation of Kuwait.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what initiatives the United Kingdom intends to take at the United Nations arising from the Gulf war.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We are working to ensure the restoration of international peace and security in the area in keeping with the relevant Security Council resolutions.

Arms Sales

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list (a) all resolutions initiated by the United Kingdom, (b) all resolutions supported by the United Kingdom and (c) all resolutions put forward at the General Assembly of the United Nations since 1979, on the restriction or prohibition of arms sales and military equipment; and if he will indicate, where applicable, the reasons why the United Kingdom did not support resolutions on arms sales.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: (a) No resolutions on the restrictions or prohibition of arms sales have been initiated by the United Kingdom since 1979.

(b) The United Kingdom has voted in favour of:

(i) UNGA 43 first committee resolution 43/751 of 7 December 1988 entitled "International Arms Transfers" which the United Kingdom also co-sponsored.

(ii) UNGA 44 first committee resolution 44/116N of 15 December 1989 entitled "International Arms Transfers".

(iii) UNGA 45 first committee decision 45/415 of 4 December 1990 entitled "International Arms Transfers".

(iv) The three resolutions above are all those brought to a vote at the United Nations General Assembly on the restriction or prohibition of arms sales since 1979.

Non-proliferation Treaty

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, pursuant to his answer on Iraqi nuclear capability to the hon. Member for Bradford, South, (Mr. Cryer) Official Report, 28 February, column 582, he will set out the occasions on which Her Majesty's Government made representations to (a) the Iraqi Government, (b) the United Nations and (c) the board of governors of the International Atomic Energy Agency concerning Iraqi violations of its non-proliferation treaty commitments.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have made clear our concern about possible violations by non-nuclear weapon states of their non-proliferation treaty commitments.

Somalia

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals he has for improving relations with the Government and people of Somalia.

Mrs. Chalker: There is at present no established nationwide Government in Somalia, but Britain's record there is a good one. We took a lead in denouncing human rights violations by the previous regime and have given refuge to large numbers of Somalis.

Bananas

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what agreement Britain has to buy Windward Island bananas.

Mr. Curry: I have been asked to reply.

The United Kingdom has a long-standing commitment reflected in protocols of successive Lomé conventions to give preferential access to the United Kingdom banana market for our traditional African, Caribbean and Pacific suppliers, which include the Windward Islands.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Interest Rates

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average level of real interest rates, mimimum lending rate, in each year since 1978.

Mr. Maples: There is no agreed definition of the real interest rate, nor is mimimum lending rate any longer in continuous use. The table shows the annual average of the three-month interbank rate since 1978 and the average three-month interbank rate deflated by the 12-month all-items retail price index for each year.

	Average three-month interbank rate	'Real' interest rate
1978	9·24	+0·9
1979	13·67	+0·2
1980	16·62	−1·0
1981	13·92	+1·8
1982	12·28	+3·4
1983	10·13	+5·3
1984	9·95	+4·7
1985	12·24	+5·8
1986	10·95	+7·3
1987	9·70	+5·3
1988	10·31	+5·2
1989	13·89	+5·6
1990	14·77	+4·8

Labour Statistics

202. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average number of employees per establishment in industrial firms in the United Kingdom in (a) 1990, (b) 1980, (c) 1970 and (d) 1961.

Mr. Maples: Changes in the definition of the establishment and in the coverage of statistical registers inhibit valid long-term comparisons. The table provides the available information from the censuses of production.

	Manufacturing industry[2]
	Employees per establishment[1]
1963	89·5
1970	91·4
1980	59·7

	Employees per establishment[1]
1983	49·6
[3]1984	37·2
1988	33·4

Note: A comparison of the above series with alternative information on larger manufacturing sites corroborates the significant fall in employees per unit.

[1] Employment includes both employees and working proprietors, and the self employed.

[2] Figures for 1988 and 1980 cover manufacturing industry as defined by Divisions 2-4 of the 1980 Standard Industrial Classification. Figures for 1970 cover manufacturing industry as defined by Orders III-XIX of the 1968 Standard Industrial Classification. Figures for 1963 cover manufacturing industry as defined by Orders III-XIX of the 1958 Standard Industrial Classification. There have been minor changes in the coverage of the census with the adoption of each new Standard Industrial Classification.

[3] Figures for 1984 based upon new register with more complete coverage of smaller businesses.

The Gulf

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, pursuant to his answer to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) of 26 February, Official Report, column 442, he is in a position to update his estimates of the costs of Britain's contribution to the Gulf war in the light of the cessation of hostilities; and if he has any information to add about assistance promised from other countries towards the meeting of Britain's costs.

Mr. Mellor: At this stage I have nothing further to add to the information given in my right hon. Friend's reply of 26 February to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), and mine to the hon. Members for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) and for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) on 4 March.

Official Visits

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many overseas visits were made in an official capacity in 1990 by (a) the Chancellor, (b) the Chief Secretary, (c) the Financial Secretary, (d) the Paymaster General and (e) the Economic Secretary including, in each case, those visits made in connection with European Community matters.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Following is the information requested for the calendar year 1990:

(a) Twenty, of which 16 were related to European Community matters;
(b) Nil;
(c) Thirteen, of which 12 were related to European Community matters;
(d) and (e) Five and three respectively, all of which were related to European Community matters.

Beneficial Loans

Dr. Bray: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what assumed rate of interest employees of banks and building societies who are in receipt of beneficial loans are currently paying tax on the difference between the rate of interest on beneficial loans and that rate; and what considerations are taken into account in deciding against which rate to assess this benefit.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 6 March 1991]: The taxable benefit, if any, of a loan made by an employer to an employee is determined using the "official rate" of interest which is 14·5 per cent. from 6 March 1991. The statutory formula which governs the "official rate" of interest is contained in Treasury regulations and is, broadly, the average base rate of six named banks plus 1·5 per cent.

Manufacturing Investment

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give for each year since 1979 the level of investment in United Kingdom manufacturing industry expressed as a percentage of the amount required to cover depreciation of existing capital stock.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 6 March 1991]: Available estimates of gross fixed capital formation as a percentage of capital consumption for the manufacturing industries, including assets leased from the financial industries, are as follows:

	per cent.
1979	130
1980	111
1981	86
1982	84
1983	83
1984	97
1985	111
1986	103
1987	108
1988	118
1989	127

Estimates of capital consumption, and hence these percentages, must be interpreted with some caution. Capital consumption is not directly observable and so the estimates made are based on a series of assumptions.

Autumn Statement

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place in the Library the statistics supporting his chart number 2.10 in the autumn statement.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 1 March 1991]: The figures are as follows:

United Kingdom share of world trade in manufactures

	Volume per cent.	Value per cent.
1970	9·3	9·1
1971	9·4	9·3
1972	8·4	8·2
1973	8·6	8·7
1974	8·3	7·4
1975	8·3	7·6
1976	8·1	7·1
1977	8·2	7·5
1978	7·6	7·3
1979	7·1	7·4
1980	7·0	8·0
1981	6·3	7·0
1982	6·5	6·8
1983	6·1	6·2

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Sheep

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many outbreaks of sheep scab have been confirmed this year to date; and what was the corresponding figure for 1990 and 1989.

Mr. Maclean: There have been 26 confirmed outbreaks of sheep scab so far this year, compared with 20 in 1990 and 16 in 1989.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from the Association of County Councils concerning the enforcement of compulsory sheep dipping; and what is his estimate of the number of farmers who have not complied with the latest regulations.

Mr. Maclean: Comments have been received from some county councils which show that there have been enforcement difficulties, but no formal representations have been made by the Association of County Councils. The review of the 1990 dip is not yet complete and until the various responses have been analysed it is not possible to assess the level of compliance.

Badgers

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many live tests for bovine tuberculosis in badgers have now been conducted; what were the results of such tests; how long the current pilot study will continue; if any non-tested badgers have been killed during the duration of the tests; and if he will make a statement on his preliminary findings of the study.

Mr. Maclean: Field trials on the live test have only just started, having been delayed by bad weather. The trial is expected to last 12 months. Not all badger removal operations will be included and therefore some badgers killed will not have been tested.

Harvest Returns

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the size of the United Kingdom harvest in (a) tonnes and (b) value, at actual and at 1990 prices in each year since 1979.

Mr. Curry: The size of the cereals harvest and the value of cereal sales off farms are shown below.

Year	Cereal harvest (000 tonnes)	Value of output (£ million)	Value of output at constant 1985 prices (£ million)
1979	17,416	1,184	1,302
1980	19,472	1,463	1,550
1981	19,621	1,693	1,649
1982	21,913	2,062	1,890
1983	21,307	1,996	1,671
1984	26,602	2,420	2,321
1985	22,466	2,281	2,281
1986	24,489	2,184	2,171
1987	21,675	2,038	2,042
1988	21,028	1,881	1,979
1989	22,685	2,061	2,145
[1]1990	22,533	2,062	2,068

[1] Forecast.

It should be noted that the size of the harvest does not correspond exactly to the value of output—sales off farms—even when this is measured at constant prices. This is partly because some of the harvest is used on farms for animal feed and because some of each year's harvest is sold off farms in the next calendar year. Valuations at constant 1985 prices have been used in the third column since these are more readily available and comparable with other published figures, than valuations at 1990 prices.

Bananas

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the quantities and cost of bananas imported from the Windward Islands each year since 1980.

Mr. Curry: The quantities and cost of bananas imported from the Windward Islands each year since 1980 are as follows:

	Tonnes	Value (£)
1980	69,909	20,249,027
1981	103,389	32,849,653
1982	104,287	37,758,070
1983	114,932	48,006,383
1984	130,091	58,712,038
1985	163,168	85,285,560

1987	183,456	97,820,191
1988	231,338	104,866,452
1989	218,222	100,833,517

ENERGY

Hydro-electric Generators

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will undertake an efficiency and effectiveness survey of the Office of Electricity Regulation, the Non-Fossil Fuel Purchasing Agency Ltd. and Her Majesty's Government in encouraging small and medium hydro-electric generators.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The non-fossil fuel obligation has proved an effective vehicle for stimulating a variety of renewables technologies. Twenty-six hydro-electric projects, with a declared net capacity of 12 MW, contracted with the regional electricity companies under the 1990 renewables order. My right hon. Friend has announced that he has it in mind to introduce a reserved tranche for hydro projects under the 1991 renewables order. In these circumstances, I do not consider an efficiency and effectiveness survey of the kind proposed by the hon. Member to be necessary.

Electricity

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what assessment he has made of the effect on competition in the electricity generation market of the increase in bulk gas prices for electricity generating purposes announced by British Gas on 1 March.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: It is too early to say what the implications of the new bulk gas prices may be for competition in the electricity generation market in the longer term.

THE ARTS

Arts Council

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Minister for the Arts when he plans to meet the chair of the Welsh Arts Council to discuss the funding of the Association of Artists and Designers in Wales.

Mr. Renton: I have no plans to do so, as this is very much a matter for the Welsh Arts Council to determine in the light of its artistic policies and priorities.

HEALTH

Waiting Lists, Leicester

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give the current waiting list for each specialty in Leicester health authority and the number of people who have waited (a) for over one year and (b) for more than two years.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The latest available information, at 31 March 1990, is given in the table. It is the time people wait which is important, not total numbers on the list. The number of patients waiting over one year for in-patient treatment in Leicester health authority has fallen by 61 per cent. since 1979 and by 14 per cent. in the 12 months to March 1990. In addition, the number of in-patients treated in Leicester in 1989-90 has increased by 49 per cent. since 1979.

Mental Health Services

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the latest available figures of cost per patient per week of in-patients at each mental handicap and mental illness hospital in the Northern region.

Mr. Dorrell: As a result of the implementation of the recommendations of the steering group on national health services information—the Korner committee—the costing information submitted by authorities from 1987-88 is no longer compiled on the basis of type of hospital but focuses on district-based treatment costs by specialty/specialty groups within all hospitals.

Information relating to the Northern region for the financial year 1988-89, the latest currently available, is shown in the table.

Average specialty costs per patient day—patients using a bed 1988-89

District	Mental handicap £ (cash)	Other psychiatric specialties[1] £ (cash)

South Tyneside	25·85	27·47
Sunderland	64·42	28·75

[1] Includes, where applicable, mental illness, child and adolescent psychiatry, forensic psychiatry, psychotherapy and old-age psychiatry.

Notes:

1. The figures may include treatments provided both to in-patients and day cases (those who occupy a bed for at least a period of time but do not stay overnight) under the recommended Korner definition "patients using a bed".
2. The figures cover direct treatment costs only. Expenditure incurred on general services, overheads and capital is excluded.

Liverpool AHA

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many operations and operating sessions were cancelled during 1990 by Liverpool area health authority; how many hospital beds are available (a) currently and (b) in 1980; and how many hospitals are open (i) currently and (ii) in 1980.

Mr. Dorrell: We do not collect centrally information about the number of cancelled operations. In the year ending March 1990, 582—4 per cent. of the total—scheduled theatre sessions were cancelled in the Liverpool health authority. These sessions may have been taken up by other consultant specialties.

Details of the number of beds available and the number of hospitals open are given in the table.

	1980	1989-90
Number of available beds	5,443	2,990
Number of hospitals	18	15
Number of day cases	15,272	18,900

Due to restructuring of the Health Service in 1981, information prior to 1982 is not directly comparable with subsequent years.

Health Authorities (Capital Valuations)

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the dates and amounts of the latest capital valuation for each district health authority and national health service trust in England and Wales.

Mr. Dorrell: The latest capital valuation of land and buildings occupied by district health authorities in England and Wales was carried out as at 31 December 1989. A concurrent exercise was carried out in Scotland and Northern Ireland.

The totals of worth for existing use were:

England	23,256,449,000
Wales	1,089,041,000

These figures have been provided by the chief valuer, Inland Revenue, from centrally held returns. A summary by regions and districts is expected to be placed in the Library by 15 March 1991 and will include figures for Scotland.

At the date of this valuation (December 1989) there were no national health service trusts and property which would in due course be vested in NHSTs was not separately identified. It is included in the figures for district health authorities.

Prescriptions

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many domiciliary deliveries of prescriptions are made annually on average by pharmacists in the United Kingdom; and what arrangements exist to compensate pharmacists for these additional service costs and to encourage domiciliary deliveries of prescriptions to the elderly and disabled when necessary.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information requested is not available. Only those providing a domiciliary oxygen service are specifically remunerated for the service.

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will take steps to allow doctors to indicate on prescription forms that the pharmacist can supply a therapeutically equivalent product in place of a brand name product.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We encourage general practitioners to prescribe drugs by their generic name because it is good professional practice and because of the opportunities for savings such prescribing creates. Many hospitals already routinely supply generic products against prescriptions.

Census

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information will be available to the public from the 1991 census, additional to that available to the public from the 1981 census.

Mr. Dorrell: Results from the 1991 census, like those from the 1981 census, will be available as published statistical reports to be laid before Parliament and as abstracts of statistical information supplied on request, as authorised under section 4 of the Census Act 1920.

The results will include statistical information from new questions on ethnic group, limiting long-term illness, term-time address of students and schoolchildren, hours worked weekly, availability of central heating and a count of dwellings by geographical area and type. Statistical information will be available, for the first time in England and Wales, for geographical areas specified as groups of postcodes.

Two new types of abstract are in preparation. The Registrars-General have agreed in principle to supply the Economic and Social Research Council with two samples of anonymised records from the 1991 census, as announced in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler), on 19 July 1990, column 707. The Office of Population Censuses and Surveys is also planning to produce a directory showing which postcodes are located in each census enumeration district.

All census output will be designed to guard against disclosing information about identifiable people or households. Information on the plans for the production of reports and abstracts is given in census newsletters, copies of which are in the Library. Further details will be available in prospectuses issued by OPCS.

Cervical Smear Tests

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will identify those district health authorities which contract out the processing of cervical smear tests to private laboratories; and the number of tests involved for each district;

(2) if he will give the average cost of processing each cervical smear test within the National Health Service; and the average cost for the smear test contracted out to laboratories outside the National Health Service.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not held centrally.

Hospitals, Bradford

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on how many days in January and February hospitals within the Bradford hospitals trust were refusing to admit patients requiring cold surgery; on whose authority or instructions these decisions were taken; are those patients requiring non-emergency, long-stay operations being admitted now; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: Until 1 April 1991, the hospitals in the Bradford hospitals National Health Service trust are under health authority management. Bradford health authority was required as part of contingency plans for the Gulf war to make beds available in the event of casualties. Throughout this period short-stay cases were admitted and throughput went up. Long-stay patients are now being admitted as usual for treatment.

Retired People

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what were the number of persons over retirement age in each of the last 10 years; and what were the number of (a) local authority care home places, (b) private residential home places and (c) private nursing home places in each of those years.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The number of persons aged 65 or over in each of the years 1979-89, together with the numbers of places in local authority, voluntary and private residential accommodation catering primarily for elderly people are set out in the following table. The table also shows the number of independent sector nursing beds for elderly patients for the years 1982-89.

Thousands

Year	Population aged 65 or more[2]	Residential care places[3]			Independent sector nursing beds[4]
		Local authority	Voluntary	Private

1989	7,522·6	107·4	28·6	134·6	73·6

Note: All figures are rounded to one decimal place.

[1] Figures for places in residential care from 1985 are for elderly people only. Earlier years include places for younger physically handicaped.
[2] Mid-year OPCS figures.
[3] Figures are for year-ending 31 March.
[4] The numbers of beds in private hospitals and clinics and private and voluntary nursing homes are not collected separately. Figures are for calendar year ending up till 31 December 1986, and for year-ending 31 March from 1987-88. Figures before 1982 are not available.

Christie Hospital, Manchester

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the names of the board of directors for the Christie hospital trust in south Manchester.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Trust boards are made up of equal numbers of executive and non-executive directors and a chairman. Non-executive directors are chosen for the personal contribution they can make to the effective management of the trust. Two are drawn from the local community and the remainder appointed by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. Executive directors include the chief executive, director of finance and, in the majority of cases, a medical and nursing director. Following is a list of the chairman and non-executive membership for the Christie hospital national health service trust:

Sir John Page
Professor Roger Green
Mrs. Rayna Dean
Sir Richard Baker-Wilbraham
Mrs. June Rosen
Mr. Robert Shepherd

Social Services Inspectorate

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the reasons for the decision to reduce the salary level of the post of head of his social services inspectorate.

Mr. Dorrell: The chief inspector, social services inspectorate, post was advertised recently at a salary level up to the top of the grade 3 pay scale with the possibility of a higher amount for an exceptionally well qualified candidate. The new grade reflects the findings of an internal review of the Department's senior posts which included an examination of the duties of the chief inspector post. It does not affect in any way the postholder's reporting arrangements within the Department or his—or her—access to Ministers.

Salmonella

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to introduce new measures to combat the incidence of salmonellosis.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my right hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food gave my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) on 14 January, columns 392-4.

The Chief Medical Officer has also issued public advice that everybody should avoid eating raw eggs or uncooked dishes made from them, and that vulnerable groups should cook eggs until the white and yolk are solid. Copies of the advice are in the Library.

Nursing Homes

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice is given by his Department to health authorities with regard to the maximum number of beds that may be permitted in a nursing home.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It is a statutory requirement that each nursing home patient has adequate accommodation and space. The maximum number of beds in any one home is constrained by the needs of the residents. Guidance issued by the National Association of Health Authorities and Trusts and endorsed by the Department provides that all long-stay patients should enjoy a lifestyle as non-institutional as possible, and sets out certain minimum standards for bedroom, sitting or day room areas.

Abortion

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he is yet in a position to announce the date for the implementation of section 37 of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The changes to the Abortion Act 1967 contained in section 37 of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 will be implemented on 1 April 1991. The Secretary of State for Health has made an order, the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 (Commencement No. 2 and Transitional Provision) Order 1991, SI 480 C. 10, to bring into force section 37 of the Act and to make transitional provision for a period of one month, and laid before the House the Abortion Regulations 1991, SI 499. The Secretary of State for Scotland has simultaneously laid the Abortion (Scotland) Regulations 1991, SI 460 S. 41.

Copies are available in the Vote Office and Library.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Landfill Site, Carrickfergus

Mr Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the conditions of approval for the land fill site at Sullatober Mill, Marshalltown road, Carrickfergus have been complied with; what monitoring has taken place on site since approval was granted; whether the present condition of the site merits revocation of the licence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: The site has been monitored frequently since 1984, when planning permission was first granted. In the period between 1985 and 1987, three breaches were detected and remedied. No further breach was detected until March 1990 and it, too, was remedied. Two further breaches have been detected and enforcement action has commenced. The question of revocation of the site licence is one for consideration by Carrickfergus borough council.

Slatt Crossing Inquiry

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the inquiry into the railway accident at the Slatt crossing is to be resumed.

Mr. Needham: This is a matter for the inspector. I understand that he will make an announcement shortly.

Housing Developments

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what action he is taking in (a) the Antrim borough council area and (b) the Newtownabbey borough council area to tidy up and maintain green areas provided in private and public housing developments at the insistence of the Department of Environment planning service.

Mr. Hanley: It is not the practice of the Department of Environment for Northern Ireland, as planning authority, when granting planning permission for housing developments, to impose conditions requiring the provision of open space areas for public use. Where a developer provides open space at his own initiative the responsibility for maintenance would rest with him. He is normally advised to make maintenance arrangements with the local council. The Department of Environment for Northern Ireland therefore does not take action to tidy up areas such as this. The responsibility for maintaining any open space areas in public housing estates lies with the Northern Ireland Housing Executive.

Census Enumerators (Donaghadee)

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applications were received for the position of census enumerators in the Donaghadee district by the closing date of 22 February; how many appointments will be made for the Donaghadee district; and how many of these appointees were selected prior to the closing date for applications on 22 February.

Mr. Hanley: Eighty applications were received by the closing date of 22 February and 52 appointments will be made. Thirty-four appointments were made from the first phase of the recruitment campaign, which ran from 1 November to 14 December 1990. No appointments have yet been made from the second phase, which ran from 3 January to 22 February. Interviews are being held to fill the remaining 18 vacancies.

Departmental Policies (Environmental Implications)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what actions have been taken since the appointment of a Minister in his Department to consider the environmental implications of his Department's policies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 1 March 1991]: The Northern Ireland Departments, like all others, have been active in implementing and developing the commitments made in the Environment White Paper, "This Common Inheritance", since its publication in September 1990.

The Northern Ireland departmental report, published on 15 February, recorded progress with a wide range of initiatives, reflecting the White Paper's comprehensive review of policy affecting the environment. Additional resources have been secured substantially to extend water quality monitoring and to carry out estuarine studies in environmentally sensitive coastal waters; to extend smoke control areas; to accelerate the survey and declaration of areas of special scientific interest; and to expand the environment service of the Department of Environment for Northern Ireland. The report also records the Department of Agriculture's commitment to the implementation of the countryside management strategy, giving particular emphasis to the prevention of farm sourced pollution and the encouragement of environmentally sensitive farming. The Department of Economic Development has published a consultative paper on energy efficiency with a view to implementing an extensive programme of energy conservation measures outlined in that paper. The Department of Education is taking steps to ensure that environmental issues are given sufficient weight in the programmes of study for the compulsory subjects of the Northern Ireland curriculum.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Overseas Voters

3. Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on overseas registration of voters.

Mrs. Rumbold: Figures published on 13 February showed that 31,001 overseas electors were included in the draft electoral register for 1991-92. This figure does not include valid applications which were received too late for inclusion in the draft register. Final figures for the 1991-92 register, which will be higher, will be published in the summer.

Teenage Crime

15. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to reduce the amounts of crime carried out by teenagers.

Mr. John Patten: The Government are continuously developing their programmes to divert young people from crime. The Home Office safer cities programme includes schemes directed at reducing young people's involvement in criminal activity. Local activities for young people will be an important feature of the national crime prevention week to be held in April. We are also working with the Department of Education and Science who are considering measures to reduce truancy. However, some parents could do more to influence and control their children's behaviour, and the emphasis on parental responsibility in the Criminal Justice Bill will encourage them to do so.

Merseyside Police

16. Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from the chief constable for Merseyside on the present manning levels of the Merseyside police force.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The Merseyside police authority made an application for 49 additional police posts in 1991-92. On the advice of Her Majesty's chief inspector of constabulary, I have approved five extra police posts from 1 October 1991.

19. Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what will be the implications of the 1991-92 Merseyside police authority budget settlement on the police establishment.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The establishment of the Merseyside police, as I authorised, will not be affected by the police authority's budget settlement. It is for the authority to decide how many posts in the establishment should be filled.

Racial Attacks

17. Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action is being taken to reduce racially motivated attacks.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Racially motivated attacks are wholly unacceptable in a civilised society. The Government are urging the police and other agencies to tackle such attacks vigorously and has issued detailed guidance to those involved. Ethnic minority communities can have full confidence in the police's determination to prosecute the perpetrators of racial attacks.

Nottingham Police

18. Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what request he has received for funding to enable the Nottingham police force to be brought up to strength; and what response he has made.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Nottinghamshire police authority did not seek an increase in establishment for 1991-92 following the 26 posts which my right hon. Friend approved for 1990-91. At the end of December the strength of the Nottinghamshire constabulary was 2,342, which is only two short of the authorised establishment.

Shoplifting

20. Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many men and how many women have been acquitted of shoplifting charges during the last five years for which records are available.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested can be found in the relevant "Criminal Statistics for England and Wales, Supplementary Volumes I and II", copies of which are in the Library. Table 1.1A deals with magistrates courts and shows that in 1989 a total of 3,594 males and 1,788 females of all ages were either found not guilty or, for various reasons, the case was not proceeded with. Table 2.1A gives equivalent figures in the Crown court of 410 males and 235 females. I am arranging for the statistics for 1985-88 to be sent to the hon. and learned Member.

Police (Inner Cities)

21. Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will next meet the president of the Association of Chief Police Officers to discuss inner city areas.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. Friend meets chief officers of police on a regular basis to discuss a wide range of policing matters, but he has no present plans for a meeting with the president of the Association of Chief Police Officers to discuss inner-city areas.

Electorates

22. Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received about the size of constituency electorates in England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland.

Mrs. Rumbold: In the past 12 months, we have seen three letters on this subject from hon. Members. A question was asked in the House in January 1989.

Model Guns

23. Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received concerning the sale of model guns which are outside the Firearms Act.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: None recently.

Alcohol Licensing

24. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to bring forward the reform of the licensing system.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have no plans to introduce any further legislation on liquor licensing in England and Wales for the time being. I see a good case, in due course, for reviewing the liquor licensing laws as a whole with a view to its reform and modernisation.

Northumbria Police Force

25. Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the funding and establishment of the Northumbria police force.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The establishment of the Northumbria police is 3,552. Following an application for 87 additional police posts in 1991-92, my right hon. Friend has approved 26 with effect from 10 October 1991 provided that the police authority is prepared to meet its share of the cost of these posts.

Community Radio

26. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to extend community radio.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Since 1 January 1991 the development of all forms of independent local radio, including community radio, has been the responsibility of the new Radio Authority established under the Broadcasting Act 1990. I understand that the authority aims to issue licences for 20 to 30 new independent local radio stations each year.

Immigration

27. Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the implications of the 1992 programme for the national control of immigration and visitors; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Discussions on the movement of people within the Community after 1992 are continuing. We have made it clear that we intend to continue to exercise immigration controls at our frontiers.

Crime, Leicestershire

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department by what percentage reported crime has increased in Leicestershire since 1 January 1990.

Mr. John Patten: In the first nine months of 1990 recorded crime in Leicestershire increased by 32 per cent. over the corresponding period in 1989.

Police Budgets

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what provisions are made by the Home Office to reimburse local police forces for unbudgeted security operations or for exceptional investigations.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Home Office meets 51 per cent. of police authority expenditure on revenue costs through specific grant, whatever the origin of the expenditure.

Wrongful Imprisonment

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many grants of compensation for wrongful imprisonment were made in each of the last two years (a) under section 133 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 and (b) under the ex-gratia scheme.

Mr. John Patten: The following information relates to payments of compensation in respect of imprisonment as a result of wrongful conviction, and is based on the date upon which the final payment of compensation was made. A number of interim payments, pending final assessment of compensation, have also been made during the period.

Year	Ex-gratia payment	Section 133 payment	Total number of payments

Prisoners

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners were put into canvas restraint jackets in each of the years from 1986 to 1990.

Mrs. Rumbold: Information on the number of applications of loose canvas jackets to male prisoners in the years 1986 to 1989 was published in table 10.3 of "Prison Statistics England and Wales" (Cm. 1221), a copy of which is in the Library.

According to the records held centrally, the number of different inmates who were so restrained was four in 1987, two in 1988 and one in 1989.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prisoners in each of the years 1986-1990 were held in segregation units for (i) over six months, (ii) over a year and (iii) over two years;

(2) how many prisoners were kept in segregation units for a continuous period of over 13 weeks in each of the years 1986-1990.

Mrs. Rumbold: Information is not available in the form requested. The available data relate to the population of inmates removed from association with other inmates under prison rule 43 and young offender institution rule 46. Figures for 30 June 1989 were published in table 10.1 of "Prison Statistics England and Wales 1989" (Cm. 1221), a copy of which is in the Library. Provisional figures for 30 June 1990 are given in the table.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prisoners experienced more than one 10/74 transfer in each year for 1986 to 1990;

(2) how many prisoners experienced in each year from 1986 to 1990, (i) more than three 10/74 transfers (ii) more than three transfers under good order and discipline procedures and (iii) more than three transfers for other reasons, including Home Office directives;

(3) how many 10/74 transfers were authorised by governors in each year from 1986 to 1990.

Mrs. Rumbold: The information requested is not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners were kept in a body belt for over 24 hours in each of the years from 1986 to 1990, and in which prisons.

Mrs. Rumbold: The readily available information is given in the table.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners were put into segregation in each year between 1986 and 1990 (i) under good order and discipline, (ii) pending adjudication, (iii) on punishment, (iv) for any other reason and (v) on rule 43(a).

Mrs. Rumbold: An inmate may be removed from association with other inmates where this appears desirable for the maintenance of good order or discipline or in his own interests, under prison rule 43 or young offender institution rule 46. The readily available information is that the following numbers of prisoners were removed from association under these rules on 30 June:

	1989	1990
Good order and discipline	238	302
Own interests	2,213	1,980

Information is not recorded centrally on the number of inmates who, under prison rule 48(2) or young offender institution rule 51(2), are kept apart from other inmates pending adjudication.

Inmates were awarded cellular or room confinement following adjudication or disciplinary offences on the following number of occasions:

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria were used for deciding which cases involving allegations of assault by prison officers should be settled by ex-gratia payments and which should be contested.

Mrs. Rumbold: There are no standard criteria and the decision about whether to contest a civil claim must reflect all the circumstances of the case. A decision to make an ex-gratia payment will not necessarily reflect doubts about the conduct of the member of staff concerned or a belief that the allegation is true.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions and in which prisons, a body belt was used in Her Majesty's prisons in each year from 1986 to 1990; and on how many prisoners was the body belt used in each year from 1986 to 1990.

Mrs. Rumbold: The readily available information is given in the table.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many doubled door cells there are in Her Majesty's prisons; and how many times double door cells were used in each of the years from 1986 to 1990.

Mrs. Rumbold: In England and Wales the current prison design standards provide that a special cell for the temporary confinement of a refractory or violent inmate, or a protective room in a prison hospital for the temporary confinement of an inmate who is disturbed or is otherwise a danger to himself or herself or to others, should have inner and outer doors. Not all special cells and protective rooms at present designated as such are so equipped. Reliable information about the total number of special cells and protective rooms is not available centrally. The readily available information about the total number of occasions on which special cells and protective rooms designated as such have been used is as follows:

Year	Special cells	Protective rooms
1986	1,662	n.a.
1987	1,491	507
1988	1,453	623
1989	1,739	593

n.a.—not available.

Figures for 1990 are not yet available.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many ex-gratia payments were made to prisoners who claimed to have been attacked in jail by prison officers in each year for 1986 to 1990; in which prison the incidents occurred; how many prison officers were disciplined; and on what grounds it was decided not to discipline prison officers in these cases.

Mrs. Rumbold: Central records are kept only of allegations made by prisoners of assault by staff when these result in civil litigation. Of the 20 such claims received during this period, six have been concluded, and in one case compensation has been paid. This was for a negotiated settlement relating to an alleged assault which was fully investigated and on which it was decided that no disciplinary action would be taken. The settlement was accepted by the plaintiff without any admission of liability on the part of the Department or individual members of staff.

Electoral Register

Mr. Forman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much is spent by electoral registration officers in each of the London boroughs on compiling the electoral register and keeping it up to date; and if he will give comparable figures for Birmingham, Cornwall, Kent and Lancashire.

Mrs. Rumbold: I regret that the information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Security Service

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will publish the Security Service Commissioner's annual report for the year ended December 1990.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: As soon as is practicable.

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many complaints against the Security Service were received, and how many actually investigated by the Security Service Tribunal in the 12 months ending December 1990.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The Security Service Tribunal operates independently under the provisions of the Security Service Act 1989. I do not propose to make available details of its work. It will be for the Security Service Commissioner to decide in consultation with the tribunal what information might be included about the tribunal in his annual report to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

Traffic Wardens, London

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to devolve recruitment and control of traffic wardens to individual London boroughs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We have no plans to devolve the recruitment and control of traffic wardens to the London boroughs. Under the provisions of the Road Traffic Bill, the London boroughs will be able to recruit their own parking attendants to undertake the enforcement of certain breaches of parking controls.

Charities

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the income of charities for the financial year 1989-90.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not available centrally, but statistics compiled by the Charities Aid Foundation suggest that the current annual turnover of the whole charitable sector in England and Wales is in the region of £15 billion.

Crime, North Yorkshire

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current level of crime in north Yorkshire; and what it was at the same time in 1990.

Mr. John Patten: North Yorkshire police recorded a total of 44,590 offences during 1990, compared with 35,774 in 1989. The number of offences detected in 1990 was 17,726 compared with 12,092 in 1989. These are the most recent figures on which a comparison can be made.

Mr. Joseph Barker

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the treatment of Joseph Arthur Lewis Barker, prisoner CJ0124 in Her Majesty's prison, Liverpool stating why he has been moved to the hospital prison, what injuries he has and what treatment he is being given.

Mrs. Rumbold: For reasons of medical confidentiality it is not our practice to disclose publicly information about the medical condition or treatment of individual prisoners. I shall be writing to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to release prisoner CJ0124, Joseph Arthur Lewis Barker from prison; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: Mr. Barker"s earliest date of release from prison is 16 February 1993. He will be eligible to be considered for parole from 19 October 1991.

SCOTLAND

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many and what percentage of officers in each grade (1 to 7) and overall in the Scottish Office are (a) women and (b) from ethnic minorities, respectively.

Mr. Lang: The number amd percentage of women officers in grades 1 to 7 and overall in the Scottish Office and associated Departments at 1 April 1990 are shown in the table:

Grade (and equivalents)	Women	Percentage
3	2	6·5
5	17	11·3
6	36	16·2
7	64	13·2
Overall	2,967	39·6

None of the staff in grades 1 to 7 at 1 April 1990 described themselves as belongiing to an ethnic minority.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when the Scottish Office last conducted a survey of the ethnic origins of its employees; when it next plans to do so; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: My Departmentt conducted a voluntary survey of the ethnic origins of staff in 1987, a reminder exercise in 1989, and thereafter all new entrants have been invited to complete questionnaires. I have no plans to conduct a further survey.

We achieved an 87 per cent. response from the exercise, and 0·3 per cent. of staff have described themselves as belonging to an ethnic minority.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he has taken to recruit members of ethnic minorities in top grades of employment at the Scottish Office.

Mr. Lang: My Department does not conduct recruitment for top grades.

Recycling

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to introduce a scheme for local authorities in Scotland comparable to that announced by the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) on 2 January.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: We have no plans to introduce in Scotland a system of supplementary credit approvals for local authority investment in recycling projects. The arrangements for handling recycling investment through local authority capital expenditure allocations are given in my reply of 24 January 1991 to my honourable Friend the Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost), at columns 306-7.

Employment Training

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many employment training places in Scotland in 1990-91 were taken up by trainees in the categories of (i) all 18 to 24-year-olds unemployed for at least six months and (ii) those between 18 and 50 years unemployed for two years or more.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Precise information about numbers of trainees is not available in the form requested. Information about people who take up employment training places is obtained from returns submitted by training managers and is incomplete. However, from these returns it is estimated that, in Scotland, from 1 April 1990 to 4 January 1991, 14·7 per cent. of all starts were aged 18 to 24 years and unemployed for at least six months and 24·4 per cent. were aged between 18 and 50 years and unemployed for two years or more.

Forestry Commission

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all land which was owned by the Forestry Commission and has been sold, for which local authorities have been able to enter into an access agreement; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The arrangements for access agreements which my right hon. and learned Friend, the then Secretary of State for Scotland, announced on 21 November 1990, Official Report, columns 164-66, have not yet been introduced.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will place in the Library a list of all land currently owned by the Forestry Commission on a county by county basis, giving the area of the land and stating the type of woodland or other type of countryside.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Forestry Commission is organised administratively into seven conservancies and 57 forest districts; information cannot therefore be given by counties except at disproportionate cost. A summary of the land currently managed by the Forestry Commission is given by forest districts in tables 15, 16 and 17 of appendix XI to the commission's 1989-90 annual report, a copy of which is in the Library.

Lothian Health Board

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how much of the 1991-92 revenue allocation to Lothian health board is allotted to (a) hospital services, (b) community units, (c) special projects, (d) general practitioners and (e) projected efficiency savings in (i) cash and (ii) percentage terms;

(2) if he will list the special projects funded by the 1991-92 Lothian health board revenue allocation and the money allotted to each of them from the allocation.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Lothian health board has been allocated £346·505 million for hospital and community health revenue expenditure for 1991-92. Within this total, specific sums of £7·706 million—2·2 per cent.—and £2·124 million—0·6 per cent.—were made available for AIDS-related services and Project 2000 respectively and a general allocation of £2·457 million—0·7 per cent.—was given for other services such as drug misuse and breast cancer screening. The board will set its own priorities in regard to expenditure on hospital services and community units. The board has been asked to find an additional 1 per cent. of its HCH revenue allocation, or £3·465 million, from cash releasing efficiency saving which will be available to improve patient care.

In addition to the hospital and community health allocation, Lothian was allocated £5·923 million for general practice team staff and £2·3 million for general practice premises.

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much money was allotted to general practitioners from the 1989-90 revenue allocation to Lothian health board; and what was Lothian health board's revenue expenditure on general practitioners in that year.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: In 1989-90, funds for general medical services were not cash limited and therefore no specific allocations were made to health boards. In that year, expenditure by Lothian health board on general medical services was £27·748 million.

Nurses

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many nurses are registered with the bank nursing scheme in each of the health board regions (a) at each grade and (b) in total.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not held centrally.

Mortgage Repossessions

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many mortgage repossession orders have been made in (a) Inverclyde, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland as a whole in each of the last five years, and for each of the last 12 months.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 6 March 1991]: This information is not available.

Revenue Support Grant

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the amount of revenue support grant allocated to each Scottish district council on a per capita basis; if he will explain the formulae applied in calculation of these grants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The figures are set out in the table.

A full explanation of the methodology applied in determining the revenue support grant for all authorities, including district councils, for 1991-92 is set out in the report on the Revenue Support Grant (Scotland) Order 1991, which was laid before the House of Commons on 30 January and approved on 13 February.

The principles used in distributing RSG are agreed between the Scottish Office and the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities through the distribution committee of the working party on local government finance.

RSG forms only part of aggregate external finance, the other components of which are specific grants and non-domestic rate income. Meaningful comparison between districts is only possible in terms of AEF as a whole.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Family Credit

Mr. Andy Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what his Department is doing to improve the publicity for family credit.

Mr. Jack: Since 1989 a series of advertising campaigns and other publicity has led to a high level of awareness of family credit. But there is a high turnover of families within the eligible population, as people move into and out of eligibility as their family circumstances change. It is necessary therefore to ensure that those who become newly eligible are aware of the benefit and that they may qualify.

So that all families with children are made aware of family credit and are able to see whether they might be entitled, a personalised message about family credit now appears in child benefit order books, and on the appropriate award notices where child benefit is paid direct into a bank or building society. This tells the family that they may be able to get family credit if their income is less than the figure quoted in the message, which is individual to that family. A new advertising campaign, using television commercials to draw attention to the message in child benefit order books, began on 11 February. A poster has also been produced for display in post offices.

Other publicity measures which have been undertaken recently include a mailing, last August, of specially prepared material to some 80,000 advisers, including citizens advice bureaux, ministers of religion and others, and the inclusion of a leaflet about family credit in "Bounty Bags" which mothers of new-born babies receive in hospital.

Cold Weather Payments

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his reply of 25 February, Official Report, column 402, regarding cold weather payments, if he will inform the hon. Member for Oldham, West when the information is placed in the Library.

Mr. Scott: Yes, I will inform the hon. Member when information for February is placed in the Library. However, a full and accurate picture of cold weather payments claims and expenditure will not emerge until later because claims can be made up to three months after the period of cold weather.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 21 February, Official Report, column 265, whether immediate payments of cold weather claims can be approved on the telephone by local offices without personal attendance or written application by the claimant.

Mr. Scott: No. Claims for social fund cold weather payments, in common with other social security benefits, must be made in writing. A telephone call can alert the office to the likelihood of a claim, but payment will depend on written confirmation made either in person or through the post.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his most up-to-date estimate of the numbers of (a) applicants and (b) recipients of the special cold weather payments for the first two weeks of February.

Mr. Scott: Estimates of cold weather payment claims and payments for the first two weeks of February could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. When details of actual claims and payments become available, they will be placed in the Library.

Young People (Benefits)

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what were the total numbers of those in receipt of (a) supplementary benefit and (b) income support aged (i) 16 years, (ii) 17 years and (iii) 18 years in each year between 1978 and 1980 in Wales.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested for supplementary benefit is in the table. Income support was introduced in April 1988.

	Supplementary benefit recipients in Wales
	1978	1979	1980
Aged 16	4,000	4,000	5,000
Aged 17	4,000	3,000	5,000
Aged 18	3,000	3,000	5,000

Residential and Nursing Homes

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what account he took of the increase in the number of residents of residential and nursing homes claiming housing benefit in deciding to reduce the scope of the entitlement of such residents to housing benefit.

Miss Widdecombe: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) on 29 October 1990 at columns 368-70.

Disabled Workers

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the lifting of Crown immunity from Government Departments in respect of the 3 per cent. quota of jobs for disabled people.

Miss Widdecombe: We have always aimed to meet the quota of 3 per cent.

Water Charges

Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he has any proposals to uprate social security benefits to take account of the increases in water charges that will be implemented as a consequence of the Water Act 1989.

Miss Widdecombe: Income-related benefits are considered for uprating each year and we seek to take account of all relevant factors.

Income Support

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the reasons for the adoption by benefit offices in the Isle of Wight and Somerset of differing policies in relation to the payment of income support to residents transferred from local authority care to independent homes.

Miss Widdecombe: Eligibility for income support is defined by regulations and is available in respect of fees, up to certain limits, to residents of registered residential care homes and in certain other types of homes. Adjudication officers receive guidance on their interpretation of the regulations by the chief adjudication officer in the adjudication officers' guide, a copy of which is available in the Library. It is for individual adjudication officers to make decisions in any given case.

Disablement Allowances

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list for each of the last three years the number and percentage of people awarded mobility allowance whose terms of award was insufficient for them to take advantage of the motability scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: People whose awards of mobility allowance are for two years or less are not eligible for any of the motability schemes. The precise information requested is not available, but the numbers of such people receiving mobility allowance on specified dates are in the table.

	Awards of two years or less	Total live load	Percentage
On 30 December 1988	46,101	555,975	8·3
On 28 December 1989	50,774	599,268	8·5
On 27 December 1990	51,013	640,658	8·0

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list all the statutory instruments which will be superseded by regulations made under the disability living allowance and Disability Working Allowance Bill.

Mr. Scott: A number of sets of regulations will be made under the Disability Living Allowance and Disability Working Allowance Bill. The introduction of disability living allowance will, for example, require amendments to be made to all the regulations relating to attendance allowance and mobility allowance and to a range of other sets of regulations covering general matters such as claims and payments and the inter-relationship between benefits. Work is continuing on the drafting of the regulations and it is not yet clear how many sets of regulations will need to be amended.

Single Payments

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the cost of administering single payments for each year of the scheme from 1980 to 1988 expressed (a) in money terms, (b) as a proportion of the total value of single payment expenditure that year and (c) at 1991 prices.

Mr. Scott: Single payments were part of the supplementary benefit scheme and administration costs were not separately identified.

Severe Hardship Payments

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to publish the research commissioned by his Department on severe hardship payments for 16 and 17-year-olds.

Mr. Jack: We expect to publish the research on such payments in the near future.

Pension Book

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will review the layout and terminology of the current pension book to make it more user-friendly.

Miss Widdecombe: A number of options for a redesigned benefit order book are currently under consideration.

Pensions

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what additional benefits are due to a pensioner couple in receipt of £83·25 state pension, £27·80 attendance allowance and occupational pension of £25·80.

Mr. Jack: The extent to which this pensioner couple might be eligible for additional benefits would depend on a range of factors, including the amount of any other income or capital they possess, the size of their family and household composition, their housing costs, if any, and the amount of community charge payable.

Transitional Additions

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people were in receipt of transitional additions for each category for which such additions are payable at the latest date for which figures are available.

Miss Widdecombe: Shortly after the 1990 uprating, the number of people in each category who were in receipt of income support transitional additions were as follows:

	Number
Pensioners	42,000
Long-term sick and disabled	8,000
Families with children	7,000
Others	52,000

Social Fund

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether the independent research commissioned from the social security research unit of the University of York to examine whether the social fund is meeting its objectives will be available for publication in either completed or interim form prior to the establishment of the benefits agency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The research into the operation of the social fund by the social policy research unit is not expected to be completed until the end of December 1991.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what procedures exist for his Department to monitor the local priority categories used for allocating grants from the social fund and changes which take place in those priorities.

Mr. Scott: There are no centrally imposed procedures for monitoring local priority categories, or changes which take place in those priorities.

This function is the responsibility of the relevant local manager who, as the appointed area social fund officer and budget holder, is required to issue guidance on matters specified by the Secretary of State. That guidance must take account of local factors in specifying priority needs for grants and loans and the levels of priority which may be met from the expenditure allocation for the local social fund officers for the relevant period. The area social fund officer is also required to monitor and review at least monthly the planned level of expenditure and the priority needs and levels for his locality and to revise them as necessary. It follows that this guidance can vary from one local area to another, thus ensuring that the highest priority needs in a community are met.

Unemployed Claimants

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list for each of the past four years the total cost and number of unemployed claiming (a) unemployment benefit, (b) unemployment benefit and income support and (c) income support for Great Britain and each of the standard regions.

Mr. Jack: The information is not available in the form requested. The numbers of unemployed receiving benefits in November of each year are set out in tables 1(a) to 1(d). Total benefit expenditure for Great Britain on income support, unemployment benefit, rate rebates and community charge benefits paid to unemployed people is shown in table 2.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he plans to publish the research by the social policy research unit into the operation of housing benefit review procedures.

Miss Widdecombe: I have today placed a copy of the report in the Library. We shall be studying the research findings with care and considering whether there is a need to make changes to the current arrangements.

The report will be published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office and is expected to be available in the early summer.

EMPLOYMENT

Manufacturing Jobs

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many jobs have been lost in manufacturing in each of the last twelve months.

Mr. Jackson: Changes in the number of employees in manufacturing industries are supplied in the table.

Duty Workers

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish in the Official Report (a) the number of detached duty workers recruited and the numbers now operating in the south-east and south-west of England dealing with unemployed people claiming benefit, (b) the standard regions from which the detached workers were recruited and (c) the total costs, including travel, overnight allowances and any other premium payments, for each quarter between 1 January 1988 and 31 January 1991.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service Executive Agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

Employment Service

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps are being taken by the employment service to deal with the increased numbers of unemployed people claiming benefit in the south-east and south-west regions of England; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service Executive Agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

Training

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give for employment training in each of the years 1988-89 and 1989-90 (a) the total outturn and planned expenditure in both cash and real terms and (b) the total number of places provided for Great Britain and each of the standard regions.

Mr. Jackson: The total outturn and planned expenditure on youth training in cash and constant prices for 1988-89 and 1989-90 is shown in table (a). Table (b) gives the total number of youth training (YTS) places provided for Great Britain and each of the standard regions in 1988-89 and 1989-90.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give for youth training in each of the years 1990-91, 1991-92, 1992-93 and 1993-94 (a) the total estimated planned expenditure and for 1990-91 the estimated outturn expenditure, in both cash and real terms, (b) the total estimated planned expenditure for credits included in the above and (c) the total estimated number of youth training places provided for Great Britain and each of the standard regions.

Mr. Jackson: The total estimated planned expenditure on youth training (YT) and training credits in 1990-91, 1991-92, 1992-93 and 1993-94 in cash and constant prices is shown in the table. The estimated outturn expenditure for YT in 1990-91 is £833 million, which is equivalent to £771 million in constant prices[1]. Information on the number of places provided is not available.

[3] Cash prices for 1991-92 onwards published in departmental report (Cm. 1501-1519).

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list for employment training in each of the years 1990-91, 1991-92, 1992-93 and 1993-94 (a) the total estimated planned expenditure in both cash and real terms and (b) the total number of planned places, for Great Britain and each standard region; and what is the estimated outturn expenditure for 1990-91 employment training in 1990-91 for Great Britain and each standard region.

Mr. Jackson: Total planned expenditure on employment training in cash and constant prices in 1990-91 to 1993-94 is shown in the table. Information on the total number of planned places is not available. Estimated outturn expenditure in Great Britain for employment training in 1990-91 is £1,062 million. Regional expenditure forecasts are for internal management purposes only.

Notes:

(1) Cash figures for 1991-92 to 1993-94 are taken from the departmental report (Cm. 1501 to 1519) and adjusted to take account of recent additions to planned expenditure in 1991-92.

(2) Cash figure for 1990-91 is the spring supplementary estimate published in February 1991.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list for youth training in each of the years 1988-89 and 1989-90 (a) the total outturn and planned expenditure in both cash and real terms and (b) the total number of places provided for Great Britain and each of the standard regions.

Mr. Jackson: The following table (a) shows the total outturn and planned expenditure on employment training in both cash and constant prices in 1988-89 and 1989-90. Table (b) shows the average number of filled places provided for Great Britain and each region in 1988-89 and 1989-90.

Rochdale TEC

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list (a) the directors of Rochdale training and enterprise council and (b) any resignations which have taken place since the board was established.

Mr. Jackson: An up-to-date list of TEC directors including those of Rochdale TEC is held in the House of Commons Library. Resignations are a matter for the TEC.

DEFENCE

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when his Department last conducted a survey of the ethnic origins of its employees; when it next plans to do so; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The last such survey was conducted in 1988. A further survey is being conducted at the moment.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many and what percentage of officers in each grade (1 to 7) and overall in the Department are (a) women and (b) from ethnic minorities, respectively.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information on ethnic minorities is based on a voluntary survey conducted since 1988 to which not all staff responded. The figures as at January 1991 are as follows:

	Women		Ethnic minorities
	Number	per cent.	Number	per cent.
Grade 1	0	—	0	—
Grade 2	0	—	0	—
Grade 3	1	1·6	0	—

Grade 5	8	2·5	0	—
Grade 6	10	1·2	4	0·5
Grade 7	85	2·9	18	0·6
Overall	40,202	28·7	1,847	1·3

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he has taken to recruit members of ethnic minorities in top grades of employment at his Ministry.

Mr. Alan Clark: Recruitment at grade 7 level is undertaken by the Civil Service Commission on behalf of the MOD. Entry to grades above grade 7 is normally through internal promotion procedures.

Challenger II Tank

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his oral answers of 19 February, Official Report, columns 137-38, when he now expects to make a decision on the Challenger II tank contract bid.

Mr. Alan Clark: I hope that a decision on the equipment for our future main battle tank fleet will not have to be delayed too long.

Territorial Army

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what decision he has reached about the future size of the Territorial Army; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) on 20 February 1991 at column 192.

The Gulf

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Gulf support groups are known to his Department; and what advice and back-up support has been given to them.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We know of 70 support groups. The Gulf amenities desk telephone line, which is open 24 hours a day, is available to provide information and advice.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence in which areas of the country from which men and women now serving in the Gulf have been recruited there is no Gulf support group.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Information on areas of the country from which personnel now serving in the Gulf have been recruited is not held centrally, and we are not necessarily aware of all the Gulf support groups operating in the United Kingdom. The question could not, therefore, be answered without incurring disproportionate cost.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the regiments serving in the Gulf and, in each case, indicate from which area of the country the majority of the men and women have been recruited.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The principal recruiting areas of the British Army regiments and corps serving in the Gulf are listed in table A. Regiments and corps which draw their recruits from across the country are listed in table B.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he has taken to arrange for the clean up of military detritus, toxic wastes and redundant equipment in Kuwait, southern Iraq and northern Saudi Arabia as a result of Operation Granby.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: British forces are currently assisting in clearing hazards from the battlefield.

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what measures his Department has taken to ensure the general welfare of the families of military personnel serving in the Gulf.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [holding answer 6 March 1991]: In addition to the normal welfare facilities provided by each service for the support of families and dependants, special arrangements have been made to provide help and support during Operation Granby, including the provision of a Gulf helpline service at military establishments, specialist counselling where needed, the issue of fact sheets and briefings to disseminate information and answer queries. Those who are remote from military establishments are kept in contact by regular telephone calls and information bulletins.

Taylorplan Services Ltd.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what contracts have been awarded by his Department to Taylorplan Services Ltd.; what hourly rates of pay were advertised by the company for any contract awarded by his Department; what complaints he has received about pay rates offered by the company or its quality of work; and whether the company has any current contracts with his Department.

Mr. Alan Clark: A total of 20 Ministry of Defence contracts for catering and cleaning work have been awarded to Taylorplan Services Limited; 18 of these are still current.

The rates of pay offered by contractors for employment on their service contracts with the Ministry are a matter for the companies themselves. We have received no complaints about Taylorplan, either in relation to their pay rates or their contract performance.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Mortgage Possessions

Mr. Gould: To ask the Attorney-General how many mortgage possession actions were issued in the Upminster court area in the last 12 months.

The Attorney-General: There is no county court at Upminster. Upminster falls within the district of Romford county court, which in 1990 issued 1,180 mortgage possession actions and made 434 orders for possession.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Central America

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much total bilateral aid to central America was in 1990.

Mrs. Chalker: Aid statistics for 1990 are not yet available. Figures for previous years can be found in the 1990 edition of "British Aid Statistics", a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Council of Europe (UK Delegation)

Mr. Haynes: To ask the Lord President of the Council what changes have been made in the composition of the United Kingdom delegation to the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe.

Mr. MacGregor: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has appointed the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) as a full member in place of the former hon. Member for Neath, the late Donald Coleman.

ENVIRONMENT

Planning Applications

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance he gives to local authorities that consider planning applications on land which they are themselves marketing and selling to private developers.

Mr. Yeo: The Town and Country Planning Act 1990 provides that when determining proposals for development of its own land a local authority is bound by the same statutory rules which apply to the determination of any other planning application. It must have regard to the provisions of the development plan, where relevant, and to any other material considerations. The ownership of the land concerned is not a material consideration.

Community Charge

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many people are currently registered as community charge payers in England.

Mr. Key: The figure is 35,900,000.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Dixon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the level of Government grants for 1990-91 per head of population in (a) the London borough of Wandsworth and (b) South Tyneside borough council.

Mr. Key: Government grants in 1990-91 consist of revenue support grant, special grants, specific grants in aggregate external finance, community charge benefit grant and transitional relief grant. Government grants per head of relevant population in 1990-91 are £677 in Wandsworth and £369 in South Tyneside.

Public Buildings (Windows)

Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if, following the terrorist attack on Downing street, he will direct the Property Services Agency to fit laminated glass in all Government buildings;

(2) if, following the bomb attack on Victoria station, he will order a review of the types of glass fitted in facilities in public areas;

(3) if he will instruct the Property Services Agency to undertake a review of the types of glass fitted in public buildings with respect to the effect of attacks by bombs and other explosive devices.

Mr. Yeo: I refer the hon. Member to the statement by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on 7 February. It would not be appropriate to give details of any particular measures which may be taken.

Homelessness

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he has taken to combat homelessness in the Manchester and Greater Manchester areas; and what further measures he intends to take.

Sir George Young: Resources for housing are allocated through the housing investment programme for local authorities and through the Housing Corporation for housing associations. The general needs index, which determines local authority allocations under the housing investment programme, has been revised to take greater account of homelessness pressures. For 1991-92 local authorities in the Greater Manchester area have been allocated £113·948 million through the housing investment programme. For 1991-92 housing associations in the north-west region, including Greater Manchester, have been allocated £104·5 million through the Housing Corporation. Also in 1991-92 three Manchester-based voluntary organisations concerned with homelessness—SHADES city centre project, Hulme Action research project and Selcare Trust outreach and resettlement project—will be receiving grants from my Department under section 73 of the Housing Act 1985 for the first time.

Oil Pollution (Bahrain)

Mr. Charles Wardle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what response he has made to the recent request by the Government of Bahrain for equipment to help combat oil pollution.

Mr. Heseltine: The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry), is visiting Bahrain on 9 March for discussions with the Government of Bahrain and to see at first hand the counter-pollution preparations for dealing with the Gulf oil spills. I will be presenting a first consignment of three oil recovery skimmers which the United Kingdom is making available to the Government of Bahrain. We expect a further consignment of three skimmers will be airlifted to Bahrain shortly. The cost of these operations is estimated at £300,000 and a new subhead is being created on class VIII, vote 5 to enable the provision of oil recovery equipment to Bahrain.

Pollution Control

Mr. Stevens: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the regulatory framework for introducing integrated pollution control and local authority air pollution control under part I of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 will be completed.

Mr. Baldry: I am pleased to announce that my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Environment, for Wales and for Scotland have today laid before Parliament four statutory instruments relating to part I of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. These are:

the Environmental Protection (Prescribed Processes and Substances) Regulations 1991, which define the processes to be covered by local authority air pollution control and by integrated pollution control (IPC); the substances, the release of which to air, land and water are to be controlled; and the timetable for the implementation of part I of the 1990 Act;

the Environmental Protection (Applications, Appeals and Registers) Regulations 1991, which deal with the procedures for making an application for an authorisation under part I of the 1990 Act; consultation with the public and statutory consultees; the appeals procedures; and public registers of information;

the Disposal of Controlled Waste (Exceptions) Regulations 1991, which deal with the interface between the waste controls exercised currently under the Control of Pollution Act 1974 and the two new control regimes established under part I of the 1990 Act; and the Environmental Protection (Authorisation of Processes) (Determination Periods) Order, which proves for an extension of the period allowed for the determination of an application for an authorisation under part I of the 1990 Act, where an application is made for information to be withheld from the public register on grounds of national security or commercial confidentiality; and where an application is made for an existing plant which falls to local authority control, for a reduction of the period allowed for determining applications relating to certain small waste oil burners.

These statutory instruments provide the main regulatory basis for the introduction of integrated pollution control and local authority air pollution control on 1 April.

Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether he will make a statement on cost recovery charges for local authority air pollution control;

(2) whether he will make a statement on Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution cost recovery charges for integrated pollution control.

Mr. Trippier: The Environmental Protection Act 1990 provides for the introduction of charges to cover the costs of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution (HMIP) and the National Rivers Authority (NRA) in regulating processes under integrated pollution control (IPC), and to cover the costs of local authorities in regulating processes for air pollution control.

With the agreement of the Treasury, the Secretary of State has now made schemes of charges for the two control systems which will both take effect from 1 April 1991. I will be placing copies of these in the Library.

Last July, the Department published a consultation document inviting comments on proposed charging schemes for IPC and local authority pollution control, both taking the form of an application fee payable when a process was submitted for authorisation, an annual subsistence charge payable for holding an authorisation, and a fee for consideration of substantial variation of an authorisation.

The Department has received some 79 responses on these proposals, a list of which has been placed in the Library. Copies of individual responses may be obtained through the Library.

In the case of processes subject to IPC, which vary substantially in size and complexity, it was proposed in the consultation document to relate IPC fees and charges to the number of specified "components" which the process comprised. Thus a small metal-plating plant might have one or two components, while an iron and steelworks might have 25 components or more, and pay correspondingly larger charges. Respondents generally agreed that the proposed structure of IPC charges and the component-based approach provided a satisfactory basis for relating charges to regulatory effort, without undue administrative complexity.

The scheme now made therefore operates on this basis. The application fee will be £1,800 per component, or £1,200 for a process already subject to Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution air pollution control. The annual subsistence charge will be £500 per component. Where the process also involves discharge to controlled water and is thus subject to monitoring and oversight by the National Rivers Authority, the subsistence charge will include an element to meet these costs also. The substantial variation fee will be £600 per component.

Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution's forecast 1991-92 costs relating to IPC, to be recovered through the fees and charges, amount to some £5·9 million. Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution will closely monitor its expenditure and at the end of the financial year will publish detailed accounts and information on charging and regulatory costs.

The scheme for local authority air pollution control is broadly similar to that for IPC, except that the fees and charges are set per process, and components do not apply, since the processes coming under local authority control are less diverse in size and complexity. The application fee is £800, the annual subsistence charge £500, and the substantial variation fee £530. Reflecting a simplified authorisation procedure for small waste oil burners, the application fee for these is £100 and the annual subsistence charge £100. The Department intends to review the scheme later in the year, in consultation with interested parties.

The schemes take account of many useful comments received, and extensive discussion with industry and other interested parties, to ensure that detailed operation is straightforward and equitable.

Local Government Finance (EC)

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will outline the method of funding used to finance local government in each of the 11 other members of the European Community.

Mr. Key [holding answer 6 March 1991]: Information on local government revenue in the European Community is compiled by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development and published in "Revenue Statistics of OECD Member Countries". The information requested is set out in the following tables.

Property Services Agency

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total value of work carried out for the Property Services Agency at the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich by CITEC Electric Ltd.; and when the company will receive payment.

Mr. Yeo: The total value of work carried out for the Property Services Agency at the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich by CITEC Electric Ltd. is £2,029·90 inclusive of VAT, which has been paid to the company in full.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

City Technology Colleges

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what arrangements are in hand for the inspection of city technology colleges by Her Majesty's inspectorate; if he will detail the number, location and frequency of visits by inspectors; and if he will make it his policy to publish the findings.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The inspection arrangements provide for each CTC to be visited in their first term of existence to enable the DES to register them as independent schools, a legal requirement placed upon all such schools. Following this, termly visits are being made at present. In addition, as with any other school, Her Majesty's inspectorate is invited to visit individual CTCs from time to time to offer advice. The number of inspection visits made by Her Majesty's inspectorate to each CTC is as follows:

Kingshurst: seven
Djanogly and MacMillan: four each
Bradford, Emmanuel, Harris and Leigh: one each.

As is the case for all schools such routine visits do not result in published reports. The findings are conveyed orally to the principal and the chairman of governors or other nominated governors. I have no plans to publish the records of such visits to CTCs or to any other school. Where the inspection is both designed and intended to result in a formal written report then the CTC, like any other school, would be informed in advance that such was to be the outcome. The report would then be published by me in the usual way. The first inspection which is expected to lead to a published report is to be carried out early in this coming summer term at Kingshurst CTC.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Blackburn, Official Report, 26 February, column 434, if he will place in the Library details of the evidence he has available of the past neglect by local education authorities of grant-maintained schools.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The capital allocations for grant-maintained schools were in response to deficiencies identified by GM schools in their existing buildings. The expenditure covers repair work in some cases and in other cases adaptation and new construction to allow for the implementation of the national curriculum.

ENERGY

Sizewell B

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan), of 18 February, Official Report, column 29, what consideration has been given to the experience of the loss of coolant at the power station at Mihama, Japan on the design and cost of the Sizewell B power station.

Mr. Wakeham: The incident referred to, a rupture of a steam generator tube, resulted in a release of radioactivity which was extremely small and constituted no danger to the population or the environment. In preparing the safety case and cost estimates for Sizewell B, the CEGB took full account of the possibility of such an incident occurring. Indeed, this was one of the incidents which was specifically addressed at the Sizewell B public inquiry, and it is also addressed in all of the station's safety reports. The design of the reactor and its protective systems are such as to make the possibility of a significant release of radioactivity from incidents involving a loss of reactor coolant extremely remote. Nevertheless, I understand that Nuclear Electric plc maintains a watching brief on overseas incidents so that it can review their safety procedures in the light of any lessons which might be learnt.

Independent Electricity Generators

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what assessment he has made of the effects on independent electricity generators of the bulk supply tariff rates determined by the CEGB successor companies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Electricity prices are now determined under the contractual and operating arrangements which have been established for the newly structured industry. There are no bulk supply tariffs.

Oil Exports

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if exports will be permitted of crude oil from the United Kingdom continental shelf to the countries of central and eastern Europe.

Mr. Wakeham: Her Majesty's Government have decided that the guidelines, introduced on 31 January 1979 —Official Report, column 461—which govern the destination of crude oil exports from the United Kingdom continental shelf shall be withdrawn with immediate effect. This means that there will be no inhibition on companies exporting crude oil to the countries of central and eastern Europe, and other countries with one exception. This initiative is primarily in response to the oil supply difficulties of countries in central and eastern Europe as a result of falling exports from the Soviet Union and the loss of supplies from Iraq and Kuwait.

While European Community measures exist on the export of crude oil to South Africa, Her Majesty's Government will expect companies exporting crude oil to abide by these measures by not exporting crude oil from the United Kingdom continental shelf to South Africa.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Pint Glasses

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to make use of his powers under the Weights and Measures Act 1979 to clarify the definition of a pint when it is served into a brim measure glass, and to encourage the licensed trade to introduce line measure glasses.

Mr. Leigh: There is little evidence of dissatisfaction amongst individual consumers about how beer is served. I therefore have no plans for action on these matters.

ECGD (Insurance Services Group)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 5 March to the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson), Official Report, column 88, if he will require the payment of any form of bond by those shortlisted tenderers for the acquisition of the insurance services group of the Export Credits Guarantee Department, for access to commercially sensitive information on the insurance services group.

Mr. Sainsbury: No. Confidentiality undertakings have been obtained from each company invited to tender. In the event of a breach of any undertaking the Secretary of State will be able to pursue legal remedies through the United Kingdom courts.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 5 March, to the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson), Official Report, columns 88-89, what restriction he is placing on the numbers of staff of the shortlisted tenderers for the acquisition of the insurance services group of the Export Credits Guarantee Department who will be allowed to see details of insurance services group's commercial transactions, operations, figures and accounts; and what methods he proposes to prevent the subsequent commercial misuse of any such information acquired in the tendering process by unsuccessful bidders.

Mr. Sainsbury: Each shortlisted company has entered into a detailed confidentiality undertaking to the Secretary of State which restricts, on a need-to-know basis, the persons allowed to see the detailed information provided in connection with the tender. It has been drafted to protect the interests of the Secretary of State and the eventual buyer and to achieve an appropriate balance between the restrictions imposed and the need to use the information for the purpose of the tender. Legal remedy is open to the Secretary of State if there is evidence of misuse. Overseas companies who have been invited to tender have submitted to the jurisdiction of the United Kingdom courts.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 5 March, Official Report, columns 88-89, to the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West, on what date he expects the shortlisted candidates for purchasing the insurance services group of the Export Credits Guarantee Department to visit the insurance services group headquarters in Cardiff.

Mr. Sainsbury: There will be different dates for each short-listed candidate. The precise dates are currently under discussion with the short-listed companies, but the visits are expected to take place during April.

Salmon

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the likely increase in imports of Norwegian farmed salmon following the imposition of United States tariffs on imports to the United States of America; and of the impact of these Norwegian imports on the United Kingdom salmon farming industry.

Mr. Sainsbury: The final determination in the United States anti-dumping case against farmed salmon from Norway has yet to be made by the US International Trade Commission. It is not possible to quantify the effect which the eventual decision in this case may have on Norwegian exports of farmed salmon.

However, in recommending the termination of the anti-dumping case brought in the European Community by Scottish and Irish salmon producers, the Commission has agreed to follow closely the export of Norwegian farmed salmon to the Community and, if necessary, to initiate further discussions with the Norwegian Government.

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress is being made with the European Community anti-dumping investigation into farmed salmon from Norway.

Mr. Sainsbury: Following assurances given by the Norwegian Government on measures to stabilise the market in farmed salmon, the European Commission submitted a proposal to the Council of Ministers to close the investigation without remedy. The Commission has also agreed, at the request of the United Kingdom, to follow closely the export of Norwegian farmed salmon to the Community and, if necessary, to initiate further discussions with the Norwegian Government.

Export Controls

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn), Official Report, 22 January, columns 118-19, he will list the dates and locations of the seminars on export controls to which he makes reference; and if he will indicate the number and types of companies in attendance; and if he will make a statement on the outcome of the seminars.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 28 February 1991]: DTI non-proliferation seminars have been held this year in Southampton (17 January), Manchester (31 January) and London (5 February), and were attended by 30, 52 and 160 delegates respectively. A broad cross-section of United Kingdom industry was represented, with particularly strong participation from the electronics and defence industries. The programme of non-proliferation seminars will continue through the remainder of this year and events are already planned for Edinburgh (18 April), Bristol (4 June) and Birmingham (11 June).

I am satisfied that the seminars are making a valuable contribution to heightening awareness about the risks of clandestine procurement activities and explaining export controls.

The Gulf

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to what address smaller firms in the construction and in the catering equipment industry should address their inquiries for supply of goods and services to Kuwait and the Gulf states.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 7 March 1991]: All inquiries on project business should be directed to the DTI's projects and export policy division in 1-19 Victoria street London SW1. Telephone 071 215 5381/4887.

All other inquiries should be made to the Kuwait desk in the DTI's overseas trade division. Telephone 071 215 5491/4388/5081/5221/4246. (Address as above).

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to introduce smaller specialist United Kingdom companies and skilled persons to the purchasing authorities in Kuwait and the Gulf states.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 7 March 1991]: The Government of Kuwait have been made aware of the range of experience and capabilities available from British industry in the prospectus presented to them during the visit to Ta'if last month of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary with senior business men. At this early stage in the reconstruction of Kuwait it is not possible to advise on opportunities for supplying specific goods and services. My Department is keeping a list of companies which have expressed interest in opportunities in Kuwait and will provide relevant information through the export intelligence service (EIS) when it becomes available. Companies that do not already subscribe to the EIS are advised to do so and to ask to be profiled for Kuwait. Smaller firms should register their interest with the Crown Agents and should also explore the possibilities for sub-contracting to larger companies with experience in the Gulf. Companies which formerly had agents in Kuwait should seek to re-establish contact with them or with agents in other Gulf markets. The normal export services of my Department remain available to assist exporters to other Gulf markets. Persons seeking employment in Kuwait should register their interest with the Employment Service overseas placing unit in Sheffield.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Escapees

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether Olutayo Akinkunmi, who escaped from Spring Hill on 13 January 1990, has since been recaptured; and whether his offence was drug related;

(2) whether Olutayo Akinkunmi, and Mojeed Gbadegesin Osinboyejo, who escaped from Spring Hill on 13 January 1990 and 15 April 1990, and Mercades Cano who escaped from Askew Grange on 18 August 1990, have since been recaptured.

Mrs. Rumbold: Mojeed Osinboyejo and Mercades Cano are still unlawfully at large.

Olutayo Akinkunmi was sentenced at Reading crown court on 6 September 1988 to two and a half years' imprisonment for the illegal importation of drugs (herbal cannabis). He absconded from Spring Hill open prison on 13 January 1990 and was recaptured on 13 May 1990. He was deported on his release from prison on 16 July 1990.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, further to his answers of 25 February, Official Report, column 398, 28 February, Official Report, column 568, and 1 March, Official Report, column 648, on recaptures of escaped prisoners, what sentences the escapers had been given; and how much had been served, in each case.

Mrs. Rumbold: Maureen Amaker Mgbadike was sentenced to three years' imprisonment and had served 10 months of her sentence when she absconded.

Desiree Adina Caesar was sentenced to five years' imprisonment and had served one year one month and 11days of her sentence when she absconded.

Nana Adoma Frimpomaah was sentenced to five years' imprisonment and had served one year 23 days of her sentence when she absconded.

Abiodan Kafo was sentenced to six years' imprisonment and had served one year two months and 19 days of her sentence when she absconded.

Joke Lawal was sentenced to eight years' imprisonment and had served one year four months and 22 days of her sentence when she absconded.

Tina Tony Okpoye was sentenced to six years' imprisonment and had served one year two months and 25 days of her sentence when she absconded.

Agatha Ekwueme was sentenced to five years' imprisonment and had served 11 months and five days of her sentence when she absconded.

Tawakality Jaiyesimi was sentenced to six years' imprisonment and had served one year of her sentence when she absconded.

Bhagyawati Jain was sentenced to eight years' imprisonment and had served one year two months and 11 days of her sentence when she absconded.

Uche Angela Okeke was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment and had served one year four months and nine days of her sentence when she absconded.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis on the crime clear-up rate for 1990; and if he will publish in the Official Report the number of crimes cleared up in the Metropolitan area in each of the past two years.

Mr. John Patten: Figures published by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis show the clear up rate for notifiable offences recorded in the Metropolitan police district in 1990 was 17 per cent. and the number of crimes cleared up had risen from 131,400 in 1989 to 141,700 in 1990.

Police Pensions

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the annual expenditure for each of the years 1986 to 1990, inclusive, on ordinary police pensions; and how many of the officers receiving pensions during each of these years were compulsorily retired on account of age.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Expenditure on police pensions in England and Wales was as follows:

£ million

	Gross expenditure[1]	Police officers' contributions	Net expenditure
1986-87	386·9	163·4	223·5
1987-88	423·1	186·1	237·0
1988-89	457·0	203·3	253·7
1989-90	512·5	221·7	290·8

[1] Includes annual payments, commutations, net transfer values and refunds of contributions.

Information to answer the second part of the question is not held centrally.

Mr. Delbert Gordon

Mr. Sedgemore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the solicitor acting for Delbert Devon Gordon from Jamaica, Home Office reference G291458, was sent the explanatory statement for an appeal lodged in January 1990; when he intends to reply to the latest letter on this topic from the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch; and if he will make a statement about the reasons for the lengths of time involved in his Department's dealings in this matter.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: There are substantial backlogs of appeals awaiting preparation of explanatory statements and these have regrettably delayed work on Mr. Gordon's case. However, the statement has been prepared and will be despatched to the appellate authorities very shortly. I will write to the hon. Member when this has been done. The appellate authorities will make arrangements for the explanatory statement to be forwarded to the appellant's nominated representative.

Commission for Racial Equality

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the outcome of the recent post office investigation into leaked documents at the Commission for Racial Equality; and what was the cost of the investigation and who paid for it.

Mrs. Rumbold: I understand that the outcome of this post office investigation was inconclusive and no action was taken. The cost, paid by the Commission for Racial Equality, was £2,303.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make a statement on the number of redundancies declared under the recent restructuring proposals at the Commission for Racial Equality, giving an ethnic and gender breakdown.

Mrs. Rumbold: I understand that three officers took compulsory early retirement or severance because of the recent structural changes at the Commission for Racial Equality. All were men—one African, one Asian and one white.

TRANSPORT

Red Routes

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will state the appointed establishment in personnel he expects as a consequence of the appointment of the traffic director of London red routes and any other additions to departmental staff; and what increase he expects in net costs over current costs of parking control.

Mr. Chope: As to the establishment of the traffic director I refer the hon. Member to the explanatory and financial memorandum accompanying the Road Traffic Bill. I do not expect any permanent addition to departmental staff. The cost of enforcing the arrangements for on-street parking in London proposed in connection with the Road Traffic Bill cannot be estimated at this stage, but it is intended that enforcement action by the local authorities should be self financing.

London Traffic

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to publish his draft statutory objectives for the proposed London directors of traffic and the draft statutory guidance for traffic management and parking, respectively, as required by clauses 42, 43 and 54 of the Road Traffic Bill as at Third Reading in the House of Commons.

Mr. Chope: In the autumn.

Fuel Efficiency

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures the Government are taking to ensure that fuel efficiency is promoted in car advertisements.

Mr. Chope: I have recently held discussions with the Advertising Standards Authority, which is now taking a more active role in controlling advertisements that stress high speed. This should have benefits in terms of both safety and fuel efficiency.

Wherever a new vehicle is offered for sale, the results of its official fuel consumption test are required by law to be displayed. Dealers are also required to have available my Department's publication "New Car Fuel Consumption —The Official Figures". This enables different models to be compared.

British Rail Land

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what land he has purchased within the past two years within the Wakefield constituency from British Rail.

Mr. McLoughlin: No such land has been purchased within the past two years.

London Airports

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy that no use will be made of Northolt airport for any present or future overflow traffic from Heathrow; what plans he has to extend current civil and commercial traffic using Northolt airport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: It is the Government's policy that airliners should take precedence at Heathrow and Gatwick, and that smaller airports around London should cater for business aviation operations displaced from the two major airports. There are no specific proposals to increase the use of Northolt by civil aircraft.

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what effect the decision to abolish rules 1, 2 and 3 of the traffic distribution rules for airports will have on the number of permitted air traffic movements at RAF Northolt.

Mr. McLoughlin: None.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has for the reduction of aircraft noise over Ealing, Hanwell, Perivale, Greenford and Northolt; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: Older, noisier jet aircraft (the so-called chapter 2 types) will be progressively phased out over the next decade. That will mean individual aircraft will increasingly be only of the quieter types, which are less intrusive, and as a result the noise climate will improve.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to allow night flights at Heathrow airport after 1993; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: When the present night restrictions were introduced, their objective was to improve the night noise climate around Heathrow and Gatwick without imposing unnecessary restrictions on the airline industry. That objective will be the starting point when we review the current night restrictions. As announced on 12 July 1990 we are conducting a major research project on the effect of aircraft noise on sleep. Its conclusions will be taken into account in the review.

EMPLOYMENT

Genetically Modified Organisms

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many laboratories have been registered as being in containment category 4; and how many projects using genetically modified organisms at containment level 4 have been approved in the last five years.

Mr. Forth: Eighteen centres with category 4 containment facilities are registered as having notified the Health and Safety Executive under the Health and Safety (Dangerous Pathogens) Regulations 1981.

No work involving the use of genetically modified organisms at level 4 containment has been notified under the Genetic Manipulation Regulations 1989.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many industrial large-scale plants using genetically modified organisms have been notified to the Health and Safety Executive in the last 10 years; and how many were GILSP containment category 1, 2 or 3.

Mr. Forth: Notification of the large-scale use of genetically modified organisms was only made mandatory in 1989. Since 1989, 38 centres have notified the Health and Safety Executive of work with genetically modified organisms classified as requiring good large-scale practice. No distinction is made between industrial and non-industrial large scale notifications.

Since 1989, one centre has notified work in large scale categories 1 to 3.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many laboratories have been registered as being in containment category 3; and how many projects using genetically modified organisms at containment level 3 have been approved in the last five years.

Mr. Forth: There is no requirement in United Kingdom law to notify containment level 3 facilities for naturally occurring pathogens.

Since 1989, three projects have been notified to the Health and Safety Executive for work with genetically modified organisms at level 3 containment.

Silicosis

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what action his office proposes to prevent the recurrence of the disease silicosis in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: The Health and Safety Commission is currently consulting with employers, trades unions and other interested parties on a proposal to set a maximum exposure limit of 0·4mg/m3 for respirable crystalline silica which is the main causative agent of silicosis. Such a limit, enforced under the Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Regulations 1988, should ensure very stringent control of exposure to respirable crystalline silica throughout industry.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Building Control Fees

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the level of building control inspection fees and planning fees since 1980; and if it is his intention to increase the fees during the incoming financial year.

Mr. Hanley: Building control inspection fees were introduced in 1982 and increased in 1984, 1987 and 1990. Details of the charges are contained in tables 1 to 4 of SR 1982 No. 392, SR 1983 No. 388, SR 1986 No. 331 and SR 1989 No. 420. It is the Government's intention to consult later this year on a proposal to increase fees for prescribed building control functions during the financial year 1991-92.

Housing Executive Dwellings

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many Housing Executive dwellings in (i) Coleraine, (ii) Magherafelt and (iii) Limavady council districts were system built; in which estates in each council district they are located; how many have been (a) replaced or (b) refurbished in each estate; how many is it intended to replace over the next five years; and what type of construction was used for these buildings.

Mr. Hanley: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but I have been advised by the chief executive that the information requested is as follows:

Council district	Estate/location	Number of system built dwellings	Type of construction	(a) Number replaced	(b) Number refurbished
1.
Coleraine borough council	The Heights Coleraine	138	No fines concrete	Nil	138

3.
Limavady borough council	Caman Park Ballykelly	29	Timber frame	Nil	Nil
Limavady borough council	Columbia Park Ballymonie	43	Cross wall	Nil	Nil

Note: At present the Northern Ireland Housing Executive has no plans to replace any of the above dwellings within the next five years.

Irish American Calendar

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the financial contribution made by Government Departments or public bodies to the publication of the Irish American 1991 calendar; and which Government Department or public body approved the commentary in the calendar.

Mr. Hanley: The financial contribution made by Government Departments and public bodies was 19,000 US dollars. The commentary, approved by each of the bodies represented, was aimed at promoting Northern Ireland for business and tourism.

Short Brothers

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what were the implications for the other budgets within the department of Economic Development of expenditure on the privatisation of Short's.

Mr. Hanley: The costs associated with the privatisation of Short Brothers plc did not have any implications for other expenditure programmes undertaken by the Department of Economic Development. Additional funding as necessary was provided to the Department for this purpose.

Local Government Boundaries

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will request the Local Government Boundary Commissioner to consider the grouping of wards into district electoral areas while he is preparing his recommendations arising from his review of local government boundaries in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: It would require a change to the statutory remit of the Local Government Boundaries Commissioner to enable him to group wards into district electoral areas. My right hon. Friend intends to review the procedure for determining boundaries at the earliest opportunity but it would not be practicable to undertake such a review at present without unduly delaying the work of the commissioner.

Student Loans

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the total number of students attending all designated courses for student loans who are potentially eligible for student loans in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 7 March 1991]: The most recent estimate for the academic year 1990-91 of the number of students domiciled in Northern Ireland who are eligible for a loan is 27,000.

Loan-bearing courses do not require designation if they are at institutions receiving support from public funds. The Department of Education for Northern Ireland may designate as loan-bearing courses of higher education at other institutions under regulation 4 of the Education (Student Loans) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1990.

WALES

Community Charge

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest figures for the money provided by his Department under the community charge reduction scheme for (a) Cardiff and (b) the other Welsh districts.

Mr. David Hunt: In 1991-92, £62 million will be distributed under the community charge reduction scheme to 67 per cent. of chargepayers in Wales. In Cardiff £5,339,064 will be distributed and the latest figures for each Welsh district are given in the following table:

Orimulsion

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what representations he has received regarding burning of orimulsion at Ince power station; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will list the organisations which have contacted his Department expressing opposition to the use of orimulsion at the Ince power station.

Mr. Baldry: I have been asked to reply.

I have received a number of representations about burning orimulsion at Ince power station. A letter from Friends of the Earth Cymru was forwarded to my Department by my hon. Friend the Member for Conwy (Sir W. Roberts) on 17 September 1990. A letter from Gwynedd county council was forwarded to my Department by the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Dr. Thomas) on 19 September.

I have also received representations from the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) and the hon. Member, both of which were received on 24 September.

Representations have also been made by Friends of the Earth to the Chester regional office of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Betting

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will list the sums received per annum by way of betting and other duty by Her Majesty's Government on (a) off-course and on-course betting, (b) amusement machines, (c) casinos, (d) bingo, (e) football pools and (f) small lotteries.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: In the year ended 31 March 1990, receipts from betting and gaming duties were:

	£ million
Off-course betting	459
On-course betting	Nil
Amusement machines	Nil
Gaming machines ie amusement with prizes and jackpot machines	97
Casino gaming	50
Bingo	66
Football pools	304
Small lotteries	Nil

Local Government Finance

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish details of the latest assumptions used in the public expenditure planning process as to the likely level of (a) housing capital receipts and (b) other capital receipts generated by local authorities in (i) England, (ii) Scotland, (iii) Wales and (iv) Northern Ireland in each of the planning years 1991-92, 1992-93 and 1993-94.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 4 March 1991]: The Government do not plan local authorities' self-financed expenditure or capital receipts. The outlook for spending from local authorities' own resources is however taken into consideration during the annual public expenditure survey, although estimates of receipts are used only in respect of the forthcoming year. During the 1990 survey, it was estimated in broad terms that local authorities in England might generate the following levels of receipts in 1991-92 in respect of services within the English local authority block:

	£ billion
Housing	1·8
Other	1·1

Levels of local authority capital receipts in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland are not considered in the survey as these territories receive consequentials of the relevant parts of the English settlement.

Electricity Companies

Mr. Beith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 16 January, Official Report, column 509, whether he will state the grounds on which costs incurred by the electricity distribution companies in their change of ownership were regarded as general overheads of their business.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 7 March 1991]: As I explained in my previous reply, the shares of the electricity distribution companies were issued and sold on behalf of the Secretary of State for Energy, who received all the proceeds.

There was therefore no supply of shares by electricity distribution companies to which input tax was attributable. Any related costs incurred by the companies as a consequence fell to be treated with other non-attributable costs as general overheads of the business.

Income Tax

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing how many people face marginal tax rates, both including and excluding social security, of (a) over 40 per cent., (b) over 50 per cent., (c) over 60 per cent., (d) over 70 per cent., (e) over 80 per cent., (f) over 90 per cent., and (g) over 100 per cent., (i) now and (ii) in each year since 1978-79.

Mr. Jack [holding answer 25 February 1991]: Information is available only for marginal deduction rates including social security. Such information as is available is contained in the table.

Numbers with marginal deduction rates at or above each level (thousands)

	1985-86	1988-89	1989-90	1990-91
100 per cent. +	70	0	0	0
90 per cent. +	130	45	45	45
80 per cent. +	290	345	210	235

	1985-86	1988-89	1989-90	1990-91
70 per cent. +	290	515	415	395
60 per cent. +	450	515	420	400
50 per cent. +	680	515	420	400
40 per cent. +	n/a	n/a	455	670

Notes:

1. Figures are based on pooled family expenditure survey data and are cumulative.
2. Calculated for benefit units in receipt of income-related benefits where at least one partner works 24 hours per week or more.

SCOTLAND

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he has taken to recruit members of ethnic minorities in top grades of employment at the Lord Advocate's Department.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Responsibility for the recruitment of senior grades lies with the Civil Service Commission. Grade 1 to 7 posts in the Lord Advocate's Department are almost exclusively staffed by lawyers. The extent to which ethnic minority groups are represented in the legal profession in Scotland is mirrored in recruitment.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many and what percentage of officers in each grade (1 to 7) and overall in the Lord Advocate's Department are (a) women and (b) from ethnic minorities, respectively.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: As at 1 April 1990 there were 1,087 employees in the Lord Advocate's Department. Of this number 707 (65 per cent.) were women and 4 (0·3 per cent.) from ethnic minorities. The breakdown within grades 1 to 7 is as follows:

Grades	Total number of employees	Women		Ethnic minorities
		Number	Percentage	Number	Percentage
1-4	15·5	nil	(0)	nil	(0)
5	32·5	2	(6·1)	nil	(0)
6	40·0	3	(7·5)	nil	(0)
7	118·0	48	(40·6)	1	(0·8)

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when the Lord Advocate's Department last conducted a survey of the ethnic origins of its employees; when it next plans to do so; and whether he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Following the 1987 survey the employment of persons from ethnic minorities is constantly monitored at all grades. There are no plans to make a statement at this time.

Electricity Privatisation

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his latest estimate of the total cost of the privatisation of the electricity industry in Scotland; how much is expected to be spent on (a) pre-sale costs, including marketing and (b) direct sale costs, including stamp duty and underwriting fees in each financial year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Expenditure on electricity privatisation in Scotland is published annually in the Appropriation Accounts. The annual outturn figures in respect of pre-sale costs are as follows:

1987-88	616,000
1988-89	2,111,000
1989-90	3,811,000

For 1990-91 £9·5 million has been provided to cover both pre-sale and direct sale costs. Direct sale costs will be announced after the sale in the usual way.

The costs involved are small by comparison with the expected proceeds from the sale.

Enterprise Companies

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will show the planned expenditure for the new local enterprise companies for 1991-92 as distributed between training and economic development.

Mr. Allan Stewart: These are operational matters for Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise and I have asked the chairmen to write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the planned expenditure of Scottish Enterprise for (a) economic development and (b) training in 1991-92; and what were the equivalent figures in 1990-91.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Details of planned expenditure for Scottish Enterprise in 1991-92 together with equivalent figures for 1990-91 were published in table 3.6 of the Scottish Office departmental report "Serving Scotland's Needs" (Cm. 1515). The figures in that table for 1991-92 do not include the increases announced by my right hon. Friend on 2 February and 26 February. A breakdown of total expenditure which includes the £9·6 million announced on 2 February will be published in the Supply Estimates; but those estimates will not include the additional £13·6 million for employment training announced on 26 February, which will feature in a supplementary estimate to be taken later in the year.

For the reasons explained in my reply to the hon. Member on Wednesday 19 December 1990 full details of planned expenditure on training in Scotland in 1990-91 are not available. The relevant figures published in table 3.6 of "Serving Scotland's Needs" are estimates of comparable Scottish Office estimate provision for training expenditure within the Scottish Enterprise area.

HEALTH

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his initiative to reduce hospital waiting lists.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It is the time patients wait for treatment which is important, not total numbers on the list. I am pleased to inform the hon. Member that about half of all national health service in-patients are admitted immediately and that of the remainder, half are admitted within five weeks. The problem of excessive waiting times is therefore concentrated on a minority of national health service patients. We are continuing the special waiting list fund in 1991-92 with a further £35 million to tackle this problem. Regions will match their allocations pound for pound bringing to £60 million the amount which will be available to reduce the number of patients who wait excessively long. £9 million from the fund has been earmarked for 80 of the worst lists in the country, which are to be investigated by a team from Qa Business Services.

The National Health Service management executive is agreeing targets with all 14 regional health authorities for substantial reductions in the numbers of long waiters by March 1992.

Product Licences

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to reduce the average time taken to grant product licences.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: During the past year the Medicines Control Agency (MCA) has been reorganised into separate businesses, licensing procedures have been streamlined and additional professional staff have been allocated to licensing work. As a result there have been substantial improvements in the agency's performance.

The agency is justifiably proud of its' position as the fastest licensing authority in the world for new drug substances. It wishes to retain this position. The director of the Medicines Control Agency has recently reported that it has actively sought to improve its performance in this area over the past 12 months.

In the abridged (established drug substances) licensing area there has also been considerable progress. The time to reach a licensing decision on standard and complex applications has reduced from 16 months in September 1990 to 10 months in January 1991 and will be further reduced to four months by April 1992. For those applications which have to be submitted to a committee set up under section 4 of the Medicines Act 1968 the time taken has reduced from 19 months in September 1990 to 13 months in January this year and will be seven months by April 1992. These are net times and do not include the time industry may take, often significant, to respond to questions raised by the agency about their applications.

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average time taken to grant product licences for parallel imports.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: During the seven months from 1 January 1990 to 31 July 1990, the latest period for which figures are available, the average time taken from date of application to date of grant of a parallel import licence was 18 months.

Medical Products

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to propose to the European Commission that products under article 5 of the draft directive on the legal status of the supply of medical products for human use should be listed on the assumption that products with the same brand name in different member states are identical unless the manufacturers otherwise specify.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No. Under current proposals the draft directive on the classification of medicinal products for human use requires member states to publish a list of products subject on their territory to medical prescription and to communicate the list to the Commission and to other member states. The form in which the list would be produced is still the subject of negotiation.

Medicines Control Agency

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will reintroduce a turnover-related element into the Medicines Control Agency fee system.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: In the course of its full review of the fee structure, the Medicines Control Agency (MCA) has been considering a number of options. The MCA will be publishing its proposals shortly.

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he has any plans to meet the chairman of the Association of Pharmaceutical Importers to discuss the accountability of the Medicines Control Agency.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No, but I understand that the chairman of the Association of Pharmaceutical Importers has had informal discussions with Medicines Control Agency officials and a further meeting is planned.

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received about the upper limit on turnover for companies to be eligible for the payment concessions from the Medicines Control Agency.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have received a number of representations that the limit on turnover, which allow companies to qualify for concessions in time for payment, should be raised. We are considering these in the full review of the Medicines Control Agency's fee structure.

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received calling for the Medicines Control Agency fee structure to be amended; if he has any proposals to amend the fee structure; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: A number of representations have been received suggesting that the Medicines Control Agency's fee structure should be amended. The Medicines Control Agency has been carrying out a full review of its fee structure. New proposals should be published shortly.

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what mechanisms there are for hon. Members to raise the question of particular outstanding applications to the Medicines Control Agency.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It is open to hon. Members to write to Ministers at any time to inquire on behalf of an applicant about progress of a particular application. Information about a licence application is, however, commercial in confidence and cannot be divulged without the permission of the applicant.

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps are being taken to ensure that the Medicines Control Agency processes product licence (parallel imports) licence applications quickly and effectively.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: From April 1990 the number of staff employed on product licence (parallel import) applications has been increased and procedures have been streamlined follwing the re-organisation of the Medicines Control Agency into separate businesses. The director of the Medicines Control Agency has recently announced in a speech to the British Institute of Regulatory Affairs the objective of eliminating all licence backlogs by April 1992.

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy for the Medicines Control Agency to give an explanation if a product licence application is outstanding for more than six months.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No. It is open to applicants to inquire to the Medicines Control Agency about the progress of their applications at any time. In addition, information on the time taken to grant licences is published by the MCA at regular intervals in the Medicines Act information leaflet.

Association of Pharmaceutical Importers

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he plans to invite the Association of Pharmaceutical Importers to join the joint consultative group; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No. the joint consultative group exists to provide an informal discussion forum comprising senior representatives of the Department, the Medicines Control Agency and the two principal trade associations. If it were expanded to cover other interested trade associations it could not function in that informal way.

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he last met the chairman of the Association of Pharmaceutical Importers; and what matters were discussed.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have had no formal meetings with the chairman of the Association of Pharmaceutical Importers.

Mental Illness

Mr. Sims: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people have been discharged from institutions for the mentally ill into community care since 1979; and what information he has as to how many of these people are amongst these currently classified as homeless.

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his latest estimate of the number of people discharged from (a) long-stay mental handicap and (b) long-stay mental illness hospitals since 1980.

Mr. Dorrell Information available centrally is given in the table. Figures up to 1986 exclude deaths and all transfers to other hospitals, while figures after 1986 only exclude deaths and transfers between hospitals within a district health authority.

Centrally collected figures are not available on the current whereabouts of persons with a mental illness discharged from national health service hospitals and hospital units.

Discharges from mental illness and mental handicap hospitals and units, in England 1979-89

Year	After a stay of one year or more		All durations of stay
	Mental illness	Mental handicap	Mental illness	Mental handicap
1979	3,460	1,178	149,027	15,760

Drugs

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are his estimates of the annual cost to the national health service of introducing original pack dispensing for generic pharmaceuticals and of the pharmacists' containers allowance.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It is not possible to estimate what the effect of introducing more original pack dispensing for generic pharmaceuticals might be on costs for the national health service.

The cost of the container allowance for the year 1 April 1989 to 31 March 1990 was £14·6 million.

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the proposed European Community directive on patient information leaflets for pharmaceuticals; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We support the principle of providing improved information to patients about their medicines as proposed by the EC.

Discussions on details are in progress.

Occupational Therapists

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many occupational therapists are employed by local authority social services departments in England; and what is the current vacancy rate.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: At 30 September 1989 the number of qualified occupational therapists employed in social services departments in England was 1,305 in whole-time equivalent (wte) terms. Of these, 65 staff (wte) were employed in capacities other than that of occupational therapist, for example, senior management.

Information on the numbers of vacancies for occupational therapists in social services departments is not collected centrally.

Respite Care

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list, for each local authority social services department in England, the number of respite care beds provided in (a) residential care homes and (b) hostels.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not collected centrally.

Home Helps

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hours of home help service were provided by local authority social services departments in each year from 1979-80 to 1989-90.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Information about hours of home help service is not collected centrally. The numbers of home helps employed by social services departments in England in whole-time equivalent terms at 30 September in each year are set out in the table.

	Number
1979	44,660
1980	46,637
1981	46,541
1982	47,310
1983	49,326
1984	50,561
1985	51,959
1986	53,706
1987	56,336
1988	57,004

Abortion

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has about administrative arrangements in London district health authorities for getting women who want abortions into the queue.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not collected centrally.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has received any representations about the availability of abortion services in London.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Yes. Arrangements for the provision of abortion services within the national health service are the responsibility of individual health authorities. Queries of a local nature should be taken up with the chairman or general manager of the health authority concerned.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list (a) for each of the last four years and (b) for each London district health authority the average waiting time for abortions.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The available information is for the year 1987-88 and relates to waiting time for admissions for the category "legally induced abortion". For each of the four Thames regional health authorities the average, as expressed by the median waiting time, was one week. Reliable information is not available on a district basis.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list (a) for each of the last four years and (b) for each London district health authority the number of abortions carried out.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The number of abortions performed on residents of the London district health authorities can be found as part of table 24a of OPCS annual review volumes "Abortion Statistics". These are published in series AB and copies are in the Library. The latest year for which data are available is 1989.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has issued guidelines about procedures for referrals for abortions.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave her on 28 January at column 429.

Interleukin II

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospitals are (a) currently conducting a clinical trial of Interleukin II or (b) prescribing Interleukin II on a named patient basis; and if he will list the hospitals concerned.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: For reasons of confidentiality information held by the Medicines Licensing Authority about clinical trials cannot be divulged. The Department does not have information about the use of drugs on a named patient basis.

Maternity Cases

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will list for the most recent year for England and for each national health service region the percentage of women whose deliveries were (i) at a domestic address, (ii) in a consultant ward of a national health service hospital, (iii) in a general practitioner ward of a national health service hospital, (iv) in a combined consultant/general practitioner ward of a national health service hospital, (v) in a private hospital, (vi) in another hospital or institution and (vii) elsewhere;

(2) if he will list for the most recent year for England and for each national health service region the percentage of women who had (i) general anaesthesia, (ii) epidural or caudal anaesthesia, (iii) spinal anaesthesia, (iv) combinations of these methods of anaesthesia and (v) none of these methods of anaesthesia during labour or delivery;

(3) if he will list for the most recent year for England and for each national health service region the percentage of women (i) whose labours were surgically induced, (ii) whose labours were induced by oxytocic drugs, (iii) whose labours were induced by a combination of surgical methods and oxytocic drugs, (iv) whose labours were of spontaneous onset and (v) who had elective caesarean sections;

(4) if he will list for the most recent year for England and for each national health service region the percentage of women whose deliveries were conducted by (a) a hospital doctor, (b) a general practitioner, (c) a midwife and (d) a person other than a doctor or a midwife.

(5) if he will list for the most recent year for England and each national health service region the percentage of women whose deliveries were (a) spontaneous, including abnormal presentation of the head and breech spontaneous, (b) instrumental including forceps, ventouse and breech extractions, (c) caesarean sections and (d) by other and unspecified means.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 22 February 1991]: The most recent information available is for 1988-89, the first year for which additional delivery details were collected in the hospital episode statistics system. Following are the national estimates derived from these data; in the case of place of delivery, it has not been possible to provide the precise breakdown requested. The national percentages should be treated as approximate figures and it is not possible to provide reliable regional estimates. Steps have been taken to improve quality and completeness of data which should reduce the level of approximation in later years and enable more detailed breakdowns to be made.

Residential Homes

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is his policy on allowing registration of private residential and nursing homes which refuse admission to residents who require income support to pay for their care;

(2) what information he has on how many registered private residential or nursing homes currently refuse admission to residents who require income support to pay for their care.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have no information about how many homes refuse admission to people requiring income support. Local authorities and health authorities are the registering authorities under the Registered Homes Act 1984. The Act sets out the criteria which enable a registration authority to refuse an application for registration. The admission of people who rely on income support is not among the criteria. There are no plans to seek amendment of the Act in this respect.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what mechanisms exist to determine whether those in nursing homes in receipt of income support top-up payments towards the costs of nursing care are actually receiving nursing care.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The person responsible for a nursing home has a statutory duty to provide adequate facilities and services to meet the care needs of their patients. District health authorities must inspect each home at least twice a year to ensure that this requirement is met.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the most recent guidance issued to registration authorities with regard to privacy in residential care and nursing homes; and if he has any proposals to issue further guidance.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The question of privacy is dealt with in the 1989 social services inspectorate guidance "Homes are for Living In" and is also being covered in the current publications in the "Caring for Quality" series, of which three have already been issued and a further two are to follow. Copies will be placed in the Library. The Department's caring in homes initiative will reinforce the emphasis on good practice in residential care homes.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

The Gulf

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what is his policy on the involvement of United States and British forces in future security arrangements for Gulf states;

(2) what is his policy on a security agreement for the Gulf area involving states in the region and other states; and if he will make a statement;

(3) whether he will make it his policy to ensure that the future security of the Gulf states is not based upon the armed forces of any one state in the region; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what is his policy on the involvement of north African states in the security of the Gulf region.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: New arrangements for the security of the Gulf states are matters for the states of the region themselves. We welcome the initiative taken by the Foreign Ministers of The Gulf Co-operation Council states, Egypt and Syria to discuss future security arrangements. We are ready to play our part if asked to do so.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to promote democracy amongst the Gulf states.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Constitutional arrangements in the Gulf states are a matter for their Governments and peoples.

As regards Kuwait, the national conference held in Jedda in October 1990 by the Government in exile and with delegations representing Kuwaiti opinion across the board, agreed that there should be a return to the provisions of the 1962 constitution as soon as possible after liberation. We have welcomed the Kuwaiti crown prince and Prime Minister's recent public reiteration of his Government's commitment of popular participation under this constitution, including new elections for the national assembly after liberation.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his policy on the role of the United Nations in the future security arrangements in the Gulf region.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: A lasting peace in the Gulf region must clearly provide for the security of Kuwait and the other countries of the Gulf. It will be for the countries of the region to reach agreement on the necessary arrangements. We would not rule out the deployment of UN military observers or peacekeeping forces in the area if that were their wish.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to achieve a complete withdrawal of United States and British forces from the Gulf region.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: It is our intention to withdraw British forces that have been involved in hostilities from the Gulf region as rapidly as possible.

We believe that it is for the countries of the region to take the lead in deciding future security arrangements.

The withdrawal of United States forces is a matter for the United States Government.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to extend military non-proliferation measures in the Gulf region.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Our immediate objective is to complete the restoration of international peace and security in the middle east. We shall be examining with our partners how best to limit the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction.

Northern Somalia

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on trade links with northern Somalia.

Mr. Sainsbury: I have been asked to reply.

United Kingdom trade with Somalia is not classified by region.

Figures on trade with Somalia can be obtained from "Overseas Trade Statistics Business Monitor MM20" tables II and V. A copy is available in the Library.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Social Fund

Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of their social fund budgets have been spent by both Barnsley offices of his Department in (a) 1989-90 and (b) 1990-91.

Mr. Scott: Details of local office budget allocations and expenditure are available in the Library.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will show for (1) Leeds West and (2) Leeds metropolitan district council area the number of applicants for and awards of (a) community care grants, (b) budgeting loans and (c) crisis loans and (i) the amounts awarded, (ii) the percentage refused and (iii) the average award.

Mr. Scott [holding answer 4 March 1991]: Information on average awards and the percentage of refusals for the period April 1990 to January 1991 is given in the tables. Other information requested by the hon. Member is available in the Library.

Average awards

	Budgeting loans £	Community care grants £	Crisis loans £

Leeds Metropolitan	207·00	315·60	45·80

Leeds West	36·1	64·9	2·1
Leeds Metropolitan	34·7	63·2	4·1

Independent Living Fund

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what relationship and liaison will be established between the independent living fund and the benefits agency upon the inception of the latter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: Discussions are now taking place between the director of the independent living fund and officers of the shadow benefits agency to draw up a service agreement. The aim is to reflect existing arrangements in the most sensible way without causing disruption either to the independent living fund or to the agency. The agreement will mainly cover personnel and administrative matters.

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many applications to the independent living fund have been submitted since 1 August 1990 (a) per calendar month and (b) in total.

Mr. Scott: The figures requested are:

Month	Applications
1990
August	635
September	458
October	512
November	545
December	373
1991
January	491

Residential Care

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what is his latest estimate of the number of claimants in receipt of income support payments towards the cost of care in (a) voluntary care homes, (b) private residential homes, (c) private nursing homes and (d) private homes with joint registration from each of his local offices;

(2) what is his latest estimate of the number of claimants in private homes with joint registration who receive income support payments towards the cost of (a) residential care and (b) nursing care.

Miss Widdecombe: This information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his policy on the continued payment of income support towards the cost of residential or nursing care to residents in homes which have been deregistered under the Registered Homes Act 1984 and where the management of the home concerned has been taken over by either (a) a local authority social services department or (b) a health authority.

Miss Widdecombe: Residents of a home managed by a local authority social services department would be treated as accommodated under part III of the National Assistance Act 1948 and residents of a home managed by a health authority would be treated as hospital in-patients; such people who were entitled to income support would receive the appropriate rates of benefit.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his latest estimate of the number of claimants in receipt of income support payments towards the cost of care in (a) voluntary care homes, (b) private residential homes, (c) private nursing homes and (d) private homes with joint registration.

Miss Widdecombe: Numbers are available only for all residential care homes and nursing homes.

	Number
Residential care	128,000
Nursing homes	71,000

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his latest estimate of the full annual cost of income support payments to residents in (a) voluntary care homes, (b) private residential homes, (c) private nursing homes and (d) private homes with joint registration.

Miss Widdecombe: Costs are available only for all residential care homes and nursing homes.

	£ million
Residential care	772
Nursing homes	618

Social Security Acts

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when it is his intention to introduce a Bill to consolidate the Social Security Acts 1975 to 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The Law Commission has responsibility for the consolidation of Bills.

The consolidation of the Social Security Acts 1975 to 1991 is currently under active consideration and the Law Commission is, of course, consulting with this Department. At present, it is not possible to say with any certainty when a Bill will be introduced.

Research Projects

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when and how he proposes to publish the research reports on consumer views of the attendance allowance medical examination, invalid care allowance, the preliminary study of people leaving certain long-stay institutions, consumer perceptions of personal pensions, information needs of informal advisers and housing benefit reviews, referred to in his answer to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North on 25 February, Official Report, columns 401-04.

Mr. Scott: Decisions have been reached in respect of two of the research subjects listed by the hon. Member. The preliminary study of people leaving certain long-stay institutions was a short information-gathering exercise only, and was not commissioned with a view to publication. Copies of the report on housing benefit reviews are available in the Library and the report will be published in the early summer.

Pollok Local Office

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what sites are under consideration for the planned Glasgow, Pollok local office; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The location of the preferred site is expected to be known in the near future.

Local Offices, Bradford

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what representations he has received about the closure of his Department's local offices in Bradford on 7 and 8 February; what arrangements were made during severe weather for emergency cover or provision to help families with children, without money; and if he will make a statement;

(2) why the after hours service was not operating when his Department's offices in Bradford were closed during the day this month; and on how many occasions and in what circumstances the after hours service declined to make home visits during February.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 28 February 1991]: All three Bradford offices closed two hours early on 7 February, and Bradford East and Bradford South did so again on 8 February. On both days staff ensured all urgent payments were made before they left for home, and the out-of-hours service began work at 6 pm. From 4 to 17 February a total of 152 requests for out of hours visits were received in the Bradford area, of which 41 were refused. Each decision that a visit was unnecessary was taken on the facts of the individual case. Bradford citizens advice bureau has complained about the closures, and I understand that the district manager designate for the Bradford group of offices has written to the hon. Member to inform him of his response and of the steps he is taking to keep caller facilities open should similar circumstances recur.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what instructions have been issued to the local Department of Social Security office out-of-hours service in Bradford concerning home visits.

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 28 February 1991]: Bradford local offices have copies of guidance on the Department's out of hours service. The guidance describes action to be taken when a referral is received. It is for the out of hours service officer to decide, on the facts of the case, whether a home visit payment is appropriate.

DEFENCE

The Gulf

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations have been received by his Department from families of forces personnel serving in the Gulf regarding inefficiencies in, and the cost of, the postal service from Britain to the Gulf.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer that I gave her on 6 March 1991 at columns 221-22.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest estimate of the costs of operations in the Gulf; and from which subheads of which votes these funds are taken.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The additional costs of the Gulf conflict, as so far assessed, are £1·75 billion. Indications are that the eventual costs may be up to £3 billion. Vote subheads which have borne or are likely to bear the additional costs of the Gulf conflict are:

Vote 1:
A1, A2, A3, B1, B2, B3, B4, BZ, C1, C2, C3, D1, D2, DZ, E1, E2, EZ, F1, F2, F3, F5, F6, F7, FZ, G1, G2, GZ, H1, H2, HZ, I1, L1, L2, L3, L5, L6, L7, L9, LZ.

Vote 2:[1]
E1, F1, F2, F3, F4, I2, J1, J2, J3, J4, J5, J7, J8, K1, L1, L2, M1, M2, M3, M4, M5, M6, N1

Vote 3:
A1, A2, A3, AZ.

Vote 4:
A1, A2.

Vote 5:
A1, A3.

[1] Costs have also fallen upon vote 2, sections A to D, but these cannot be attributed to individual subheads.

Mr. Ashton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many British military personnel were killed in the Gulf war; how many were injured; and how many of these were killed or injured by Iraqi forces.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Seventeen British servicemen are confirmed to have been killed and 43 injured in action. Of these, nine have been been confirmed killed and 11 injured in a single incident, when a US A-10 aircraft attacked two Warrior armoured vehicles. The circumstances surrounding the other casualties are still under investigation. Eight British servicemen are still missing in action.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps are taken to allow independent groups to assess whether Iraqi prisoners of war being held in Saudi Arabia are being treated to the standards set out in the Geneva convention.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The International Committee of the Red Cross has full access to Iraqi prisoners of war in Saudi Arabia, as required by the third Geneva convention.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether any NATO-assigned munitions from RAF Welford are being used by B52 aircraft operating from the United Kingdom to bomb targets in the Gulf.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: This is a matter for the United States Government.

Dubai Defence Exhibition

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many applications his Department has received from defence manufacturers for temporary export licences for equipment or technology to exhibit at the Dubai '91 aerospace and defence exhibition planned to be held in November.

Mr. Alan Clark: Applications for temporary export licences are made to the Department of Trade and Industry.

Arms Sales

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will now make it his policy to answer questions tabled by hon. Members relating to the benefits accruing to British arms manufacturers and defence material producers arising from his Department's procurement and arms sales promotion activities.

Mr. Alan Clark: I see no reason to change the policy of this and previous Administrations on answering such questions.

Hunting

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the total revenue paid to his Ministry from the annual fees paid for licences issued to allow hunting on his Ministry's land.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Total receipts in 1990-91 from annual hunting licence fees were £75. The Ministry of Defence also recover the costs of preparing and issuing new licences, but figures for receipts are not held centrally.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many licences have been issued to allow hare coursing to take place on his Ministry's land.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: None.

Glengarry Radio System

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what date the decision was taken to cancel the extremely low frequency radio system that had been proposed for Glengarry, Scotland.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) on 14 February 1991 at column 592.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans his Department has for a proposed extremely low frequency radio system to be sited somewhere other than Glengarry, Scotland.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: None.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the total cost to date of the extremely low frequency radio system that had been proposed for Glengarry, Scotland; and from which subheads of which votes these funds were taken.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: It is not our practice to give specific details of moneys spent on individual research programmes. The minimal costs associated with work to date have been borne on votes allocated for defence research.

RAF Fairford (Explosives)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether local fire brigades are informed when explosives destined for RAF Fairford are transported through their areas.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: All local emergency services have been notified in the recent movements of explosives destined for RAF Fairford.

B52 Bombers

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what measures will be taken, in the event of a B52 in-flight emergency shortly after take off, to inform the local fire brigades responsible for the areas between RAF Fairford and the munitions dumping ground off Hartland point.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: None.

Low Flying

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many low flying sorties were flown in the United Kingdom low-flying system in each calendar month of 1990.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: For the number of low-flying sorties carried out between January and August 1990, I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on 1 November 1990 at column 766. The number of low-flying sorties carried out in the United Kingdom for the remainder of 1990 is as follows:

Month	Number
September	11,361
October	13,166
November	11,834
December	6,330

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many low-flying sorties were flown in the United Kingdom low-flying system in January.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: In January 1991, 8,990 sorties were flown in the United Kingdom low-flying system.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many low-flying sorties were flown at a height of less than 250 ft in the United Kingdom low-flying system in each calendar month of 1990.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Figures for sorties that have been flown below 250 ft are not available, but figures for the number of movements authorised for flying below 250 ft in the three United Kingdom tactical training areas in each calendar month of 1990 are as follows:

1990

Month	Number
January	227
February	374
March	864
April	336
May	525
June	82
July	75
August	701
September	834
October	815
November	861
December	233

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many low-flying sorties were flown at a height of less than 250 ft in the United Kingdom low-flying system in January.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: In January 1991, 330 movements below 250 ft were authorised in the three United Kingdom tactical training areas.

Holy Loch Base

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether any facilities will remain on standby at Holy Loch after the proposed closure of the base by the United States Navy.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Detailed closure arrangements for the Holy Loch submarine support facility have not been finalised. However, though the Holy Loch's use for future periodic submarine visits is possible, we do not currently expect that any facilities will be retained on a standby basis after closure.

USAF (Explosives)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what regulations cover the transportation of explosives belonging to the United States Air Force in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Movements of US-owned explosives are subject to the normal regulations governing the transport of explosives in the United Kingdom. These are: for road movement, the Road Traffic (Carriage of Explosives) Regulations 1989—Statutory Instrument 1989 No. 615; for rail, the Conditions of Acceptance and Carriage by Rail of Military Explosives 1990 (BR 22206/2, The Red Book); and for ports, the Dangerous Substances in Harbour Areas Regulations 1987—Statutory Instrument 1987 No. 37.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether movements of explosives around the United Kingdom by the United States Air Force are escorted by any personnel from his Department.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No.

RAF Upper Heyford

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the scheduled date for resurfacing the runway at RAF Upper Heyford.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is not the practice to publish information of this kind.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Animal Experiments

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many animals, by species, were killed during the last year for which details are available specifically for the provision of cell or tissue material for research or experimental purposes.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 controls scientific procedures only on living animals and no statistics are collected of animals killed by the exempted methods set out in schedule 1 to the 1986 Act for in vitro work.

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action his Department proposes in respect of those recommendations of the Medical Research Council inquiry team investigating the conduct of experiments on animals by Professor Wilhelm Feldberg at the National Institute for Medical Research laboratories, Mill Hill, London, which relate to the functions and decisions of the Home Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Home Office accepts the Medical Research Council inquiry report's finding that, as a result of a failure by Professor Feldberg and Mr. Stean to maintain anaesthesia of sufficient depth, up to four rabbits were caused avoidable suffering.

Primary responsibility for ensuring that procedures regulated by the Animal (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 are carried out properly at an establishment lies with the holder of the certificate of designation. In the light of the report, officials have discussed with the certificate holder for the National Institute for Medical Research proposals for improving the management, control and monitoring of animals procedures at the institute, which he is now considering. We have also asked the MRC for the evidence of the alleged deliberate breaches of the Act referred to in the report.

As for the two recommendations contained in the report relating to the Home Office, initial proposals have been put to the Animal Procedures Committee about the position of aging licensees and we shall consider what action may be necessary when the committee has completed its consideration of the issues arising from this case.

We do not accept the recommendation in the report for an increase in the number of animal (scientific procedures) inspectors. Although the report suggests that inspectors should be more closely involved in monitoring the treatment of animals during experiments, this is principally the responsibility of personal licensees, who have a duty under the law for the care of their animals. It would be impractical to expect inspectors to be present whenever animal procedures are carried out.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is the estimate of the number of wild-caught primates, by species, currently held in British scientific institutions for the purposes of experimentation;

(2) how many wild-caught primates were used in the United Kingdom in each of the last three years for experimental purposes.

Mrs. Rumbold: Statistics about the origin of primates held or used are not kept centrally. In general, smaller primates, like marmosets, are bred in captivity. Primates larger than rhesus or cynomolgous monkeys are difficult to breed successfully in captivity, even abroad.

Wildlife Protection

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what specific provision is made in each of the police authorities in Wales for the enforcement of wildlife protection legislation.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the chief constables in each of the police forces in Wales that each force has well-established liaison arrangements with those other agencies which have an interest in wildlife protection. The allocation of resources to the enforcement of wildlife protection legislation is a matter for chief officers.

Escapees

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department from which prison Lydia A. Gyamifi escaped on 8 February 1988; and whether she has since been recaptured.

Mrs. Rumbold: Lydia A. Gyamifi absconded from Her Majesty's prison Askham Grange and is still unlawfully at large.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answers to the right hon. Member for Swansea, West of 28 February and 1 March, Official Report, columns 568 and 648, on recapture of escapees, which of the escapees were on drug-related offences, which of the escapees were in debt to the courts; and which escapees' passports are in the possession of his Department.

Mrs. Rumbold: The 10 women concerned had all been convicted of drug offences. None is known to have been in debt to the courts at the time of absconding from prison. The passports of five of the 10 women are in the possession of the Home Office.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the Metropolitan police precept for 1990-91 per community charge payer, and also the police precept per community charge payer for each of the English counties.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The Metropolitan police precept for 1990-91 was 112·79 per head of relevant population. County police forces in England and Wales do not produce identifiable precepts; their budgets form part of the expenditure of the relevant county councils, which precept on the community charge collection fund for the totality of their needs.

Welsh Police Forces

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the present state of the police forces in Wales.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information is set out in the table:

	Police strength[1]	Establishment[2]	Civilian strength[1]	Number of officers returned to operational duties 1985-89
Dyfed-Powys	936	943	243	21
Gwent	1,001	1,009	290	23
North Wales	1,339	1,351	439	28
South Wales	3,123	3,168	1,111	134
Total	6,399	6,471	2,083	206

[1]As at 31 December 1990.
[2]As at 1 April 1990.

Members of the European Parliament

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many letters he has received since 4 January 1990 from Members of the European Parliament concerning local or national matters; and if he will make it his practice where the former are concerned to provide the hon. Member for the local constituency with copies of any such correspondence for his or her information.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Between 5 January 1990 and 7 March 1991 we received 187 such letters from Members of the European Parliament. As I explained in my reply on 4 April 1990, at column 638, to a question from the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Mr. Young), where Members of the European Parliament raise matters that are exclusively of local interest, the practice is to reply suggesting that the MEP should refer the matter to the hon. Member for the constituency concerned. As to other correspondence, replies would normally be copied to the hon. Member concerned only if the MEP had himself copied his letter in this way.

Tobacco Sponsorship

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with the Independent Television Commission about the desirability of maintaining the practice of not televising tobacco-sponsored sporting events; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Broadcasting Act 1990 requires the ITC to draw up and consult about a code on the sponsorship of programmes. My right hon. Friend was consulted about the present code, which lays down standards for any broadcast coverage of tobacco-sponsored events. Whether to cover such events remains a decision for the television companies.

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with the British Broadcasting Corporation about the exposure of tobacco brand names and logos in television coverage of sponsored sporting events; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: None. The BBC is, however, aware of the special issues raised by tobacco company sponsorship which are fully reflected in its guidelines to programme makers. The BBC observes the terms of the voluntary agreement reached between the Minister for Sport and the Tobacco Advisory Council in 1987.

No Smoking Day

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to support smokers in his Department to give up smoking on the eighth No Smoking Day on 13 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Wide publicity has been given throughout my Department to the aims of the eighth No Smoking Day, to take place on 13 March.

Postal and Proxy Voting

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what newspapers and magazines were used to advertise the availability of postal and proxy voting during the period before the 1987 general election; and at what cost.

Mrs. Rumbold: Advertisements were placed in the following newspapers. The campaign cost £431,000.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teachers' Negotiating Rights

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from the European trade union committee for education on negotiating rights for teachers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I received a letter dated 22 December 1990 from the European trade union committee for education about teachers' negotiating rights on 3 January 1991.

Autism

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether his Department has undertaken a full evaluation of the work of the Higashi school for autistic children in Boston, USA; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon: The Department has not undertaken a full evaluation of the Higashi school, but is continuing to seek information about its principles, methods and effectiveness.

Child Care

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the number of workplaces for civil servants in his Department; what proportion of the total number have an on-site nursery facility; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide a holiday play scheme; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide after-school child care facilities; what charges are made for use of any facility; what the net cost has been for the provision of these facilities; and what estimate he can make of any future expenditure.

Mr. Eggar: In addition to the Department's two main sites in London and Darlington, there are 41 HMI local offices each containing fewer than 12 members of staff. The Darlington site has a holiday play scheme for which in 1990-91 parents paid £4 per day for the first child and £3 for each subsequent child. The net cost to the Department of the provision was £3,800 which is expected to rise to £4,000 in 1991-92. There are plans to provide nursery facilities at the Darlington site but no plans for after-school child care.

The Department has no plans to provide any on-site child care provision in London. However, the Westminster holiday play scheme, supported by this and other Departments, is available during each of the school holiday periods to employees' children. In addition, the Department is considering with other Departments the establishment of interdepartmental creche facilities in London and commuting areas.

Science and Engineering Research Council

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will consider additional funding for the next financial year for the Science and Engineering Research Council; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The science budget for 1991-92 has already been fully allocated to the five research councils and related bodies.

City Technology Colleges

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish details of all voluntary-aided city technology colleges that are planned and their intended locations, together with (a) the cost to local authorities, (b) the total public expenditure involved and (c) the amount of sponsorship (i) pledged and (ii) confirmed; who the sponsors are; and if he will make a statement on their legal and financial status.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am still considering the legal and financial implications of proposals that voluntary-aided schools with the characteristics of city technology colleges might offer a worthwhile new means of extending the undoubted benefits of the CTC programme.

Education, Norfolk

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give the percentage increase in teachers employed by Norfolk county council between 1961 and (a) 1970, (b) 1980 and (c) 1990 in actual and full-time equivalent terms and the percentage increase over the same period in the number of children being educated by Norfolk county council, excluding nursery pupils and nursery teachers.

Mr. Fallon: Information for individual local authorities for 1961 and 1970 is not readily available on a basis comparable to later years because of local government reorganisation in 1974. The table gives the requested information for 1980 and 1990.

Maintained Primary[1] and Secondary schools in Norfolk

	Teachers		Pupils
	Actual number (thousands)	Full-time equivalent (thousands)	Full-time equivalent (thousands)
1980	6·3	6·0	115·9
1990	6·4	5·8	99·4
Per cent. change	+2·5	−2·6	−14·3

Northern Region

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will give the numbers attending full-time courses at (a) universities and (b) polytechnics in the Northern region in 1980 and 1990, together with the percentage change.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The information is given in the table. Data for 1990 are not yet available.

Full-time and sandwich students in higher education courses at Universities and Polytechnics in the Northern Region

	1980-81	1989-90	Percentage change
Universities	12,575	13,702	9
Polytechnics	10,093	17,742	76
Total	22,668	31,444	39

Tobacco Industry

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many meetings he, his predecessor, his Ministers and his Department's officials have had with representatives of the tobacco industry since 1 January 1989; and if he will list the dates, venues and purpose of each meeting.

Mr. Atkins: I met representatives from the Tobacco Advisory Council on 12 December 1990 at their request to discuss a range of issues relating to tobacco sponsorship of sport. Department officials meet representatives from the tobacco industry at meetings of the committee for monitoring agreements on tobacco advertising and sponsorship—COMATAS.

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has on the current annual total sponsorship of sports by tobacco companies; if he will list these individually; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: The latest available information, provided by the Tobacco Advisory Council, on the total sponsorship of sports in the United Kingdom by British tobacco companies is £5·329 million for the year ending 31 March 1989. A breakdown of this figure is not available. This sum compares with £7·699 million in 1986-87.

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will invite representatives of the health professions to participate in his Department's current negotiations with the tobacco industry on the control of tobacco sponsorship; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will report on the progress of his Department's negotiations to date with the tobacco companies on the control of tobacco sponsorship of sporting events; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: There are no current negotiations with the tobacco industry on the control of tobacco sponsorship of sporting events.

No Smoking Day

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to support smokers in his Department to give up smoking on the eighth No Smoking Day on 13 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: No special arrangements have been made for No Smoking Day, but staff who need help and advice can, as always, obtain this from our staff welfare service.

Disabled Teachers

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what advice his Department gives to TASC—the teaching as a career unit—regarding the recruitment and employment of teachers with disabilities;

(2) what advice he is seeking on the recruitment and employment of teachers with disabilities in preparation for new guidelines for LMS;

(3) what advice he has given to local education authorities regarding the employment of teachers with disabilities.

Mr. Fallon: The Department's guidance to employers, teacher training institutions and other bodies is contained in circular 1/88, "Physical and mental fitness to teach of teachers and of entrants to teacher training". My right hon. and learned Friend sees no need for any further advice to TASC or to LEAs or in connection with LMS regarding the recruitment or employment of teachers with disabilities.

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the proportion of teachers employed by each local education authority who are disabled.

Mr. Fallon: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Institute of Food Research

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the new Institute of Food Research building at Reading university has been completed; when staff will start to occupy it; what is the latest estimate of the cost of its construction; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Agricultural Food Research Council expects that the new building for the Institute of Food Research on the campus of the university of Reading will be completed in June this year. Scientists on the present Shinfield site will transfer to the new building in August. The estimated cost of construction is £9·6 million. This new building will provide the Reading laboratory of the IFR with excellent facilities to house the strong scientific programmes on microbiological food safety, consumer sciences, molecular sciences and biotechnology under way at Shinfield. It will also enhance the institute's position as an internationally recognised centre of excellence in food sciences.

Education, Gloucestershire

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many (a) administrative staff and (b) teaching staff were employed by Gloucestershire education authority in each year from 1985 to 1990.

Mr. Fallon: The total employees of Gloucestershire local education authority in March 1990 were as follows:

	Number
Full-time teachers and lecturers	4,600
Part-time teachers and lecturers	2,800
Full-time other employees	2,000
Part-time other employees	3,800

These figures include the nursery, primary and secondary schools sector, special and further education and central administration. Comparable figures for other years are not available.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many pupils attended schools administered by Gloucestershire education authority in each year from 1981 to 1990.

Mr. Fallon: The number of pupils attending maintained schools in Gloucestershire each year from 1981 to 1990 is as follows:

Year	Pupils on Roll
1981	87,450
1982	84,752
1983	82,009
1984	80,115
1985	78,797
1986	76,913
1987	76,019
1988	75,264
1989	74,550
1990	74,133

Education Expenditure

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table showing the proportion of total education spending which is spent on the provision of central services in respect of each local education authority in England and Wales.

Mr. Fallon: The latest available information for England relates to LEA spending on central services for schools which are categorised as discretionary excepted items under local management of schools. The eighty-seven LEAs that introduced local management of schools in April 1990 have published budget statements for 1990-91 which show how much of the potential schools budget is withheld from schools to be spent on discretionary excepted items. The figure for each LEA is given in the table. Comparable information is not available for the FE or other education sectors. Information about Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Special Needs

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make regulations under section 13 of the Education Act 1981 relating to the approval of independent schools to admit pupils with statements of special educational needs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon: The Secretaries of State for Education and Science and for Wales have today laid such regulations before Parliament and issued related circulars. Copies have been placed in the Library.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he intends to lay amending regulations made under section 12 of the Education Act 1981 relating to the approval of special schools, on which he issued a draft for consultation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon: The Secretaries of State for Education and Science and Wales have today laid before Parliament regulations to amend the Education (Approval of Special Schools) Regulations 1983. The Department has also issued circular 3/91, which replaces circular 6/83 and explains the updated requirements for the approval of special schools. A copy has been placed in the Library.

Public Bodies (Appointments)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science to which posts in public bodies he appoints individuals where the posts are (a) part-time and (b) remunerated by more than £50,000 per annum.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 6 March 1991]: The details of such appointments are listed on pages 15 to 17 of the Cabinet Office publication, "Public Bodies 1990", which is available in the Library. There are no part-time posts remunerated by more than £50,000 per annum.

Sports Council

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what arrangements he has made for continuing the payment of Government grant-in-aid to the Sports Council.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 30 January 1991, c. 511]: Parliamentary approval for my Department to make grant-in aid to the Sports Council will be sought in a spring supplementary estimate for the schools, research and miscellaneous services vote—class XI, vote 1. This will provide for expenditure of £1 million in addition to £14,161,000 transferred from the Department of the Environment for the last quarter of 1990-91. The additional expenditure will be offset by a saving elsewhere on the vote. Pending Parliament's approval, urgent expenditure against this additional £1 million will be met by repayable advance from the Contingencies Fund.

HEALTH

Funding, Leeds

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson) of 21 February, Official Report, column 239, how much expenditure has been allocated to Leeds from regional and central funding in each year since 1979 (a) at 1990-91 prices and (b) as a percentage of the 1990-91 expenditure.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is shown in the table. The source and notes to my earlier reply remain applicable.

Leeds health authorities—total expenditure on hospital and community health services (HCHS)

Year	Revenue expenditure £000 (at 1990-91 prices)	Revenue expenditure As a percentage	Capital expenditure £000 (at 1990-91 prices)	Capital expenditure As a percentage

1989-90	250,762	100·0	14,862	100·0

Note: The figures have been expressed at 1990-91 prices by the use of the Gross Domestic Product deflator. The percentages are calculated on those constant-price values but are related to 1989-90 (the latest year for which actual expenditure data are available).

NHS Trusts

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will name the members of the group representing the interests of national health service trusts at his most recent meeting.

Mr. Waldegrave: Two seminars for NHS trust chairmen were arranged last month. I attended on 25 February, when 26 of the 57 trusts were represented. All the chairmen had been invited to attend the seminars. A list of the names of trust chairmen is held in the Library.

Pharmaceutical Licensing Authority

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to support the creation of a central EC pharmaceutical product licensing authority.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It is the Government's stated policy to support in principle the European Commission's proposals for the future licensing of medicines, including the creation of a central licensing authority.

Child Protection

Mr. Sims: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in what circumstances, and by whose authority, children are placed on child protection registers; how many children are on such registers in the London region; how many of these do not have an allocated social worker; what similar figures are available for other parts of the United Kingdom; what are the present legal responsibilities of local authorities towards children on the register; how these will alter when the Children Act comes into force; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: A child's name is normally placed on the child protection register following discussion at a case conference, convened by the social services department or by the NSPCC in areas where this function is undertaken by the NSPCC in agreement with the social services department, when abuse or potential abuse is confirmed and an inter-agency agreement is made to work co-operatively to protect the child. When a registered child moves the child should be registered at once pending the first case conference in the new area.

The latest information about the number of children on the registers in London boroughs who are not allocated to a social worker is published in "Child Protection Services in London, Aspects of Management Arrangements in Social Services Departments, 31 December 1989", together with numbers on the registers at the time at which the survey took place. Copies are available in the Library. Similar information is not available centrally for the rest of England.

The most up-to-date information about numbers on child protection registers relates to 31 March 1990. This information is collected from all local authorities in England and is published in the provisional feedback "Children and Young Persons on Child Protection Registers, year ending 31 March 1990, England". Copies are available in the Library.

Similar statistics covering the rest of the United Kingdom are matters for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Northern Ireland, for Wales and for Scotland.

The present legal responsibilities of local authorities towards children on the register are the same general duties as those towards all children under the Child Care Act 1980: to promote the welfare of children and the Children and Young Persons Act 1969, to investigate the possible need for care proceedings and, if necessary, to take them.

When the Children Act comes into force children on child protection registers will generally be children in need and entitled to the provision of services set out in section 17 of the Act, whether or not they are looked after by the local authority. Generally the powers to investigate are greater than before, particularly where there is refusal of access to the child.

Ambulance Service

Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the total amount of money spent by the South Yorkshire metropolitan ambulance service on (a) preparing its declaration of intent to apply for national health service trust status and (b) hosting seminars on material prepared by the accountants, Parnell, Kerr and Foster.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish to write to the chief ambulance officer of the South Yorkshire metropolitan ambulance service for details.

Food Safety

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what plans he has to achieve effective industry self-regulation in food safety and food hygiene;

(2) which sectors and organisations within the food industry (a) operate and (b) propose to operate voluntary codes of practice in respect of food safety and food hygiene;

(3) if he will list by sector those food industry organisations that have submitted proposals in respect of achieving effective industry self-regulation.

Mr. Dorrell: It is the responsibility of the food industry itself to produce safe food and, like the Richmond committee, the Government encourage self-regulation. Although comprehensive information is not held centrally, we are aware of a number of food industry organisations which have prepared or are preparing guidance on food safety issues for the benefit of their members.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list seminars, workshops and other meetings, indicating whether they were addressed by (a) Ministers or (b) civil servants, on the issue of food safety and food hygiene in each of the years 1989, 1990 and 1991.

Mr. Dorrell: Ministers and officials from the Department of Health, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Scottish Office and the Welsh Office have addressed a large number of conferences, seminars and other meetings to publicise the Food Safety Act 1990 to consumers, enforcement authorities and the food industry. A complete list could not be suppplied except at disproportionate cost.

Cholesterol Testing

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has any plans to make cholesterol testing more widely available.

Mr. Dorrell: The Standing Medical Advisory Committee was asked to consider the cost-effectiveness of opportunistic cholesterol testing and reported in May last year. Because the report indicated that this is an area of divergent medical opinion, it was decided to issue the report for widespread consultation. Consultation has now been completed and a large number of responses were received. We expect to be in a position to consider the findings soon.

Members of the European Parliament

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many letters he has received since 4 January 1990 from Members of the European Parliament concerning local or national matters; and if he will make it his practice where the former are concerned to provide the hon. Member for the local constituency with copies of any such correspondence for his or her information.

Mr. Dorrell: We have received 94 such letters. As with other correspondence, replies would normally be copied to the hon. Member concerned if the original letter had been copied in this way.

Lung Cancer

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of deaths from lung cancer he attributes to smoking; how many such deaths occurred in people under 65 years of age, and in all age groups, in the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The table shows the total number of people whose deaths were registered in England and Wales in the years 1985-89 with an underlying cause of malignant neoplasm of trachea, bronchus and lung; and the number of those aged under 65. It is estimated that at least 90 per cent. of these deaths can be attributed to tobacco smoking.

Number of deaths with lung cancer[1] as underlying cause of death, England and Wales, 1985-89

Year	All ages	0-64 years
1985	35,792	10,665
1986	35,257	10,094
1987	35,138	9,549
1988	35,302	9,571
1989	34,581	8,936

Smoking

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the annual cost to the national health service of treatment of smoking-related diseases for each of the last five years for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) on 4 July 1990 at column 594. This estimate is not sufficiently precise to justify the calculation of yearly figures, although it is checked on a regular basis.

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many working days his Department estimates are lost due to smoking-related illness; what is the estimated cost to the gross national product from such days lost; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The Royal College of Physicians has estimated that over 50 million working days are lost each year due to smoking related disease. The likely cost in terms of lost production is about £2,200 million to £3,200 million.

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the fourth annual report of the committee for monitoring agreements on tobacco advertising and sponsorship will be published; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: We expect the committee's fourth annual report to be published by the summer.

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the progress of his Department's negotiations to date with the tobacco industry on the control of tobacco advertising.

Mr. Dorrell: Discussions have been under way with the tobacco industry on updating the voluntary agreement on tobacco advertising since the beginning of 1990. Some progress has been made, but the industry is reluctant to conclude a new agreement until it is clear about the impact on its business of European Community directives to complete the single market. We are pressing the industry to conclude a new agreement in the near future.

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many meetings he, his predecessor, his Ministers and his Department's officials have had with representatives of the tobacco industry since 1 January 1989; and if he will list the dates, venues and purpose of each meeting.

Mr. Dorrell: Officials regularly meet the tobacco industry to discuss a whole range of issues including the working of the voluntary agreements and EC measures on tobacco. Following is a list of the main meetings since 1 January 1989:

Date	Venue	Purpose
30 January 1990	Department of Health	The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State (Lords) met the Tobacco Advisory Council to discuss the draft EC Tobacco Advertising Directive
31 January 1990	Department of Health	The Secretary of State met the Tobacco Advisory Council to open negotiations on updating the voluntary agreements on tobacco advertising and product modification
27 March 1990	Department of Health	Officials met the Tobacco Advisory Council to carry forward negotiations on updating the voluntary agreements
15 May 1990	Department of Health	Officials met the Tobacco Advisory Council to carry forward negotiations on updating the voluntary agreements
14 November 1990	House of Lords	The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State (Lords) met the Tobacco Advisory Council to discuss the implementation of EC Directives on Tobacco
23 January 1991	Department of Health	The Secretary of State met a representative of Imperial Tobacco Ltd. to discuss various tobacco related issues.

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of acute beds in national health service hospitals and the total number of in-patient bed days per annum he estimates are used by patients suffering from smoking-related diseases; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The number of bed-days attributable to smoking-related disease was estimated in 1985 to be between 2·8 million and 4·8 million a year. The current figure is likely to be of the same order.

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has of the relationship between consumption of cigarettes, particularly by children, and increases in prices; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply my hon. Friend the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) on 13 January 1989 at column 768. We are not aware of any new studies which have become available since 1989.

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about the future of the Health Promotion Research Trust.

Mr. Dorrell: The funds given to the trust by the tobacco industry will soon be exhausted. I understand that the trustees are prepared to examine other possibilities for continuing the work of the trust.

Oral Tobacco

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps his Department is taking to ban the sale of all new oral tobacco products in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The supply of oral snuff products was banned in the United Kingdom on 13 March 1990 by means of regulations under the Consumer Protection Act 1987. On 21 December 1990 the regulations were quashed by the divisional court on a procedural point. We have appealed against that decision.

Tobacco Advertising

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library a full copy of the research commissioned by the committee for monitoring agreements on tobacco advertising and sponsorship; if he will list the subjects covered by that research, the period this research covered and the findings of this research; who was commissioned to undertake this research; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: Details of the research commissioned by the committee for monitoring agreements on tobacco advertising and sponsorship are contained in the first, second and third annual reports of the committee, published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office—ISBNs 0 11 321138 4, 0 11 321225 9 and 0 11 321306 9—copies of which are in the Library. In addition, Coopers and Lybrand Deloitte has recently completed some research on the tobacco industry's adherence to the cigarette voluntary code for promotions with specific reference to direct mail. The period covered by the research was 1989 to 1990. Details will be published in the Committee's fourth report. My hon. Friend is aware that the original research reports are not published because the industry, which meets half the cost of the research, has objected on various grounds. This position was set out in the reply my hon. Friend the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State gave him on 27 October 1989 at column 631.

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the members of the committee for monitoring agreements on tobacco advertising and sponsorship; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The membership of the committee is as follows:

Mr. D. Adams—Welsh Office
Mr. R. R. Boxall—Gallaher Ltd.
Mr. W. J. Burroughs—Department of Health
Mr. N. M. Hale—Department of Health
Mr. D. R. Hare—Tobacco Advisory Council
Mr. B. C. W. Heard—Imported Tobacco Products Advisory Council
Mr. T. S. Heppell—Department of Health
Mr. A. King—Scottish Office
Mr. P. Middleton—Imperial Tobacco Ltd.
Mr. W. C. Owen—Tobacco Advisory Council
Mr. E. D. Oxberry—Rothmans (UK) Ltd.
Mr. J. Scott—Department of Health and Social Security (Northern Ireland)
Mr. P. J. Vaughan—Department of Education and Science

One place on the industry side of the committee is temporarily vacant. The post of independent chairman is also temporarily vacant following the resignation of Sir Peter Lazarus in January. The Government and the tobacco industry hope to make a new appointment to this post shortly.

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will invite representatives of the health professions to participate in his Department's current negotiations with the tobacco industry on the control of tobacco advertising; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The Department's own professional advisers have considerable expertise in these matters and are represented at the negotiating sessions.

No Smoking Day

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to support smokers in his Department to give up smoking on the eighth No Smoking Day on 13 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: National No Smoking Day has been publicised widely in the Department. The following activities are planned for 13 March:

manned information points in building foyers with publicity and leaflets on leading a healthy lifestyle, and encouragement to enrol for stop smoking courses sponsored by the Department. opportunities for smokers to hand in their cigarettes and enter a prize draw.
publicity in staff canteen.
exhibitions by the Occupational Health Service and the Look After Your Heart project manned by professional advisers available to give advice on giving up smoking.

The aims of national No Smoking Day and the initiatives outlined above have the full support of Ministers in the Department.

Mental Health Grant

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the local authorities which have indicated that they are not taking up the full amount of the new mental health specific grant.

Mr. Dorrell: The local authorities which have indicated that they are not taking up the full amount of the new mental illness specific grant are;

Bed Closures

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his estimate for the number of hospital bed closures during the current financial year; and when figures will be available on an area basis.

Mr. Dorrell: We do not routinely collect this information centrally, since bed numbers are not a good indicator of levels of service in the national health service. It is for each health authority to determine the level and mix of health service provision in its area, taking account of local circumstances and the increased resources available to them.

Diabetics

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health why it has been decided not to make the needles used with Novapen syringes available at no charge to people who receive a free supply of insulin on prescription.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: NHS supply arrangements for insulin pens and needles need to be considered together. Subject to our normal evaluation of individual brands, including Novapen, we would consider making pens and needles prescribable as an alternative to syringes, if this could be done without additional cost. Discussions with suppliers are currently in progress.

Laboratory Services

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish the survey of laboratory backlogs and workload carried out in the second half of 1990 referred to in his answer of 21 February, Official Report, column 240.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The survey dealt only with those district health authorities in which the processing time for cervical smear tests was over one month on 1 July 1990. These are listed in the table with the length of the backlog and the number of smears received in the period March to May 1990. Since the length of backlogs changes over time, the current position is likely to vary from that shown. Two out of three health authorities processed smear tests within the requested one month.

Nursing Homes

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will extend the consideration of the fitness of applicants to run private care and nursing homes to include an assessment of the fitness of persons holding office in companies in ownership of homes.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: There are no plans to do so.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what sanctions are available to registration authorities when a successful prosecution for the operation of an unregistered home does not lead to the closure of the home.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It would be open to the registration authority to take fresh proceedings against the person running the home.

The Registered Homes (Amendment) Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) will, if it becomes law, extend the requirement to register to residential care homes with fewer than four residents.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action can be taken by registration authorities against private or voluntary residential care or nursing homes which fail to produce and provide residents with a written complaints procedure.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Persons registered under the Registered Homes Act 1984 are required to inform residents in residential care homes in writing how any complaints will be dealt with and to see that complaints received are fully investigated. If this requirement is not observed the response of the registration authority will depend on the particular circumstances of the case. The objective will always be to ensure that an effective complaints procedure is in place.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will introduce a requirement for the public display of complaints procedures within residential care and nursing homes.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: There are no plans to do so.

Prescription Charges

Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about NHS prescription and related charges and optical vouchers.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I have today laid before the House regulations for increases in prescription charges in the national health service in England and Wales which will take effect from 1 April 1991. The prescription charge will increase by 35p from £3·05 to £3·40. The increase of nearly 11·5 per cent. reflects the higher cost of the pharmaceutical services and will provide about £17 million extra income to the resources available to the health service in England and Wales.

The new charge will continue to represent less than half the cost of an average prescription to the NHS. The existing exemption arrangements under which about four out of five of all prescription items are provided free of charge remain unchanged. The four-monthly and annual prepayment certificates will continue to be available, the fees for which will increase from £15·80 and £43·50 to £17·60 and £48·50 respectively. The effect of the wide-ranging exemption arrangements and the continued availability of prepayment certificates is that a charge will be paid in respect of less than 20 per cent. of all items dispensed in the NHS.

The charges for elastic stockings and tights, fabric supports and wigs supplied through the hospital service will also be increased from 1 April, as set out in table A.

Turning now to general dental services, at present those patients who are liable to pay a dental charge contribute a fixed proportion—75 per cent.—of the cost of each course of treatment, up to a maximum of £150. The House has already been informed that we have no plans to increase the proportional charge. However, the maximum charge has remained unchanged since 1988 and, from 1 April 1991, it will be raised to £200.

I am pleased to announce increased help for people who receive vouchers towards the cost of their spectacles. Overall the value of spectacle vouchers will increase by 6 per cent. from 1 April and the most frequently prescribed A, B and D vouchers will go up by 7·2, 6·1 and 6·5 per cent. respectively. In addition we shall be making changes to the voucher regulations to ensure that people with certain unusual optical prescriptions will be entitled both to free NHS sight tests and to the highest value spectacle vouchers.

Voucher values for the hospital eye service will rise by 6 per cent. for spectacle vouchers and 11·5 per cent. for contact lens vouchers. The maximum charge payable by patients will also increase.

The revised voucher values are set out in table B.

PRIME MINISTER

Purchasing and Distribution

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Prime Minister what is the full annual cost, including overheads, of his Department's purchasing activity.

The Prime Minister: The full cost of the purchasing activity in the Cabinet Office for the current financial year is estimated to be £26 million.

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Prime Minister how many people in the Cabinet Office are wholly or substantially involved in purchasing stores and distribution activities.

The Prime Minister: The number of people involved either wholly or substantially in these activities is nine.

Value for Money

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Prime Minister what measures of performance are employed by his Department to ensure value for money.

The Prime Minister: Although the nature of much of the Cabinet Office's work precludes assessment by way of formal performance measures, the identification of value-for-money targets is an integral part of the Department's planning and budgeting system. The system provides for the regular monitoring of progress towards targets and their achievement.

WALES

Duffryn Workshops

Mr. John Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will ensure that the West Wales training and enterprise council is adequately funded to avoid Duffryn Workshops in the Afan valley closing during the next month.

Mr. David Hunt: I announced on 28 February that over £8 million additional funding would be made available for employment training in Wales in 1991-92. It is the TEC's responsibility to determine which training providers can best meet the training requirements of the locality and to contract accordingly.

Primary Education

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the present state of education at primary level in Ceredigion and Dyfed.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The pattern of provision of maintained primary education in Dyfed is for the local education authority, not for me. However, in response to concerns expressed by some parents, mainly in the Teifi valley area, I have asked the local education authority for details of its introduction of categorisation of primary schools in terms of their use of Welsh as a medium of teaching.

No Smoking Day

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans his Department has to help smokers give up smoking on No Smoking Day; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: Welsh Office staff have been fully informed about this year's No Smoking Day and reminded of the standing invitation to join a smoking cessation group.

European Community

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many times he has visited Brussels concerning his Department's responsibilities in the European Community.

Mr. David Hunt: Since becoming Secretary of State for Wales on 4 May 1990 I have not visited Brussels to discuss matters relating to Wales and the European Community, but my Department is in close contact with the European Commission and the office of the United Kingdom permanent representative in Brussels, with officials visiting Brussels regularly to discuss specific policy interests. I am, of course, ready to visit Brussels when it becomes appropriate to do so in pursuit of my departmental responsibilities.

ENERGY

Gas Turbine Power Stations

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many licences he has issued for combined cycle gas turbine power stations; what information he has on how many are under construction or for which construction contracts have been let; and which companies are building the plants.

Mr. Wakeham: The following combined cycle gas turbine generating—CCGT—stations have been given planning consent under section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989:

Deeside Power Development Company Ltd.—Deeside Industrial Park, Clywd
Energy Resources Company Ltd.—Keadby, Humberside
National Power plc—Killingholme, South Humberside
National Power plc—Little Barford, Bedfordshire
PowerGen plc—Killingholme, South Humberside
PowerGen plc—Rye House, Hertfordshire
Teesside Power Ltd.—Wilton, Cleveland

The following applications for consent for CCGT generating stations are still being considered:

Barking Power Ltd.—Barking, London
Coryton Cogen Ltd.—Coryton, Essex
National Power plc—Didcot, Oxfordshire
National Power plc—Staythorpe, Nottinghamshire
PowerGen plc—Plymouth, Devon
Rugby Power Co. Ltd.—Rugby, Warwickshire
Texaco Ltd.—Angle Bay, Dyfed

The following projects incorporating CCGT technology have received approval under section 14(1) of the Energy Act 1976, that is, to establish an electricity generating station to be fuelled by natural gas, or for the conversion of an electricity generating station with a view to its being so fuelled:

Barking Power Ltd.—Barking, London
Berisford Bristar plc—Brigg, South Humberside
British Nuclear Fuels plc—Calder Hall, Sellafield
British Sugar plc—Bury St. Edmunds
Rugby Power Co. Ltd.—Rugby, Warwickshire
Coryton Cogen Ltd.—Coryton Essex
Deeside Power Development Company Ltd.—Deeside Industrial Park, Clywd
National Power plc—Killingholme, South Humberside
National Power plc—Little Barford, Bedfordshire
PowerGen plc—Rye House, Hertfordshire
Sheffield Heat and Power—Sheffield
Shell UK Exploration and Production—Shellhaven, Essex
Texaco Ltd./Mission Energy—Angle Bay, Dyfed
Wiggins Teape—Stoneywood Mill

The following projects incorporating CCGT technology have received approval under both sections 14(1) and 14(2) of the Energy Act 1976, that is, to establish an electricity generating station fuelled by natural gas and to enter into contractual arrangements for obtaining a supply of natural gas for an electricity generating station, or to extend any such arrangements:

The Boots Company plc—Beeston, Nottingham
BP Chemicals Ltd.—Baglan Bay, West Glamorgan
British Sugar plc—Wissington, Suffolk
Hawker Siddeley—Corby, South Humberside
Hawker Siddeley—Peterborough
ICI plc—Wilton, Cleveland
Lakeland Power—Roosecote, Cumbria
Leicester Energy Ltd.—Raw Dykes Road, Leicester
Occidental Petroleum—Flotta
PowerGen plc—Killingholme, South Humberside
Ranger Oil/PowerGen plc—South Denes, Great Yarmouth
Teesside Power Ltd.—Wilton, Cleveland

The further information requested by the hon. Member covers commercial matters for the companies concerned.

Child Care

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the number of workplaces for civil servants in his Department; what proportion of the total number have an on-site nursery facility; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide a holiday play scheme; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide after-school child care facilities; what charges are made for use of any facility; what the net cost has been for the provision of these facilities; and what estimate he can make of any future expenditure.

Mr. Wakeham: My Department's staff are located at seven sites. In addition, there are various small offices where some two to three staff work. My Department does not provide nurseries, holiday play schemes, or after-school care and has no current plans to do so. However, my Department has participated in the holiday play scheme organised in the Westminster area by the office of the Minister for the Civil Service.

Purchasing and Distribution

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many people in his Department are wholly or substantially involved in purchasing stores and distribution activities.

Mr. Wakeham: These figures are reported annually to the Treasury's central unit on purchasing. The number reported for 1989-90 was seven.

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the full annual cost, including overheads, of his Department's purchasing activity.

Mr. Wakeham: These figures are reported annually to the Treasury's central unit on purchasing. The amount reported for 1989-90 was £293,000.

Members of the European Parliament

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many letters he has received, since 4 January 1990, from Members of the European Parliament concerning local or national matters; and if he will make it his practice, where the former are concerned, to provide the hon. Member for the local constituency with copies of any such correspondence for his or her information.

Mr. Wakeham: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Mr Young) on 4 April 1990, at column 629.

No Smoking Day

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what plans he has to support smokers in his Department to give up smoking on the eighth No Smoking Day on 13 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wakeham: My Department has no plans to publicise this occasion, but a two-day exhibition on various health-related issues is being organised for early April as part of the Look After Your Heart campaign. An important feature of the exhibition will be making information and advice available to staff about smoking.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Soviet Union

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made in respect of Yefim Rokhvarg, Iosef Roginsky and Evgeny Pisarevsky of Leningrad who have been unsuccessfully applying to leave the Soviet Union.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Mr. Pisarevsky's name was included in a list of cases brought to the attention of the Soviet authorities in advance of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's recent visit to Moscow. We shall take account of the cases of Mr. Rokhvarg and Mr. Roginsky in our future representations.

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made in respect of Vladimir Kodess, David Gurevich and Yuri Gindin of Leningrad, who have been unsuccessfully applying to leave the Soviet Union.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We can certainly raise these cases with the Soviet authorities, but in order to make our representations most effective we shall need further details.

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made in respect of Lev Lazarevich Kunin and Pavel Izakson of Moscow, who have been unsuccessfully applying to leave the Soviet Union.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Mr. Kunin's name was included in a list of cases brought to the attention of the Soviet authorities in advance of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's recent visit to Moscow. We shall take account of the case of Mr. Izakson in our future representations.

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made in respect of Vladimir Gorodetsky, who has been unsuccessfully applying to leave the Soviet Union.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We have now added Mr. Gorodetsky's name to the list of cases regularly brought to the attention of the Soviet authorities and will make firm representations in support of his application to leave the Soviet Union.

Ghana

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made recently to the Ghanaian Government concerning law No. 78 which allows for execution for political offences, and of law 4 which allows imprisonment without access to legal advice.

Mrs. Chalker: We have made no recent representations about these laws. We maintain regular ministerial and official contact with the Government of Ghana and they are well aware of our concern at some of their internal policies and on those concerning human rights issues.

Immigration

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current length of time applicants wishing to join spouses in the United Kingdom are having to wait for interview by British high commission staff in India, Pakistan and Bangladesh; and what action is in hand to reduce waiting times.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) on 20 February, at column 175. During the past two years we have considerably reduced waiting times in the Indian sub-continent. No first-time applicant for settlement now waits longer than nine months for interview. We have increased staffing levels in Bombay and New Delhi. The construction of new premises in Islamabad, Dhaka and New Delhi and the move to new premises in Bombay will improve administrative procedures and are expected to reduce waiting times.

Child Care

Dr. Marek To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the number of workplaces for civil servants in his Department; what proportion of the total number have an on-site nursery facility; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide a holiday play scheme; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide after-school child care facilities; what charges are made for use of any facility; what the net cost has been for the provision of these facilities; and what estimate he can make of any future expenditure.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The information requested is as follows:

DIPLOMATIC WING

The Foreign and Commonwealth Office is located in 15 buildings in the United Kingdom. Members of the Diplomatic Service also staff over 200 posts overseas. None has an on-site nursery facility, holiday play scheme or after-school child care facility at present, although places in the Westminster holiday play scheme, administered by the office of the Minister for the Civil Service, are open to FCO staff working in the Westminster area.

An on-site workplace nursery is being set up at Hanslope park, near Milton Keynes. Start-up costs are currently estimated at £45,000.

AID WING

The number of workplaces for Overseas Development Administration staff is three. None has an on-site nursery facility or provides after-school child care facilities. Two provide a holiday play scheme; places on the Westminster holiday play scheme are open to staff at the third. The ODA also provides accommodation for the Westminster holiday play scheme.

Details of charges, net cost and future expenditure in respect of the two workplaces which provide holiday play schemes are as follows:

	A	B
Charges made for use of facility	£3·25 per child per day plus £5 annual registration fee	£5 per child per day
Net cost of provision of facility	£850 (1990-91)	£1,600
Estimate of any further expenditure	The Aid Wing expects to support both schemes in 1991-92 but precise figures are not yet available

Members of the European Parliament

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many letters he has received since 4 January 1990 from Members of the European Parliament concerning local or national matters; and if he will make it his practice where the former are concerned to provide the hon. Member for the local constituency with copies of any such correspondence for his or her information.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The information is not readily available in the form requested. Where Members of the European Parliament raise matters in correspondence which are exclusively of local interest, the practice is to reply suggesting that the MEP should refer the matter to the hon. Member for the constituency concerned.

A separate arrangement applies in respect of consular cases raised by MEPs. Our normal practice is to copy our response to the appropriate hon. Member in view of the direct personal involvement in such cases of the latter's constituent.

No Smoking Day

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to support smokers in his Department to give up smoking on the eighth No Smoking Day on 13 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: This Department will be publicising No Smoking Day with posters and leaflets. Giving up smoking also features as part of this Department's programme of occupational health for both the diplomatic and aid wings of the FCO.

Israel

Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the help and support being given by Her Majesty's ambassador in Tel Aviv to British firms seeking contracts in Israel for housing Soviet immigrants; and what progress has been made in discussions with the Government of Israel in that regard.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Discussions are continuing between the Export Credits Guarantee Department and the Israeli authorities concerning the establishment of a line of credit to finance housing projects to be located in Israel. This will have to be on the condition that none of the funds are to be spent on housing in the occupied territories including east Jerusalem.

Jordan

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the difficulties experienced in Jordan in obtaining dried milk for babies, as a result of an embargo imposed at Aqaba by United States forces; and whether he has taken any steps to relieve this situation.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We have no information to suggest that activity in support of United Nations sanctions against Iraq by United States forces in the Red sea has created a shortage of dried milk in Jordan.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Westminster County Court

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Attorney-General whether any counter-notice was served in respect of a notice to terminate the lease of Westminster county court.

The Attorney-General: Notice to terminate the lease of Westminster county court has not yet been given. No counter-notice has therefore been served.

Court of Appeal

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Attorney-General how many convictions have been quashed by the Court of Appeal criminal division since the coming into force of section 43 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 on 31 July 1989.

The Attorney-General: Between 1 August 1989 and 22 February 1991, a total of 382 convictions were quashed.

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Attorney-General how many retrials have been ordered by the Court of Appeal criminal division since 31 July 1989.

The Attorney-General: Between 1 August 1989 and 22 February 1991, four retrials were ordered.

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Attorney-General how many persons convicted after a trial on indictment had their sentences remitted by the Court of Appeal in each of the last two years.

The Attorney-General: The Court of Appeal has varied the sentence pronounced in the court in the following number of cases. These figures include cases which were committed for sentence to the Crown court as well as cases tried on indictment. The latter are not held separately.

	Cases
1989	1,314
1990	1,526

Incendiary Weapons

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Attorney-General whether the Government have ratified the 1981 specific conventional weapons convention and the protocol on prohibitions or restrictions on the use of incendiary weapons.

The Attorney-General: The United Kingdom signed the convention on prohibitions or restrictions on the use of certain conventional weapons which may be deemed to be excessively injurious or to have indiscriminate effects on 10 April 1981. It has not ratified the convention or accepted the protocol on prohibitions or restrictions on the use of incendiary weapons—protocol III to the convention.

ENVIRONMENT

Woodland (Planning)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to call in any application by a local authority to itself for permission for any development which would destroy ancient woodland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: No. My right hon. Friend's policy is to exercise his power to call in planning applications very selectively, and generally only when planning issues of more than local importance are involved. However, my right hon. Friend will pay close attention to any request by the Nature Conservancy Council that a planning application which affects ancient woodland which has been classed as a site of special scientific interest should be called in for his decision.

My hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer), then the Minister for Housing and Planning, announced on 25 July 1990, Official Report, column 372, that my right hon. Friend intends to amend the Town and Country Planning (Development Plans) (England) Direction 1981 so as to require local authorities to report to him any development proposal by them or on their land which would conflict with the development plan, to enable him to consider calling in such proposals for his own decision.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the number of community charge payers in Exeter who (a) received rebates in 1989-90 under the rates rebate scheme (b) received relief in 1990-91 under the community charge relief scheme and (c) will receive refunds under the community charge scheme.

Mr. Key: An average of 8,327 households in Exeter received a rate rebate in 1989-90; around 16,800 individuals in Exeter have benefited from transitional relief in 1990-91. No information is yet available on the number of people in Exeter who will be helped by the community charge reduction scheme. However, if Exeter district council sets its charge for 1991-92 at or above its scheme charge of £344, a couple living in an averagely rated property who have not moved since 31 March 1990 could look forward to a joint reduction of £183.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what income was received from the standard community charge in (a) Westminster and (b) Rotherham during 1990-91; what is his estimate of this income in 1991-92; and whether this income is taken into account in the determination of standard spending grant.

Mr. Key [holding answer 7 March 1991]: Income from standard community charges is not taken into account in the revenue support grant settlement.

Budgeted income from standard community charges (£ million)

	1990-91
Westminster city council	4·5
Rotherham MBC	[1]1·0

[1] Pre-capping estimate.

The information for 1991-92 is not yet available.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what sum will be provided from central funds in support of the local authorities of (a) Wandsworth, (b) Westminster and (c) Rotherham in 1990-91; and what is the estimated (1) expenditure, (2) central support and (3) per capita expenditure of each of those authorities in 1991-92.

Mr. Key [holding answer 7 March 1991]: The information about central Government support is as follows:

	External support 1990-91 £ million	External support 1991-92 £ million
Wandsworth	213·5	235·9
Westminster	153·5	188·1
Rotherham	119·5	124·2

The external support is paid to the receiving authority's collection fund. It finances expenditure by policy and fire and civil defence authorities as well as expenditure by the charging authority.

Information regarding their budgeted expenditure in 1991-92 has not yet been submitted to the Secretary of State for the Environment by these authorities.

Mr. Duffy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what grant per poll tax payer is received by Sheffield.

Mr. Key: Government grants, consisting of revenue support grant, special grants, specific grants in aggregate external finance, community charge benefit grant and transitional relief grant, per head of relevant population in 1990-91 are £309 in Sheffield.

Tyne and Wear UDC

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) of 27 February, Official Report, column 528, if he will indicate how the figure of 5,500 as the number of jobs created as a result of the existence of the Tyne and Wear UDC was calculated;

(2) pursuant to his answer of 30 January, Official Report, column 661, how his Department calculated the figure of 1,630 as the number of jobs created or gained, to March 1990, in the Tyne and Wear UDC; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: The jobs figures of 1,630 to March 1990 and 5,500 to date have been derived from three sources by the Tyne and Wear development corporation:

1. Property development projects in receipt of city grant for commercial end use.
2. Business development projects where financial support is given or committed to assist relocation or expansion.
3. Property and business development projects promoted and assisted by the Corporation, in the main on sites they have developed, but not involving direct grant assistance.

In all cases the jobs figures are based on actual employees together with jobs estimated by the company to be created within two years of the completion of the investment to which the company is committed.

Habitats Directive

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what he is doing to speed up progress towards the adoption of the habitats directive; and what is his estimate of the cost of ensuring effective implementation of the directive.

Mr. Trippier: In recent months my Department has taken an active part in discussions with our European Community partners to agree a text for a directive. I intend to reinforce our support at the Environment Council on 18 March. The cost of implementing the directive in the Community as a whole is expected to be substantial, but definitive figures are not yet available. The United Kingdom system of nature conservation is relatively well developed and the additional costs in the United Kingdom are not expected to be great.

Royal Parks Constabulary

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will detail the total cost of the Royal Parks Constabulary for the last three years and the number of serving officers and establishment.

Sir George Young: The figures are:

Year	Cost £	Manpower
		Authorised	Actual
1987-88	2,381,000	164	151
1988-89	2,876,000	163	156
1989-90	3,346,000	163	152

The cost figures exclude accommodation and supervision which are not separately identifiable. Manpower figures are as at 31 December of each year.

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the differences in pay and conditions of service for the Royal Parks Constabulary from equivalent Metropolitan police force ranks.

Sir George Young: Basic pay rates in the Royal Parks Constabulary are set at 85·5 per cent. of the equivalent rates for Home Department police forces. Officers receive the same rate of London weighting, but they do not receive the special London allowance paid to officers in the Metropolitan police. RPC officers are members of the civil service pension scheme which is non-contributory. Metropolitan police officers are members of the standard Home Department forces pension scheme which is contributory. Other conditions of service, including discipline codes, are similar for both forces.

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number and types of vehicles used by the Royal Parks Constabulary.

Sir George Young: The Royal Parks Constabulary currently has a fleet of 28 vehicles:

	Number
Saloon cars (Ford Escort/Vauxhall Astra)	6
Vans (Ford Transit/Freight Rover Sherpa)	8
Personnel Carriers (Ford Transit)	2
Land Rover	1
Motorcycles (BMW)	11

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the duties of the Royal Parks Constabulary in the hours between locking the park gates and unlocking them.

Sir George Young: Of the 21 parks, gardens and open spaces policed by the Royal Parks Constabulary, 10 are fully closed at night. In the closed parks officers check unoccupied premises—park yards, restaurants, sports clubs, and so on—and prevent unauthorised access to the locked areas. In addition, some of the closed parks have security-sensitive premises located within them and officers carry out security patrols.

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number of arrests and successful prosecutions by type of offences for the last three years of the Royal Parks Constabulary.

Sir George Young: All persons arrested by the Royal Parks Constabulary are handed over to the Metropolitan police for processing. My Department does not keep a central record of the outcome of prosecutions. The numbers of reported crimes and arrests are:

	1988		1989		1990
	Crimes	Arrests	Crimes	Arrests	Crimes	Arrests
Crimes of violence	51	25	28	14	37	25
Sexual offences	62	47	77	41	74	42
Burglary	45	1	52	9	47	5
Robbery	33	3	28	5	16	5
Theft	420	95	448	58	470	76
Criminal damage	70	27	80	24	59	20
Other	338	414	347	333	332	320
TOTAL	1,069	612	1,060	484	1,035	493

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the Royal Parks Constabulary's duties and responsibilities were last reviewed.

Sir George Young: An inspection of the force was carried out by one of Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary in 1980. The constabulary and its arrangements have since been strengthened to reflect the increased emphasis on security protection which now forms an important part of its duties.

Urban Development Corporations

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he has discussed with local authorities the winding-up of the urban development corporations and the transfer of their functions; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what are the proposed dates for the winding-up of the 10 urban development corporations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: UDCs were given indicative lifetimes at designation. On that basis, their projected wind-up dates would be:

	Year
First Generation:
London Docklands	1996
Merseyside	1996
Second Generation:
Black Country	1997
Teesside	1997
Trafford Park	1997
Tyne and Wear	1997
Third Generation:
Bristol	1994
Central Manchester	1993
Leeds	1993
Sheffield	1995

We are keeping their lifetimes under review, and will discuss the implications of wind-up with local authorities and others in due course.

Electricians

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will bring forward a mandatory registration scheme for electricians.

Mr. Yeo: No. I am satisfied that the existing self-regulation of electrical contractors is operating satisfactorily.

Value for Money

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures of performance are employed by his Department to ensure value for money.

Mr. Heseltine: The Department's annual report—Cm. 1508—sets out a comprehensive range of performance measures associated with my expenditure programmes and in chapter A11 describes a number of other mechanisms used by my Department to secure value for money.

The Gulf

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his oral answer of 18 February, Official Report, column 16, what estimate he has made of the number of civil servants involved, technically or administratively, in requests from neighbouring Arab states in the Gulf for help in cleaning up oil slicks.

Mr. Heseltine: In my Department, which has had the lead in environmental aspects of the Gulf conflict, around 20 civil servants have been involved to some degree in responding to these issues, including requests for assistance from the Gulf states. For about five staff, this has been a major part of their work. In other Departments closely involved the position is similar.

Community Charge

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list by district or London authority in rank order the percentage of budgeted community charge so far received by each authority, starting with that authority which thus far has received the largest percentage.

Mr. Key: I am arranging for the information to be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many people within the city of Gloucester will benefit from the community charge reduction scheme;

(2) what amounts will be made available to residents of Gloucester as a result of the community charge reduction scheme.

Mr. Key: Information on the total number of community charge payers in each charging authority who will benefit from a reduction and the amount of reduction scheme grant payable to each authority will be available once charging authorities have submitted their claims to my Department. However, a couple who have not moved since 31 March 1990 living in a property that had an average rates bill for the Gloucester area could look forward to a joint reduction in their bills for 1991-92 of £197.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, given declared community charge levels by each district authority, what is the increased payment per couple which will be required before the community charge reduction scheme applies.

Mr. Key: Many chargepayers will receive reductions even if charging authorities set their personal community charge below or at the same level as last year.

No Smoking Day

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to support smokers in his Department to give up smoking on the eighth No Smoking Day on 13 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine: Posters advertising the day and information leaflets will be displayed in all the Department's main offices throughout the country and an article placed in the in-house journal. Guidance has been given to all staff on damage to health caused by smoking. Welfare officers are on hand to give help and advice to staff who wish to give up smoking and on the availability of cessation classes.

Housing, Waveney

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what are the criteria for housing investment programme allocations for non-urban authorities; and how they were applied for 1991-92 for Waveney district council;

(2) how the general needs index applies to Government grant aid for housing purposes for Waveney district council for 1991-92; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: Housing investment programme—HIP—allocations for 1991-92 for non-metropolitan district authorities, including Waveney, as well as for metropolitan districts and London authorities, were made in part by references to an objective measure of need—the generalised needs index—and in part on the basis of recommendations by my Department's housing regional controllers to reflect their knowledge of local needs and circumstances. Local authorities were able to explain their needs and priorities to the Department in their annual HIP returns and strategy statements and subsequent HIP meetings.

The generalised needs index is not used directly in the distribution of Government grant aid, although both housing revenue account subsidy and specified capital grants, mainly for house renovations, are available to authorities in support of housing investment programme expenditure.

Housing Authorities

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to encourage local housing authorities wishing to become enabling authorities instead of direct providers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: My Department has issued guidance to all local authorities on how to develop their enabling role: I am sending my hon. Friend a copy and placing a copy in the Library. I am pleased by the extent to which many authorities are responding to encouragement to adopt a mainly enabling role, assessing the needs of their areas and helping housing associations, private landlords and developers to meet those needs, rather than concentrating exclusively on direct provision of council housing.

Urban Programme

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to receive the report from Victor Hausner and Associates on their research into the use of the urban programme in creating employment opportunities for black and ethnic minority communities in the inner cities.

Mr. Key: My right hon. Friend hopes to receive the final report of this research project soon.

Saltley Renewal Area

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the purpose of the visit by the Minister for Housing and Planning to the Saltley renewal area on 26 February; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: I visited Saltley to see the progress being made in regenerating this area of older private housing in Birmingham and to meet some of the residents. I am impressed by the partnership between the city council, the Heartlands urban development agency, the housing associations and the residents and the way in which the programme for improvement is being carried forward, using to good effect the additional resources which we have made available over several years.

Radioactive Material

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his present policy in respect of the dry storage of radioactive material.

Mr. Trippier: Other than on licensed nuclear sites, no person shall keep, use, or cause or permit to be kept or used, radioactive material unless he is registered under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960 or exempted from being so. Dry storage of spent nuclear fuel is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy.

Dartmoor National Park

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he hopes to sign the order varying the Dartmoor national park boundary; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The statutory period for representations ended on 28 February. A decision on the boundary variation order will be reached as soon as we have considered all the representations made.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the latest figures he has in respect of the volume of disposal of low-level radioactive waste (a) at Drigg and (b) at local authority landfill sites.

Mr. Trippier: The latest figures showing volumes of low-level radioactive waste disposals to the disposal facility operated by BNFL at Drigg, Cumbria are set out in the BNFL publication "Radioactive Discharges and Monitoring of the Environment 1989", a copy of which is in the Library.

Small amounts of low-level radioactive waste are authorised under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960 for disposal at local landfill sites following careful safety assessments in each case. However, the Department does not maintain a central record of the volume of waste involved in these disposals.

Colliery Spoil

Mr. Stevens: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has received the Ove Arup report on the monitoring of the use of the evaluative framework for the disposal of colliery spoil; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: Although there has been a decrease in the amount of colliery spoil produced in recent years, its disposal is still a problem. Version 1 of the evaluative framework, published in 1987, was designed to assist decision making on future disposal schemes for deep mine colliery spoil. It has encouraged systematic investigation of both environmental and financial aspects of alternative options.

My Department commissioned research to monitor the effectiveness of the framework and it has now been modified to include the lessons learnt. The contractors have now submitted their main research report to my Department and published version 2 of the evaluative framework. I have today placed copies in the House Library. I am sure that the publication of this updated version will improve its usefulness to both the local authorities and the coal industry and will help resolve many of the problems that have been experienced.

London Boroughs Grant Scheme

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to approve a budget for the London boroughs grant scheme; and what steps he is taking to ensure the future well-being of those schemes approved for the current financial year.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 6 March 1991]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has no power to approve a budget for the London boroughs grants scheme. This is a matter for agreement by the constituent boroughs. However, at the request of the London boroughs grants committee, he has agreed to exercise his power to set a limit on the maximum expenditure of the scheme in 1991-92 and has set it at £30·155 million.

Planning Applications

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions in the current parliamentary Session he has had local authority planning applications referred to him which contravened both the local county structure plan and the local rural areas plan; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo [holding answer 8 March 1991]: Information in the form requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

At present, local authorities are required to report to my right hon. Friend only those proposals which would materially conflict with or prejudice the implementation of the development plan. In 1990 local authorities reported to my right hon. Friend 278 proposals which, in their opinion, materially conflicted with a development plan.

Benzene

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the legal benzene limits in petrol in other countries of the world; and what is the legal benzene limit in petrol in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Moynihan: I have been asked to reply.

The benzene content of petrol in the United Kingdom, in common with all the other EC member states, is limited to a maximum of 5 per cent. by volume by EC directive 85/210/EEC. The Department of Energy does not hold information on legal benzene limits in non-EC countries, but we understand that there is no country which imposes a lower legal limit.

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the level of benzene in (a) four-star petrol, (b) three-star petrol and (c) unleaded petrol.

Mr. Moynihan: I have been asked to reply.

In 1988 petrol quality surveys in the United Kingdom market suggested a range of benzene contents for leaded petrol of 2·9 to 4·7 per cent. and for unleaded petrol of 3·4 to 4·5 per cent. Three-star petrol is no longer sold in the United Kingdom.

Genetically Modified Organisms

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many genetically modified organisms have been released to the environment in the United Kingdom in the years 1986, 1987, 1988, 1989, 1990 and 1991.

Mr. Forth: I have been asked to reply.

The number of releases of genetically modified organisms into the environment since 1986 are as follows:

Year	Number of releases
1986	1
1987	3
1988	6
1989	5
1990	[1]13
1991	[2]Nil

[1] In 1990, in addition to 13 small-scale field trials, one product —a genetically modified bakers yeast—was cleared for marketing.
[2] In 1991, no releases have taken place to date. One trial has been cleared to take place later in 1991.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Community Charge

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much he expects to save from community charge benefit in Scotland as a result of the introduction of the community charge reduction scheme.

Mr. Mellor: Some £15 million.

Mr. Dover: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if community charge reductions operative from 1 April will be taken into account in the calculation of future retail prices indices.

Mr. Maples: Yes.

Mr. Favell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the reduction in the retail prices index, if the community charge were abolished and the expenditure transferred to the central Exchequer.

Mr. Maples: It is not the practice to provide estimates of the effects on the retail prices index of such hypothetical changes to the public finances. The effects would depend on how the expenditure currently financed by the community charge would subsequently be funded and how the Central Statistical Office would treat the abolition of the community charge in the RPI.

Exchange Rates

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the change in the real and the nominal exchange rate of sterling against (a) the deutschmark, (b) the United States dollar and (c) the yen, between the last quarter of 1986 and the last quarter of 1990.

Mr. Maples: The nominal and real exchange rate changes between the last quarter of 1986 and the third quarter of 1990 are shown in the table. There are several ways in which changes in the real exchange rate can be measured. The table shows the changes indicated by the different increases in GDP deflators over the relevant period.

	Change 1986Q4 to 1990Q3 per cent.
DM/Sterling	$/Sterling	Yen/Sterling
3·38	30·15	17·93
[1]21·36	[2]45·73	[3]45·82

[1] Real DM/Sterling.
[2] Real $/Sterling.
[3] Real Yen/Sterling.

Data are not yet available to calculate real exchange rates up to the fourth quarter of 1990.

Child Care

Dr. Marek: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the cost of provision for child care for civil servants.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: In 1989 the Treasury gave Departments discretion to contribute towards the costs of child care facilities where this offered value for money and could be contained within existing departmental running costs limits. Information on how much has been spent on child care is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Birds and Animals (Seizures)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state any conveniently available figures for the number of occasions in the past five years when Customs officers have delivered seized specimens of birds or animals to airlines for return to their country of origin.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Live creatures seized by Customs under endangered species legislation are, whenever feasible, returned to their country of origin for eventual release back into the wild. This is in accordance with one of the principles established in the Washington convention on international trade in endangered species of wild fauna and flora. Figures are held centrally, in conveniently accessible form, only from 1989 onwards. In that time there has been one operation involving the return of birds to Turkey.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what quarantine arrangements have been made in the new Stansted terminal for wild birds and other animals confiscated in accordance with the Endangered Species (Import and Export) Act 1976.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: None. Quarantine facilities are not generally available at, ports and airports. Their absence does not impair Customs ability to enforce the controls on endangered species.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action was taken by Customs and Excise officials in relation to the unlawful concealment of goldfinches in the luggage of Mr. I. H. of Wood Green, Essex, discovered at Stansted airport on 18 September 1990.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Action was taken to seize and forfeit the birds under the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979.

Civil Servants, South Wales

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to improve the career structure for civil servants employed in south Wales.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Although there are no central plans specific to south Wales, my right hon. Friend keeps all aspects of the staffing of the civil service under review.

Members of the European Parliament

Dr. Godman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many letters he has received since 4 January 1990 from Members of the European Parliament concerning local or national matters; and if he will make it his practice where the former are concerned to provide the hon. Member for the local constituency with copies of any such correspondence for his or her information.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Since 4 January 1990 Treasury Ministers have received 79 letters from Members of the European Parliament concerning local or United Kingdom matters. Where Members of the European Parliament raise matters in correspondence which are exclusively of local interest, the practice is to reply suggesting that the MEP should refer the matter to the hon. Member for the constituency concerned. As with other correspondence, replies to such communications would normally be copied to the hon. Member concerned only if the MEP had himself copied his letter in this way.

Alcohol Duties

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what he bases his February forecast of a 13·3 per cent. increase in the revenue from alcohol duties for 1990-91; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Several factors were taken into account in deriving the forecast which is based on the Chancellor's 1990 autumn statement. The most important of these were the forecast growth in real consumers' expenditure in 1990, the 1990 Budget changes in excise duties on alcoholic drinks and the path of revenue receipts in the year to date at the time the forecast was made.

An estimate of the revenue outturn in 1990-91 will be available when the Chancellor issues his 1991 Financial Statement and Budget Report.

Tobacco Taxation

Mr. Amos: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received in favour of (a) an increase in the taxation of tobacco products and (b) decreasing the taxation of tobacco products in his forthcoming Budget; if he will list them; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I have received many letters this year about the taxation of tobacco products. Those asking for a freeze outnumber those asking for an increase. I do not propose to list all those that have written. However, most of those asking for a freeze consist of small shopkeepers acting on a campaign organised by the Tobacco Alliance while the majority of those asking for an increase consist of various health organisations, regional health authorities and members of the public.

Mr. Amos: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the yield, in current and in real terms, from tobacco tax in each of the last five years for which figures are available; what is the estimated yield for the current year; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Following is the available information:

£ million

	Tobacco Duty Receipts		Estimates of VAT on Tobacco Expenditure
	At Current prices	At 1989-90 prices	At Current pices	At 1989-90 prices
1985-86	4,459	5,470	920	1,130
1986-87	4,755	5,650	990	1,180
1987-88	4,767	5,450	1,000	1,150
1988-89	4,990	5,380	1,050	1,130
1989-90	5,035	5,035	1,080	1,080

The 1990 autumn statement forecast of receipts in current prices from tobacco duty for 1990-91 was £5·5 billion. Comparable forecasts for the other elements shown in the table are not available. The next estimate for the yield from tobacco duty in 1990-91 will be published in the Financial Statement and Budget Report.

Mr. Amos: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the effect on the retail prices index of raising the tax on a packet of 20 cigarettes by (a) 20p, (b) 32p and (c) 50p; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: If the increases in tax were fully reflected in cigarette prices the direct effects on the retail prices index would be approximately as follows:

Increases in tax on 20 cigarettes	Percentage points effect on RPI
20p	+0·4
32p	+0·6
50p	+0·9

Mr. Amos: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much revenue would arise in a full financial year from raising the tax on a packet of 20 cigarettes by (a) 20p, (b) 32p and (c) 50p; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The revenue yield from these tax increases can be estimated by using the tax revenue ready reckoner in table 4.7 of chapter 4 of the 1990 autumn statement.

Capital Transfers

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he issued any instructions in the period 1982 to 1987 to allow exemption by the Inland Revenue on capital transfers between companies from capital duties; and when such transfers were treated as gifts;

(2) if he will publish the guidelines used in exempting capital transfers between companies from capital duty in the period 1982 to 1987;

(3) if he will furnish an estimate of the value of capital transfers between United Kingdom stockbrokers and their parent banks exempted from capital duty in the period 1982 to 1987 by the Inland Revenue.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 8 March 1991]: Capital duty was charged not on capital transfers but on contributions of capital to a company—for example on the formation of the company. The scope of the duty was laid down in legislation.

It is not clear what information the hon. Member has in mind. If he will write to me I shall be able to consider his points in more detail.

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will specify the circumstances in which a person in receipt of mobility allowance is not required to pay (a) VAT or (b) car tax on the purchase of a motor vehicle; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 7 March 1991]: All handicapped persons, including those in receipt of mobility allowance, are eligible for VAT and car tax relief when they purchase a motor vehicle, but only if that vehicle has been designed or substantially and permanently adapted for their use.

Cigarette Prices

Mr. Amos: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the ratio of the price of an average priced packet of 20 cigarettes to the average weekly wage in each of (a) 1961, (b) 1971, (c) 1981 and (d) the latest year for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maples: The table shows the average price of 20 cigarettes as a percentage of average gross weekly wages for adult male manual workers in manufacturing industries.

	Per cent.
October 1961	1·4
October 1971	0·9

EMPLOYMENT

Disabled People

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the measures taken by Her Majesty's Government since 1979 to assist in the employment of disabled people.

Mr. Jackson: The Government have an impressive record over recent years on measures which assist people with disabilities to find and keep employment and to develop within it. My Department has lead responsibility within government for this matter and in 1989-90 the Department spent around £400 million on helping 225,000 people with disabilities through its general and special programmes and services.

Initiatives aimed at improving the prospects for people with disabilities, including their employment prospects, are promoted by Government Departments in co-operation with a range of agencies and organisations. Measures taken since 1979 by my Department and other Government Departments are listed in the table. Other measures introduced before 1979 have also been continuing since then. People with disabilities can also participate alongside non-disabled people wherever possible in much mainstream provision as is not mentioned here.

1979: The Fit for Work Award Scheme was introduced by the Department of Employment Group.

1981: The Department of Employment Group replaced Disablement Advisory Committees by Committees for the Employment of Disabled People.

1981: A review of the Department of Employment Group's Employment Rehabilitation Service was undertaken.

1982: Report by the Department of Employment Group on its Review of Assistance to Disabled People.

1982: The Department of Social Security's Mobility Allowance, for people who are unable to walk or virtually unable to walk due to physical disablement, was made tax free.

1982: The Department of Trade and Industry introduced support for Information Technology projects for people with disabilities.

1983: The Department of Employment Group guaranteed a one year training place under the Youth Training Scheme to all those leaving school without a job to go to regardless of race, sex, religion, or disability up to the age of 18 years.

1983: The Department of Employment Group introduced the Disablement Advisory Service which helps advise employers on how to integrate people with disabilities into their workforce and promote good employment and development policies.

1983: The Department of Employment Group's Individual Training Throughout with an Employer scheme was introduced under which people with disabilities were placed with an employer and given training in a skill or semi-skill on an individual basis.

1983: The Department of Employment Group introduced its Release For Training scheme which provided support for people with disabilities already in employment who were experiencing difficulties which required a period of essential training.

1983: The Department of Employment Group introduced the Professional Training Scheme which provided assistance, to a maximum of three years, for people with disabilities who had been refused an LEA grant, to help meet the costs of courses of higher level study, including university courses.

1984: The Department of Employment Group launched the Code of Good Practice on the Employment of Disabled People.

1984: The Department of Employment Group published a report on Proposals for the Development of the Employment Rehabilitation Service.

1984: The Department of Employment Group's Asset Centres were set up to provide assessment and rehabilitation services in areas not well served by Employment Rehabilitation Centres.

1984: Introduction in Scotland under the Building Standards (Scotland) Amendment Regulations 1984 of Part T 'Facilities for Disabled Persons' which ensures that account is taken of the needs of people with disabilities in the construction of most new buildings and during alterations and extensions of certain existing buildings.

1985: The Department of Employment Group introduced the Sheltered Placement Scheme to enable individuals with severe disabilities to work in open employment alongside non-disabled workers.

1985: The Department of Employment Group introduced the Wider Opportunities Training Programme aimed to help unemployed people, including people with disabilities, to improve their competitiveness for employment or further vocational training.

1985: The Department of Employment Group introduced the Job Training Scheme which provided vocational training to those who were unemployed to help them compete in the labour market and had relaxed eligibility rules for people with disabilities.

1985: The Department of Employment Group set up the Residential Training Unit to provide funds centrally for Residential Training. Four residential training colleges and a number of private training colleges are supported to provide training in a wide range of courses and catering for a variety of disabilities, most offering qualifications.

1985: The Department of Employment Group introduced the Other Training Arrangements scheme which provided additional funding to purchase training for people with disabilities where mainstream training precluded certain skill areas or specialist provision was needed.

1985: The Building (Fourth Amendment) Regulations 1985 require new offices, shops, single storey independent educational buildings and other single story buildings in England and Wales to which the public is to be admitted to be constructed with suitable means of access for people with disabilities.

1985: The Companies Act introduced a requirement for Directors' Reports for companies with over 250 employees to state company policy on the recruitment, retention and development of staff with disabilities.

1985: The Office for the Minister for the Civil service issued a Code of Practice on the Employment of People with Disabilities in the Civil Service which aimed to help departments and agencies to achieve equality of opportunity for people with disabilities and to make full use of the skills and abilities they possess.

1986: The Department of Trade and Industry launched the 'Concerned Technology' scheme which supported Information Technology projects such as information provision (e.g. through computer databases) for people with disabilities and the purchase of home work units for people with disabilities.

1986: The Department of Employment Group introduced two year Youth Training Scheme providing vocational training leading to specific qualifications. Premium grants were available for a number of high quality training places for young people with special needs, with additional funding for young people with disabilities with particular training needs. Other special arrangements for people with disabilities included extension of the YTS guarantee up to the age of 21 years for people with disabilities who needed to stay in full time education, relaxed eligibility criterial and residential training where appropriate.

1986: The Health and Safety Commission's action programme on occupational health encouraged employers to have access to occupational health advice. This assists job retention and job adaptation when people in work become disabled.

1987: The Building (Disabled People) Regulations 1987 came into force applying access regulations for people with disabilities to three additional categories of multi-storey premises: namely, factories, independent educational establishments and premises to which the public is admitted.

1987: Under the Department of Employment Group's New Job Training Scheme four special schemes were introduced to help people with disabilities gain maximum benefit from training. These were:

Special Aids to Employment;
Adaptations to Premises and Equipment;
Personal Reader Service for the Blind; and Communication Service for the Deaf.

1987: The Department of Employment Group published its Asset Evaluation Report which identified the strength and weakness of Assets and Employment Rehabilitation Centres.

1987: The Department of Employment Group published its report on the Development of the Employment Rehabilitation Service.

1988: The Department of Health made available sophisticated "Environmental Control" equipment designed to be used in employment or education with the users' own computer.

1988: The Department of Employment Group evaluated its Sheltered Placement Scheme.

1988: Employment Training was introduced by the Department of Employment Group to help unemployed people gain the skills and experience needed to compete for jobs locally. Aspects of Employment Training which particularly assist people with disabilities, include relaxed eligibility criteria; individual training plans; in depth assessment; part-time training; residential training; and special help and provision where necessary.

1988: The Department of Employment Group's Special Training Provision was introduced as part of Employment Training to pay for the more specialised assessment and training needs of people with disabilities and could also be used for training lasting up to a maximum of two years where extra time was necessary.

1989: Local housing authorities given wide discretion under the Local Government Housing Act 1989 to approve disabled facilities grants for works to make a dwelling or building suitable for the accommodation, welfare or employment of a disabled occupant.

1989: The Department of Transport's "Transport and Disability—A Statement of Aims and Priorities" was issued setting out the improvements to public and private transport which have opened up new opportunities for people with disabilities and identifies the aims for the future.

1989: The Department of Employment Group published Building on Ability, a guide for training people with disabilities.

1990: The Department of Employment Group introduced Youth Training with new flexibilities for young people with disabilities.

1990: The Office for the Minister for the Civil Service updated its Code of Practice on the Employment of People with Disabilities in the Civil Service.

1990: The Department of Employment Group published a consultative document "Employment and Training for People with Disabilities" aimed at ensuring the Department's services meet the needs of people with disabilities in the 1990s.

1990: The Department of Employment Group published an evaluation of their special schemes for people with disabilities and consulted on the need for change.

1990: "Employment and Handicap" was published, reporting on research funded by the Department of Employment Group which was undertaken by the Social and Community Planning Research to estimate the size of the population of people with disabilities who might be eligible for or need help from Department of Employment Group services.

1990: The Department of Employment Group published a research paper on the policies and practices of employers entitled "The Employment of People with Disabilities".

1990: The Department of Social Security published "The Way Ahead" announcing its proposals for a new benefit (Disability Working Allowance) to provide better help and opportunities for people with disabilities wishing to work.

1990: The Department of Employment Group introduced a new symbol for employers to adopt to show their commitment to good policies for the employment of people with disabilities.
1990: The publication of the Disability Living Allowance and the Disability Working Allowance Bill.
1990: The Department of Employment Group announced its aim to make an offer of a place to unemployed people with disabilities on one of its four main employment and training programmes—Employment Training, the Enterprise Allowance Scheme, the Job Interview Guarantee and Jobclubs.
1991: The Scottish Office Education Department commissioned research into the post-school placement of children and young persons with Record of Needs, including how different educational placements influence a young person's later changes of employment.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will consider introducing a communicator service for employees who are deaf or hard of hearing, following his Department's evaluation of special schemes for people with disabilities.

Mr. Jackson [holding answer 8 March 1991]: The consultation period for the evaluation paper ended on 1 February 1991. My Department is currently analysing the responses received. We will consider carefully all suggestions made for changes to the schemes, including the suggestion that a communicator service should be introduced for employees who are deaf or hard of hearing.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what local monitoring arrangements he has in place to ensure that training and enterprise councils are aware of, and provide for, the special training needs of people with disabilities.

Mr. Jackson [holding answer 8 March 1991]: Each training and enterprise council is required to set out in its corporate and business plans how it intends to meet the needs of people with disabilities. These plans are subject to approval by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State.

Specific contractual requirements common to all TECs include providing appropriate training to people with special training needs, including those with a disability. My Department has produced guidance on how to plan for and deliver training to meet those needs.

TECs' performance against their plans will be regularly monitored by my Department. In addition, the Training Standards Advisory Service will be appraising the quality of training offered by TECs including provision for people with disabilities.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received about the closure of employment rehabilitation centres for disabled people; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson [holding answer 8 March 1991]: My right hon. and learned Friend has received very few representations about the possible closure of individual employment rehabilitation centres.

The Government's intentions for assessment and rehabilitation services were set out in the consultative document "Employment and Training for People with Disabilities" published in June 1990. These involve improving geographical coverage and our capacity to respond flexibly to the needs of people with disabilities through establishing local employment service assessment teams and increasing the extent to which, particularly in rehabilitation, services are purchased from voluntary and other appropriate organisations.

Comments were invited on how the plans for developing rehabilitation might most effectively be implemented. Analysis of comments received on the consultative document is not yet complete.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what consideration he has given to the recommendation of the Employment Select Committee's first report on disability and employment for full Government commitment to improving the 3 per cent. quota system; what action he is taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson [holding answer 8 March 1991]: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has written to the Chairman of the Committee to express his pleasure at the participation of the Committee in the consultative process, to say that the Committee's report will be given full consideration along with all other responses received and to commit himself to keeping the Committee informed on progress on all the issues that it raised.

In the consultative document we made no firm proposals about the quota scheme, but invited comments on its merits and demerits. We are still considering the responses, including that of the Employment Committee.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of the responses to the recent consultative document "Employment and Training for People with Disabilities" supported the introduction of legislation to outlaw unjustifiable discrimination on the grounds of disability; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The consultative document invited comments on the merits and demerits of various legislative approaches to securing good practice in the employment of people with disabilities. A number of respondents have expressed support for legislation which they describe in a variety of ways, some more precisely than others. It is not possible to state the percentage which support outlawing unjustifiable discrimination on the grounds of disability without the risk of oversimplifying or misinterpreting views and giving misleading information. We are still considering the comments we have received.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if, following his consultation on the employment and training of disabled people, he will consider introducing a legislative framework on the employment of disabled people.

Mr. Jackson: In the consultative document "Employment and Training for People with Disabilities" we sought comments on the merits and demerits of the existing legislative framework on the employment of disabled people and possible legislative alternatives. We are still considering the responses we have received.

Census Enumerators

Mr. Blair: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what the effect of advertising for census enumerators in jobcentres has been on the seasonally adjusted increase in unemployment figures in January.

Mr. Jackson: The effect, if any, is likely to have been extremely small because recruitment began in early January and for the vast majority of jobs advertised the period of employment will not commence until late March.

Crown Immunity

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the lifting of Crown immunity from Government Departments in respect of the 3 per cent. quota of jobs for disabled people.

Mr. Jackson: The Government's consultative document "Employment and Training for People with Disabilities" invited comments on the merits and demerits of the quota scheme. We are presently considering the response to the consultations.

Chemical Testing

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he has formulated any response to the European Community Commission's EINECS proposal on chemical testing.

Mr. Forth: There is no EINECS proposal on chemical testing. EINECS is the European inventory of existing commercial chemical substances, a list of approximately 100,000 chemicals which were on the European Community market between 1 January 1971 and 18 January 1981. Such substances are exempt from the notification scheme for new substances established by the sixth amendment to the European Community dangerous substances directive.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment which committees of the European Community on which Her Majesty's Government are represented are currently reviewing the subject of chemical testing.

Mr. Forth: Her Majesty's Government are represented on three main committees which review industrial chemical testing. Those currently in existence are:

The competent authorities committee for the implementation of directive 79/831/EEC.

The national co-ordination committee for testing methods which oversees all testing methods.

The technical progress committee which is responsible for approving changes in legislation for testing methods.

P and O

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what response he has made to the ruling of the International Labour Organisation in respect of the dismissal of staff involved in an industrial dispute with the P and O shipping company in 1988; what is the relationship between the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 and the ILO conventions on freedom of association; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: There has been no such ruling. Having considered certain complaints from the National Union of Seamen, the International Labour Organisation's committee on freedom of association—CFA—has made certain recommendations. The CFA has referred these to the ILO committee of experts. The Government will continue to respond fully to all parts of the ILO supervisory machinery on this matter as and when appropriate.

The Government remain convinced that nothing in United Kingdom general employment legislation—including the provisions of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978, as subsequently amended—is incompatible with guarantees afforded by ratified ILO conventions.

Members of the European Parliament

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many letters he has received since 4 January 1990 from Members of the European Parliament concerning local or national matters; and if he will make it his practice where the former are concerned to provide the hon. Member for the local constituency with copies of any such correspondence for his or her information.

Mr. Forth: A total of 96 such letters were received between 4 January 1990 and 1 March 1991. Where Members of the European Parliament raise matters in correspondence which are exclusively of local interest, the practice is to reply suggesting that the MEP should refer the matter to the hon. Member for the constituency concerned. As with other correspondence, replies to such communications would normally be copied to the hon. Member concerned only if the MEP had himself copied his letter in this way.

North of England Building Society

Mr. Madel: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will invite the Advisory Conciliation and Arbitration Service to meet the North of England building society and the Banking, Insurance and Finance Union to discuss arrangements by which the request of the building society's staff to be represented by the union could be considered.

Dr. Bray: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will invite the Advisory Conciliation and Arbitration Service to meet the North of England building society and the Banking, Insurance and Finance Union to discuss arrangements by which the wishes of the building society's staff to be represented by the union can be met.

Mr. Forth: No. In any matter of this kind, it is entirely for the parties concerned to decide whether or not to seek the assistance of the independent Advisory Conciliation and Arbitration Service.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment by how much the Devon and Cornwall TEC budget for adult training has been reduced in the current year; what plans he has to reinstate these cuts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The contract with Devon and Cornwall TEC is at present subject to negotiation.

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received from TECs over delays in announcing financial arrangements for the current year and over the withdrawal of approval for courses without prior consultation or notice.

Mr. Jackson: I have received several representations from TECs on a variety of financial issues. It is for TECs themselves to decide on the arrangements for contracting with training providers.

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment which training and enterprise councils have signed operational contracts since July 1990; and if he will list the organisations represented on the TEC.

Mr. Jackson: The following training and enterprise councils have signed operational contracts since 1 July 1990:

South East
Essex
Hampshire
Heart of England
Isle of Wight
Kent
Milton Keynes and North Buckinghamshire

London
AZTEC

South West
Gloucestershire

TEC board members are directors in their own right and do not serve as representatives of any organisation. An up-to-date list of directors of each operational TEC is held in the House of Commons Library.

No Smoking Day

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to support smokers in his Department to give up smoking on the eighth No Smoking Day on 13 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: A number of localised initiatives will be taking place and literature has been widely distributed. My Department provides support throughout the year to smokers who wish to give up and will continue to do so.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Flakt System

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has on the Flakt system to recover and recycle flue gases from waste incineration plants; and if he will evaluate its applicability to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Leigh: The Flakt system is one of a number of systems for cleaning flue gases.

I understand that Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution, which is involved in the enforcement of pollution control legislation relating to waste incineration, is aware of the class of pollution abatement system to which the Flakt type belong. However, it is for individual operators of plants which produce flue gases, rather than my Department or the inspectorate, to evaluate particular technologies which may help such plants to meet the requirements of pollution control legislation.

Unsolicited Sales Literature

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will introduce legislation to ban the sending of unsolicited sales literature by fax.

Mr. Redwood: The branch systems licence under the Telecommunications Act 1984 provides for people not wishing to receive unsolicited sales literature by fax to place their fax numbers on a special register. Anyone sending such unsolicitied material to a number on the register will be in breach of the licence and ultimately the Director General of Telecommunications can remove the right to operate under the licence from a persistent offender, making him unable to use his telephone systems. The arrangements for the register are being finalised by the director general in discussion with interested parties.

Newspapers

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he proposes to refer the current arrangements for the distribution of newspapers, together with the recently introduced reduction of terms to retailers, to the Director of Fair Trading and the Monopolies and Mergers Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: The Office of Fair Trading is currently looking at various aspects of newspaper wholesaling, including distribution arrangements, carriage charges and the reduction in terms to retailers recently introduced for certain national newspapers. The director general will decide in the light of these inquiries whether further action under the competition legislation is warranted. It would not be appropriate for me to speculate what the outcome of these inquiries will be.

EC Insurance Directive

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the third insurance directive of the EC will come before the Council of Ministers; and whether it is the intention of the EC that this directive will be subject to the Cumul rule.

Mr. Redwood: The European Commission sent its proposal for the third non-life insurance directive to the Council of Ministers on 27 July 1990. The proposal for the third life insurance directive will be sent to the Council shortly. The Commission has proposed that the third non-life directive should be adopted by the Council in the course of 1992 and the third life directive by December 1992. Both directives propose the abolition of the ability of member states to restrict Cumul.

EC Trade Marks

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress his Department has made in seeking to secure the planned new EC trade marks office in a United Kingdom location; and what consideration he has recently given to specific United Kingdom sites, including the London borough of Harrow.

Mr. Leigh: The location of the Community trade marks office has become linked with the wider issue of the location of other Community bodies, on which there has been no progress in recent years. In view of the uncertainty in timing, no consideration has recently been given to specific sites. However, the United Kingdom bid to locate the office in London remains on the table.

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he expects the United Kingdom to meet its obligations under the Community trade marks harmonisation directive before 31 December; and when he expects to publish new domestic trade marks legislation to implement this and related objectives.

Mr. Leigh: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer to my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon) on Friday 1 March, Official Report, column 656.

Post Office Staff

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will direct the Post Office to act in accordance with best practice in the matter of relocating displaced Post Office staff in Quadrant.

Mr. Leigh: The reorganisation of Quadrant is an operational matter for Post Office management and it would not therefore be appropriate for me to comment on the relocation of staff.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will meet the chairman of the Post Office to discuss the changes which took place among senior Post Office Quadrant staff in 1990 and the reasons for departures of staff.

Mr. Leigh: Matters of appointment and termination of employment of Post Office staff are a matter for the Post Office and its employees.

Members of the European Parliament

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many letters he has received, since 4 January 1990, from Members of the European Parliament concerning local or national matters; and if he will make it his practice, where the former are concerned, to provide the hon. Member for the local constituency with copies of any such correspondence for his or her information.

Mr. Sainsbury: DTI Ministers have received 78 communications from Members of the European Parliament since 4 January 1990. Where Members of the European Parliament raise matters in correspondence which are exclusively of local interest, the practice is to reply suggesting that the MEP should refer the matter to the hon. Member for the constituency concerned. As with other correspondence, replies to such communications would normally be copied to the hon. Member concerned only if the MEP had himself copied his letter in this way.

National House Building Council

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to make a statement on the National House Building Council reference made to him recently.

Mr. Redwood: The Monopolies and Mergers Commission report "Structural Warranty Services in Relation to New Homes" was published on 6 March 1991. A copy of the report has been placed in the Library of the House together with a copy of the Department's press notice announcing publication. At the time of publication the Secretary of State also announced a period of consultation on possible changes to the rules of the National House Building Council, to eliminate the adverse effects identified by the Commission.

Coffee

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on what date he received the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's report on the soluble coffee market.

Mr. Redwood: The Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on the supply of soluble coffee for retail sale within the United Kingdom was received on 8 January 1991. It was published on 8 March 1991 and a copy has been placed in the Library of the House.

Digital Exchanges

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what estimate he has of investment in integrated services digital networks in Wales; and if he will list by geographical location the networks so far completed in Wales and those for which definite plans exist;

(2) what estimate he has of investment in integrated services digital network 2 in Wales; and if he will list by geographical location the integrated services digital network 2 installations in Wales and those for which definite plans exist.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 5 March 1991]: The information requested is primarily for the telecommunications companies concerned.

British Telecom offers two types of ISDN service, ISDN 2 for small to medium-sized organisations, and ISDN 30 for large organisations. ISDN 2 is currently available in Cardiff, Cwmbran, Llanrumney, Neath, Newport Gwent, Port Talbot, Rhyl, Swansea and Wrexham. By the end of March 1991, the service should also be available in Llanelli, Maeglas and Pembroke. By the end of 1991, British Telecom plans to make ISDN 2 available in every major high street and business centre, subject to identified market demand. ISDN 30 is now available to all large organisations whose digital switchboards can be connected to a local digital exchange.

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what estimate he has of investment in the installation of digital exchanges in Wales; and if he will list by geographical location the exchanges so far installed in Wales and those for which definite plans exist;

(2) what estimate he has of investment in the upgrading of cabling in Wales.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 5 March 1991]: The information requested is primarily for the telecommunications companies concerned. British Telecom has a running investment programme of approximately £100 million per annum for network modernisation in Wales and the Marches. Almost every major town is now served by a digital exchange. In addition, Mercury's digital trunk network extends to Swansea, Cardiff and Newport.

Telephone Cables (Al Jubayl)

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will request the Saudi Arabian Government to speed up the provision of a telephone cable in order to operate the 20 Mercury telephones waiting to be installed in Al Jubayl.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 7 March 1991]: I am informed that Mercury Communications Ltd. is now in the process of providing equipment so that its 20 payphones in the Al-Jubayl area may become operational. The complete system is scheduled to be in service within 10 days.

International Space University

Mr. Warren: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's bid to obtain the siting of the international space university in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 8 March 1991]: The British National Space Centre has offered a grant towards the costs of holding the 1991 session of the international space university in the United Kingdom. The Government would welcome the presence of ISU here this year, but space industry sponsorship will also be sought.

CIVIL SERVICE

International Organisations

44. Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service if he is encouraging more civil servants to apply for postings in international organisations of which Britain is a member.

Mr. Renton: We attach great importance to Britain's being properly represented in international organisations. With that in mind we have launched the European fast stream which is aimed at preparing British candidates for the recruitment competitions of the European Community institutions.

"Next Steps" Agencies

45. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service how the "next steps" initiative will affect services to the general public; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: "Next steps" is already delivering improved service to the public. We have recently published a White Paper—Cm 1261—giving many examples of what agencies are doing to consult their customers and give better service. We should see more and more of this.

Civil Service College

46. Mr. David Martin: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service how equal opportunities is incorporated in training at the Civil Service college.

Mr. Renton: Equality of opportunity is an integral part of each of the management development, fast stream, and personnel management training programmes. Management skills courses in this area are also provided for line managers and equal opportunities officers.

Child Care

Dr. Marek: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service if he will take steps to ensure that there will be adequate funds for and co-ordination of the London child care project, the proposed central London nursery and the London ring; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The office of the Minister for the Civil Service provides appropriate co-ordination for the London child care project. Decisions on establishing and funding child care facilities are for Departments and agencies. In total, there are now 10 nurseries and over 70 play schemes in operation across the country, with more planned.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Traffic Statistics

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the number of vehicles passing along Hightown road in Newtownabbey between Mallusk road and Upper Hightown road per 24-hour period; and what was the maximum and minimum hourly traffic flows at the latest available date.

Mr. Hanley: Latest traffic survey figures for the Hightown road between Mallusk road and Upper Hightown road are:

Date of survey	Total traffic flow vehicles per day	Maximum vehicles per hour	Minimum vehicles per hour
18 February to 1 March 1991	3,433	169	3

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the number of vehicles per 24-hour period passing along (a) the A26 between Antrim and Ballymena, (b) the B59 between Doagh and the A36, (c) the B98 between the A26 and the B59 and (d) the B53 between the A26 and the A36; and what were the maximum and minimum hourly traffic flows in each case for the latest available date.

Mr. Hanley: Some of the information requested is not available. Traffic survey figures that are available for the roads in question are:

Date of survey	Total traffic flow vehicles per day	Maximum vehicles per hour	Minimum vehicles per hour
(a) January 1991	15,568	1,695	21
(b) August 1980	1,847	206	[1]
(c) July 1982	2,002	[1]	[1]
(d) June 1990	752	[1]	[1]

[1] Not available.

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the number of vehicles in Newtownabbey passing along (a) the Hightown road between Hamin park and Glengormley, (b) the Antrim road between Glencairn park and Glengormley, (c) the Ballyclare road between Glencairn drive and Glengormley per 24-hour period; and what were the maximum and minimum hourly traffic flows in each case at the latest available date.

Mr. Hanley: In November 1988 the maximum hourly traffic flows for the roads in question were:

Location	Maximum vehicles per hour
Hightown road	714
Antrim road	712
Ballyclare road	718

The remainder of the information requested is not available.

Downshire Hospital, Downpatrick

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions have been held with staff and trade union representatives about the continuing retraction of mental health services in the Downshire hospital, Downpatrick, located in the Down and Lisburn unit of management.

Mr. Hanley: The changes in services at Downshire hospital, which are fully in line with the Department of Health and Social Services regional strategy, have been the subject of detailed discussions with staff on the site. The Down and Lisburn unit of management's draft business plan 1991-92, which reflects the Eastern board's response to the regional strategy, was discussed with the Northern Ireland committee of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions on 29 October 1990 and I understand that a further meeting has been offered. Alongside the formal trade union consultation process, three seminars have been held in the last month with staff on the site.

Rural Development

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many area co-ordinators will be appointed to the rural development division of the Department of Agriculture; and where they will be located;

(2) what is the membership and terms of reference of the recently established Rural Development Council for Northern Ireland;

(3) when the Department of Agriculture will publish a summary, conclusions and recommendations in respect of the work of the interdepartmental committee on rural development.

Mr. Hanley: I have asked officials to prepare a summary of the work, conclusions and recommendations of the interdepartmental committee on rural development. This will be available for publication when the pressures of establishing the Rural Development Council and the co-ordination structure for rural development within the Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland permit.

Work to establish a Rural Development Council is under way with the intention to have it in operation early in the 1991-92 financial year. Membership will be drawn from a wide spectrum of rural interests and I will make a further statement as soon as possible.

While the number of co-ordinators ultimately required will depend on the workload which arises, initially three will be appointed and located in the south, west and north of the Province.

Rural Housing

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions have taken place about the allocation of funding to the Housing Executive to enable it to execute a programme to address increasing rural unfitness; and if the Government will allocate special funding to undertake a programme of rural rehabilitation.

Mr. Hanley: Rural housing unfitness is a complex problem largely confined to private owner-occupied properties. The means of tackling it is therefore through the renovation grants scheme and the executive's continuing grants programme which is targeted on those individuals and properties most in need. Funding for the executive's grants programme has been provided in response to its annual stategy review which supports its bid and is discussed as part of the public expenditure survey process.

The executive recently issued a consultative document "Leading the Way" as a means of reviewing its rural housing policies and has conducted an extensive series of meetings with various interested local groups. Following an analysis of the detailed responses to this exercise the executive will be presenting its proposals to the Department for further consideration and discussion.

Education and Libraries Boards

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many field officers have been employed by each of the education and library boards in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years;

(2) what has been the cost of employing field officers by each of the education and library boards in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years.

Dr. Mawhinney: The number of field officer posts in each board's curriculum support service in 1989-90 and 1990-91 and the associated estimated cost was as follows:

	Number of posts	1989-90 Estimated cost (£ thousands)	Number of posts	1990-91 Estimated cost (£ thousands)
Belfast	30	409	38	568
Western	48	677	56	880
North Eastern	43	615	53	799
South Eastern	42	582	50	777
Southern	43	632	51	786

Figures are not available for earlier years.

Cancer

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether there is any evidence that the incidence of cancers has increased in recent years in the coastal areas of Northern Ireland as compared with inland areas.

Mr. Hanley: Information on the incidence of cancer is not normally collected on the basis of whether a person lives in a coastal or inland area. However, an independent committee investigating patterns of disease with a possible association with radiation which reported in 1989 found no evidence of a higher incidence of childhood leukaemia in coastal compared with inland areas.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he has any evidence that the incidence of cancers has increased in areas affected by the fallout from Chernobyl.

Mr. Hanley: None.

Family Credit

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in how many cases ex-gratia payments have been made in respect of claims for family credit; and what were the criteria on which such ex-gratia payments were made.

Mr. Hanley: Only one ex-gratia payment has been made since the introduction of family credit in April 1988.

An ex-gratia payment is made where the Department of Health and Social Services is satisfied that an officer has wrongly advised a person and this has resulted in loss of benefit; where a person has provided all the information required but the Department of Health and Social Services failed to take the necessary action; and where it is clear that a person gave the Department of Health and Social Services information that indicated prima facie entitlement to benefit but the Department failed to follow it up.

Pensioners

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the total number of pensioners in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: At 31 March 1990, the latest date for which figures are available, 215,604 people were receiving retirement pension and non-contributory retirement pension.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many pensioners in Northern Ireland are in receipt of income support.

Mr. Hanley: On 31 May 1989, the latest date for which information is readily available, the number of income support recipients aged over 65—men—and 60—women—was 55,680.

Source: 5 per cent. sample.

Security Force Operations

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in how many instances ex-gratia payments have been made in response to claims for compensation as a result of security force operations or installations; and what were the criteria on which these payments were made.

Dr. Mawhinney: Ex-gratia compensation is paid by the Police Authority for Northern Ireland where property was damaged in the course of action by Army technical officers to clear suspect explosive devices. The criteria for making such payments are:—

(i) that the RUC gave instructions for the ATO's action;

(ii) that the RUC are satisfied that the claimant was not criminally involved in the incident;

(iii) that there were no explosives found in the vehicle or property.

Payments have been made under this scheme since 1982. In the 1989-90 financial year compensation was paid in 148 cases and in this financial year to 31 December 1990 compensation has been paid in 108 cases. Ex-gratia payments made by the Ministry of Defence are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

No Smoking Day

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans his Department has to help smokers give up smoking on No Smoking Day; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: The Health Promotion Agency and health and social services boards are responsible for promoting good health in Northern Ireland. They are involved with other organisations in drawing public attention to No Smoking Day and the hazards of smoking, in encouraging smokers to stop on that day, and in assisting and supporting those who wish to give up smoking altogether. I was pleased to launch the campaign leading up to No Smoking Day recently. Other initiatives being taken include the widespread distribution of material, the provision of clinics to help smokers give up the habit and the organisation of numerous local events throughout Northern Ireland to promote No Smoking Day.

Motor Vehicles

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will introduce legislation to ensure that no accident-damaged motor vehicle which has been written off by an insurance company can be imported into Northern Ireland, repaired and/or re-registered and sold without first undergoing an MOT examination.

Mr. Hanley: No. Decisions about write-offs are taken on economic grounds and many vehicles involved in road accidents are not written off. It is the responsibility of the individual to ensure that his or her vehicle is roadworthy.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Cereals

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what the tonnage and average price of grain exported from the United Kingdom was (a) generally and (b) separately for each country to which grain was exported in 1989 and 1990.

Mr. Curry: The table shows the tonnage and value in 1989 and 1990 of United Kingdom exports of cereals. The list of individual countries shown is restricted to those for which the amount exported was in excess of 100,000 tonnes in either year. Total value has been provided instead of price because of the difficulty of providing meaningful comparative figures for the latter.

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many days' supply of grain are currently in store in the United Kingdom (a) in intervention storage and (b) in all storage; and what the figures were for each of the past three years.

Mr. Curry: United Kingdom intervention stocks of cereals in mid-February 1991 represented around 12 days' supply compared with 11 days, 20 days and 25 days at the middle of February 1990, 1989 and 1988 respectively.

The latest available information on the quantity of grain in commercial storage is in the form of estimates of stocks of wheat, barley and oats at 31 December 1990. Adding these estimates to the intervention stocks at the time gives total storage figures representing about 238, 256, 286 and 286 days' supply for December 1990, 1989, 1988 and 1987 respectively.

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the latest estimate of the stocks of grain which will be in store at the end of June (a) in Britain, (b) in the EC and (c) in the world, expressed in tonnes and days' supply; and what is the latest estimate of the stocks of grain at the present time in (i) Britain, (ii) the EC and (iii) the world expressed in tonnes and days' supply.

Mr. Curry: Current estimates of cereals likely to be in store in the United Kingdom and the European Community as a whole at the end of the 1990-91 marketing year on 30 June 1991 are as follows:

	Million tonnes	Days' supply
United Kingdom	3	55
European Community	31	79

These figures are based on the Commission of the European Communities balance sheet for cereals.

The International Wheat Council's estimate of world stocks of grain is an aggregate of national figures based on different definitions of marketing years and therefore does not relate to a particular date. However, the council's latest estimate for world stocks for the end of the 1990-91 crop year is 242 million tonnes or around 62 days' supply.

The latest estimate of current stocks of grain in the United Kingdom is for 31 December 1990 when the total was 13 million tonnes, representing about 238 days' supply. Estimates for the European Community and the world are not available.

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was (a) the total amount paid by each member state of the EEC in cereals co-responsibility levy for each year since the co-responsibility levy has been operative, expressed in both the member state's national currency and in pounds sterling and (b) the total tonnage of cereals produced in each member state of the EEC, showing in each case how much per tonne the co-responsibility levy represents.

Mr. Curry: The latest information provided by the Commission of the European Communities on cereals co-responsibility levy receipts in each member state was given to my hon. Friend on 18 December 1990, Official Report column 133. The sums collected are expressed in budgetary ecus. It is not possible accurately to convert them into national currencies and sterling because no information is available on the timing of levy payments over the course of each year.

Commission figures for annual cereals production in each member state where co-responsibility levy was collected are set out below, as is the levy collected divided by national production. It should be noted, however, that there is not an exact correspondence between the year in which grain is harvested and the following year's levy receipts. Nor is levy necessarily collected in the country of origin of the grain.

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the current state of the cereal sector.

Mr. Curry: The 1990 United Kingdom cereals harvest is estimated to have been 22·4 million tonnes. Yields were higher than in 1989 and the quality of both wheat and barley crops were good, with a marked increase in supplies of malting barley. Ex-farm prices for breadmaking wheat have been 5 to 11 per cent. higher than last year for most of the season, feed wheat prices 4 to 7 per cent. higher and feed barley prices 2 to 6 per cent. higher; premium malting barley prices have generally been 7 to 12 per cent. lower than last season. By the end of February some 146,000 tonnes of grain had been offered into intervention. Provisional figures show exports of 4·2 million tonnes by mid-February. The net farm income for cereal farms in the United Kingdom is forcast to have risen in real terms over the last two years.

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what the total tonnage and average price of imported grain from each country which exported grain to the United Kingdom was in 1990;

(2) what the total tonnage and average price per tonne of all cereals imported into the United Kingdom was in 1989 and 1990.

Mr. Curry: In 1989, the United Kingdom imported 5,102,000 tonnes of cereals valued at £361,486,000. Information for 1990 is shown in the table in total and by country. The list of individual countries is restricted to those for which the amount imported was in excess of 50,000 tonnes in 1990. Total value has been provided instead of price because of the difficulty of providing meaningful comparative figures for the latter.

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the level of imports into the United Kingdom of (a) cereals and (b) cereal substitutes in each year since 1979.

Mr. Curry: The information requested is as follows:

Sheep Dip

Mr. Speller: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many reports of damage to farm workers have been received as a result of handling or being exposed to organophosphorous sheep dip.

Mr. Maclean: The Department has received 55 reports of suspected adverse reactions affecting farmers and farm workers following exposure to organophosphorous sheep dips since 1985. Five of these concern a product withdrawn from the market in 1986.

Somerset Moors

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions officials of his Department have had with the Somerset trust for nature conservation regarding water levels on the Somerset moors.

Mr. Curry: Our officials have received representations from the Somerset trust for nature conservation pressing for a higher water level regime on the Somerset moors. Its views will be fully taken into account in my current review of the ESA policy.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what provisions are contained in Somerset levels ESA agreements on the maintenance of water levels to assist nature conservation.

Mr. Curry: The agreements require that, where rhyne water levels are within the farmers' control, suitable levels must be maintained for grazing livestock between 31 March and 1 November and that at no time are the ditches or rhynes allowed to dry out.

Food Prices

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the proportion of the value of food which has gone to (a) the producer and (b) the processor, wholesaler and retailer in each year since 1973.

Mr. Curry: I have no information to add to that given to my hon. Friend on 29 March 1990, Official Report, column 255.

Members of the European Parliament

Dr. Godman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many letters he has received since 4 January 1990 from Members of the European Parliament concerning local or national matters; and if he will make it his practice where the former are concerned to provide the hon. Member for the local constituency with copies of any such correspondence for his or her information.

Mr. Curry: We have received a number of inquiries during the period. Where Members of the European Parliament raise matters in correspondence which are exclusively of local interest, the practice is to reply suggesting that the MEP should refer the matter to the hon. Member for the constituency concerned. As with other correspondence, replies to such communications would normally be copied to the hon. Member concerned only if the MEP had himself copied his letter in this way.

Irradiated Food

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has received applications for approval for licensing irradiation plants in the United Kingdom; if he will list any plants which have received such approval; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: I have received inquiries, but no formal application has yet been made.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will set out the process for the approval of plants in the United Kingdom which will irradiate food; what is the name of the committee which will consider such approvals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Applications for licences will be considered by a committee of officials of the Argiculture and Health Departments of the countries concerned. The committee will include scientists and administrators with expertise in the fields of medicine, radiation science, toxicology, microbiology, nutrition, and food hygiene. The committee will seek such other advice as it considers necessary. The recommendations of the committee will be considered by the Agriculture and Health Ministers acting jointly.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, further to his answers to the hon. Member for South Shields of 20 December, Official Report, column 297, whether he has now (a) given approval to irradiation plants in non-EC countries or (b) given official authorisation to irradiation plants in EC countries to import irradiated foods into the United Kingdom; and if he will list all such plants.

Mr. Gummer: I have nothing to add to the answers given to the hon. Member on 20 December 1990, at column 297.

No Smoking Day

Mr. Amos: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to support smokers in his Department to give up smoking on the eighth No Smoking Day, on 13 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: All staff in my Department have been advised of No Smoking Day. We are soon to introduce a smoking policy with restrictions on areas where smoking is permitted. All staff will be told that welfare officers in the Department have been given training which will enable them to advise and give practical help to anyone who wishes to stop smoking.

Butter

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for South Shields of 26 February, Official Report, column 433, whether any butter from the United Kingdom has been or is due to be exported to the Soviet Union.

Mr. Gummer: No butter was exported from the United Kingdom to the USSR in January, the latest month for which data are available. I am not aware of any future exports.

Infant Formulae

Miss Lestor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if Her Majesty's Government propose to support European directive iii/3712/90/EN revision 3 on infant formulae and follow-up foods; and what are its implications for labelling of such foods.

Mr. Maclean: The Government have been pressing, and will continue to do so, for amendments to the text of the draft directive to align it more closely with the World Health Organisation international code on the marketing of breast milk substitutes. Nevertheless, mindful of the important compositional, nutritional, health and safety controls in the draft we do not rule out a United Kingdom vote in favour of the directive. If adopted, for the first time there will be specific labelling controls laid down in law for infant formulae and follow-on formulae.

Food Hygiene

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement regarding the implications of the Ministry of Agriculture's research at Torry for the planned implementation of the Food Hygiene (Amendment) Regulations 1990.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to my reply on Tuesday 26 February to the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan).

SCOTLAND

Mink Farms

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many licences were issued for mink farms for each region in Scotland for each of the last five years.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information is as follows:

Region or Islands area	1986	1987	1988	1989	1990
Grampian	2	2	1	1	1
Lothian	1	1	1	—	—
Shetland	1	—	—	—	—
Strathclyde	2	2	3	2	3

Local Authorities Legislation

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those Acts passed by Parliament since 1979 concerning (a) local government finance and (b) local authority duties, powers and responsibilities that relate to Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The following Acts passed since 1979 have contained provisions relating to local government finance in Scotland:

Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980
Local Government and Planning (Amendment) Act 1981
Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1981
Local Government and Planning (Scotland) Act 1982
Local Authorities (Expenditure Powers) Act 1983
Rating and Valuation (Amendment) (Scotland) Act 1984
Local Government Act 1986
Local Government Finance Act 1987
Abolition of Domestic Rates Etc. (Scotland) Act 1987
Local Government Act 1988
Local Government Finance Act 1988
Local Government and Housing Act 1989
Caravans (Standard Community Charge and Rating) Act 1990

The second part of the hon. Member's question could be answered only at disproportionate cost given the wide range of local authority activities affected by legislation since 1979.

Parking

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the regulations applying to the conditions relating to whether vehicles are allowed to park on a double yellow line.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Double yellow lines give effect to a traffic regulation order made under the provisions of sections 1, 2, 4, 9 or 14 of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 to prohibit or restrict the waiting of vehicles for at least eight hours during the period between 7 am and 7 pm on at least four days per week. The timing and direction of the prohibition or restrictions are displayed on plates placed at regular intervals along the length of the carriageway so restricted. It is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend to make orders prohibiting or restricting the waiting of vehicles on trunk roads and of the local authorities for their roads. The terms of each order may vary according to the circumstances for which it is required.

School Tests

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the total annual cost of the national tests in primary schools, including all aspects of design, compilation, printing, marking, standardisation and collation of results.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) on 6 February 1991 at col. 87.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the exact arrangments to be made for transferring primary seven test results to secondary schools; when and by whom a decision was made on this; and when the decision was communicated to the regional councils, COSLA and the unions.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Testing in Primary Schools (Scotland) Regulations 1990 require test results from 1992 onwards to be entered in the pupil's progress record. This document goes with a pupil throughout his or her school career. The intention to pass the P7 test results of pupils to secondary schools was made clear in the consultation document "Curriculum and Assessment: A Policy for the 90s" issued in November 1987.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what advice he obtained from (a) the General Teaching Council, (b) the Scottish Examination Board and (c) the Scottish Council for Research in Education on national primary tests.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The General Teaching Council and the Scottish Council for Research in Education responded to the consultation document "Curriculum and Assessment: A Policy for the 90s". Tests have been developed through the primary assessment unit of the Scottish Examination Board.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland who is responsible for the design of the national tests for primary school children; and what recommendations were made to him by Her Majesty's inspectorate about the tests, the subjects to be included and validation and standardisation of the tests.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The preparation of test units, including their validation and standardisation, is the responsibility of the primary assessment unit of the Scottish Examination Board. Representatives of Her Majesty's inspectorate maintain close liaison with the unit. The intention to introduce tests in language and mathematics was announced in the consultation document, "Curriculum and Assessment: A Policy for the 90s" issued in November 1987.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what organisations or individuals have contacted him expressing (a) support and (b) opposition to national tests in primary schools.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Rutherglen (Mr. McAvoy) on 6 March 1991 at columns 281-82.

Rural Housing

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if his office has considered the views of the housing committee of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities in response to the policy statement on rural housing published by Scottish Homes; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No. The views of the housing committee of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities are in response to the Rural Strategy document issued by Scottish Homes.

It is therefore for Scottish Homes to consider the views put forward by the convention and respond accordingly.

Cold Weather

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information and statistics he has from health boards in Scotland relating to increases in cold-related diseases during periods of cold weather; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information and statistics on cold-related diseases during periods of cold weather are not held centrally.

Members of the European Parliament

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many letters he has received, since 4 January 1990, from Members of the European Parliament concerning local or national matters; and if he will make it his practice to provide the hon. Member for the local constituency with copies of any such correspondence for his or her information.

Mr. Lang: One hundred and six. There are no plans to copy such items of correspondence to the hon. Members for the constituencies concerned.

No Smoking Day

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans his Department has to provide support to smokers seeking to give up smoking on No Smoking Day on 13 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: In Scotland the main responsibility for health education and the prevention of ill health lies at present with the Scottish Health Education Group. The group is supporting No Smoking Day through sponsorship of a free telephone helpline to provide support to smokers seeking to give up smoking. In addition the United Kingdom No Smoking Day Committee, on which the group is represented, has distributed supportive materials to over 1,000 organisations in Scotland, including health boards, local authorities, youth organisations and large businesses.

Child Care Law

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what consideration he has given to the recommendations of the committee set up to review child care law in Scotland and in particular to the recommendations relating to the issue of parental access to children in care.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: We are considering the recommendations of the review, including those of parental access, in the light of the comments that we have received.

Place of Safety Orders

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) in respect of place of safety orders executed in Scotland in 1990, what information he has on the number of occasions the relevant children's hearing considered the order on (a) the same day as execution, (b) the following day, (c) two days after execution, (d) three days after execution, (e) four days after execution, (f) five days after execution, (g) six days after execution and (h) seven days after execution;

(2) what information he has regarding the number of place of safety orders executed in Scotland in 1990.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Latest available information is for the calender year 1989, when 1,329 place of safety authorisations were made. Of those 1,238 resulted in a hearing taking place. Figures showing the number of days a child was detained in a place of safety prior to a hearing are as follows:

	Number
1 day[1]	115
2 days	101
3 days	125
4 days	197
5 days	160
6 days	221
7 days	319

[1] Includes detentions which are shorter than 24 hours.

Intervention Stores

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the current level of intervention food stores by commodity, respectively, at the most recent date for which figures are available in public and private storage, respectively.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer Tuesday 5 March 1991]: Information on a United Kingdom basis is deposited regularly in the Library of the House. Information on stores located in Scotland as at 31 January 1991 is given in the table. Comparable United Kingdom figures are shown in brackets.

	Tonnage
Food commodity	Public storage		Aided private storage
Beef	5,570	(81,016)	Nil	(Nil)
Butter	Nil	(22,474)	Nil	(974)
Lamb	Nil	(Nil)	Nil	(598)
Pigmeat	Nil	(Nil)	Nil	(137)
Wheat	Nil	(35,011)	Nil	(Nil)
Barley	298,896	(616,011)	Nil	(Nil)
Rye	Nil	(203)	Nil	(Nil)

Further inquiries about operational aspects of intervention should be addressed to the chief executive of the intervention board.

Forestry Commission

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about his plans for the sale of the Forestry Commission.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 7 March 1991]: Our policy on the disposal of Forestry Commission woodlands was set out by my right hon. and learned Friend the then Secretary of State for Scotland on 16 June 1989 columns at 544-45.

Kelvin Valley

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many representations he has had on the proposed line of the M80 through the Kelvin valley; and how many of these representations (a) favoured and (b) opposed the Kelvin valley option.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 7 March 1991]: The route through the Kelvin valley is one of two routes assessed by the consulting engineers in the feasibility study submitted recently to the Scottish Office Environment Department. The respective merits of these are currently under consideration and only after a preferred route is identified will draft road orders be published. At that stage representations will be invited.

Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on his proposals for the line of the M80 through the Kelvin valley.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 7 March 1991]: Discussions on the feasibility study received from the Scottish Office Environment Department's consulting engineers are still continuing. On completion of these formal presentations will be made to regional and district councils and other affected parties. Thereafter, a decision will be taken on the preferred route for the M80.

Nurses

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many nurses are employed by each of the health boards (a) at each grade and (b) in total.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 7 March 1991]: The latest available information held centrally for the number of nurses employed at 30 September 1990 by each of the health boards at each grade and in total is given in the tables.

Qualified nurses: by status, grade and health board: at 30 September 1990

DEFENCE

The Gulf

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many British fatalities were incurred in the conflict with Iraq; what were the circumstances in which each such death occurred; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) on 8 March, at column 330.

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the civil service contributions to the military effort in the Gulf.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the opportunity to pay tribute to the very great efforts that have been and are still being made by the civil service in support of all operations in the Gulf.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence to what extent 1st Armoured Division has been dependent on assistance from non-United Kingdom helicopters during the Gulf conflict.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The 1st Armoured Division operated as an integral part of the United States 7th Army Corps and, as such, British commanders were able to call on United States helicopter assistance. British Army and RAF helicopters undertook similar missions in support of United States ground forces.

Radiation

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give a breakdown for (a) Rosyth dockyard, (b) Devonport dockyard, (c) Aldermaston atomic weapons establishment and (d) Coulport RNAD of individual radiation dose exposures for workers in the bands (i) 0 to 10, (ii) 10 to 15, (iii) 15 to 20, (iv) 20 to 30, (v) 30 to 40 and (vi) greater than 40 mSv for the year 1990.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The final radiation dose exposures for 1990 in respect of workers at these establishments are not yet available.

War Widows' Pensions

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will explain the rules which govern the restoration of a widow's pension in circumstances where a woman has been widowed a first time and granted a Ministry of Defence pension, subsequently remarries, so losing her Ministry of Defence pension, and is then widowed a second time and seeks restoration of her Ministry of Defence pension.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Under the rules both of the armed forces pension scheme and of the principal civil service pension scheme, a widow loses her entitlement to a widow's pension on remarriage. Any subsequent resumption of payment is discretionary, but a pension may be restored to a widow on second widowhood if she is worse off after her second husband's death, without her former public service widow's pension, than she was on first widowhood with that pension.

Discretion to restore the pension lies with the Ministry of Defence in respect of the armed forces pension scheme, and with Her Majesty's Treasury in respect of the principal civil service pension scheme. In both cases, account is taken of all the widow's financial circumstances, including any pension entitlement which may accrue to her from her second marriage.

Members of the European Parliament

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many letters he has received since 4 January 1990 from Members of the European Parliament concerning local or national matters; and if he will make it his practice where the former are concerned to provide the hon. Member for the local constituency with copies of any such correspondence for his or her information.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My right hon. Friend has received six letters from Members of the European Parliament about local or national matters since 4 January 1990. If there is no European Community content in the MEP's letter and a constituency interest predominates, the MEP would be advised to refer the case to the MP for the constituency concerned.

Missiles

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give the reasons for the delay so far in the issue of the invitation to tender—ITT—for ASRAAM—the advanced short-range air-to-air missile.

Mr. Alan Clark: It is taking longer than we hoped to finalise the terms of the ITT because of the complexities associated with this procurement.

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much has been spent so far by his Department on the ASRAAM project.

Mr. Alan Clark: This information is classified.

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he intends to preserve the family of weapons now covering the advanced short-range and medium-range air-to-air missiles.

Mr. Alan Clark: We are currently discussing with the United States the status of the family of weapons memorandum of understanding.

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether any missile other than BAe's ASRAAM proposal meets the specification of staff requirement (air) 1234.

(2) whether the British Aerospace ASRAAM proposal meets the specification of staff requirement (air) 1234.

Mr. Alan Clark: The evaluation of responses to the ITT will determine which proposals meet the specification of SR(A) 1234.

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when an invitation to tender for ASRAAM will be released to industry.

Mr. Alan Clark: The ITT will be issued as soon as possible.

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department intends to proceed with a European solution to the ASRAAM requirement.

Mr. Alan Clark: We plan to seek competitive proposals for solutions to our advanced short-range missile requirements.

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the estimated benefit to the United Kingdom of the export potential of ASRAAM.

Mr. Alan Clark: It is too early to say.

No Smoking Day

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to support smokers in his Department to give up smoking on the eighth No Smoking Day on 13 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The Department is publicising national No Smoking Day by the distribution of some 2,000 posters and by a message to all staff encouraging them to give up smoking. The Department's policy is to discourage smoking at the workplace. Counselling is available for those who wish to give up.

Territorial Army

Mr. Allen McKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the number of personnel in the Territorial Army in 1979, 1985 and 1991.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The strength of the Territorial Army, including the Home Service Force was, as at 31 January in each year, 59,103 in 1979, 73,462 in 1985 and 75,135 in 1991.

Gulf Casualties

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what pension or other payments will be made (a) to the relatives of British service men killed in the Gulf war, and (b) to service men disabled in the Gulf war.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Pensions and other benefits are payable in respect of casualties of the Gulf conflict under the provisions of the armed forces pension scheme.

In respect of personnel killed these take the form of lump sums and a pension to an eligible widow(er), with an additional pension in respect of each eligible child up to a maximum of four; where there is no eligible widow(er), benefits in respect of any eligibile children are increased. A lump sum is payable into the estate of a service man or service woman who leaves neither an eligible widow(er) nor an eligible child.

Personnel invalided as the result of injury which is attributable to service receive a lump sum or sums and, where disability is assessed at 20 per cent. or more or qualifying service given is at least two years, a pension.

The amounts payable are related to service rank held and also, in the case of personnel discharged as the result of injury, to the assessed degree of disability. In certain circumstances the length of service given is also relevant.

Benefits are also payable under the provisions of the war pensions scheme administered by the Department of Social Security.

Main Battle Tank

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will announce the awarding of the contract for main battle tanks for the British Army; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) on 8 March at columns 290-91.

SOCIAL SECURITY

State Earnings-Related Pension Scheme

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 4 February, Official Report, columns 58-59, on the real value of SERPS, if he will give the figures for the scheme as it was before the Social Security Act 1986 changes, but otherwise on the same basis.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is in the table. It is important to note that calculations of this nature can provide only a hypothetical view of the distant future based, as they are, on unchanged assumptions about economic variables and policies.

Unemployed Persons (Costs)

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he makes of the average cost to the Treasury of each unemployed person in unemployment benefit and lost revenues from taxes and national insurance.

Mr. Jack: In 1990-91 the estimated average weekly cost of unemployment benefit per person was £40·35. Estimates of national insurance and tax revenue forgone are not available.

War Widow's Pensions

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will explain the rules which govern the restoration of a widow's pension in circumstances where a woman has been widowed a first time and granted a war widow's pension, subsequently remarries and loses her war widow's pension, and is then widowed a second time and seeks restoration of her war widow's pension.

Miss Widdecombe: War widow's pensions cease on remarriage. Widows of ranks other than officers receive a gratuity equal to one year's war widow's pension, but may not have their pension restored if widowed through non-service causes a second time. Officers' widows do not receive a gratuity, but if widowed a second time, may have their war widow's pension reinstated subject to need. In effect this means that any other income is topped up to the level of war widow's pensions. A joint working group set up in 1985 with the Council of British Service and Ex-Service Organisations agreed that there was a need for a change in these provisions. However, there was no consensus of opinion about what changes should be made to these very long-standing provisions; and it was decided to leave matters as they were.

Members of the European Parliament

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many letters he has received since 4 January 1990 from Members of the European Parliament concerning local or national matters; and if he will make it his practice, where the former are concerned, to provide the hon. Member for the local constituency with copies of any such correspondence for his or her correspondence.

Mr. Jack: Between 4 January 1990 and 6 March 1991 we received 26 such letters. Where Members of the European Parliament raise matters in correspondence which concern exclusively local matters, our normal practice is to reply suggesting that the MEP refers the matter to the hon. Member for the constituency concerned. As with other correspondence, replies to such communications would normally be copied to the hon. Member concerned only if the MEP had himself copied his letter in this way.

No Smoking Day

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to support smokers in his Department to give up smoking on the eighth No Smoking Day on 13 March; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The Department has undertaken extensive publicity to make staff aware of no smoking day, including Health Education Authority posters on all notice boards, articles in house magazines, reminders in weekly circulars and competitions to encourage staff to give up smoking. In addition, under the Department's established policy on non-smoking, staff are allowed paid time off to attend recognised courses to help them stop smoking.

Social Fund Loans

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of income support claimants are now repaying social fund loans; and what is the total outstanding loan debt.

Mr. Scott: At 31 January 1991, 10 per cent. of income support claimants were repaying social fund loans; the total debt outstanding was £135 million.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the current level of repayment of social fund loans; and if he will remove the cash limit on local office loan budgets where repayment levels are high.

Mr. Scott: From April 1990 to the end of January, £105 million was recovered from loan expenditure. We have no plans to remove the limits on local office loan budgets, but additional budget allocations are made where appropriate.

Nursing Homes

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 6 March to the hon. Member for Wakefield, whether, if a suitable person acting on behalf of the resident placed in a care home trust is a local authority social worker, the resident would be eligible for income support.

Miss Widdecombe: Eligibility for income support is not affected by the person acting as appointee, but is based solely on the circumstances of the individual claimant.

Delayed Payments

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what steps have been taken by his Department to inform hon. Members of the Department's compensation scheme for delayed payments;

(2) what system exists for compensating those whose pension or benefit is paid more than a year late; and if he will publish the rules which govern such a system;

(3) how many individuals received compensation payments for delayed payments for each of the years for which figures are available; and how many claims for such payments were unsuccessful.

Miss Widdecombe: Ex-gratia compensation may be paid when payment of benefit amounting to £50 or more has either been delayed for 12 months or longer, or interrupted for at least three months, because of clear and unambiguous official error. If claimants do not themselves raise the matter, the Department's local offices are required to identify cases eligible to be considered for such compensation. These arrangements are in accordance with the general principles concerning ex-gratia payments in "Government Accounting", the Treasury's guide to accounting and financial procedures in government. Each case is decided within those general principles, taking into account its particular facts and circumstances, which vary widely from case to case. The annual reports of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration have drawn attention to the availability of compensation.

Payments have been made as follows:

Year	Number of individual payments
1989-90	385
1988-89	529
1987-88	911
1986-87	654
1985-86	540
1984-85	171

Information on the number of unsuccessful cases is not available.

Child Support

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what period or periods he intends to prescribe as the maximum for reductions of benefit under clause 22 of the Child Support Bill; and whether adjudication officers and social security appeal tribunals will be given unfettered discretion to decide, within the prescribed maxima, the amount and duration of such reduction.

Mr. Jack: Every child has a right to care from his or her parents, and the payment of child maintenance is one crucial way in which parents fulfil their responsibilities towards their children. A caring parent who is in receipt of income support, family credit or any other prescribed benefit will be required to co-operate with the Child Support Agency in obtaining maintenance for his or her children from the absent parent, unless there is good cause not to do so. Where there is no good cause, and the caring parent fails to fulfil this requirement, his or her benefit will be reduced.

The detailed operation of the arrangements for which clause 22 makes provision, and which will in due course be set out in regulations, is still under consideration.

Family Credit

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much has been spent on advertising family credit in each year since 1988-89; and what is the expected expenditure in 1990-91 and 1991-92.

Mr. Jack: The information is as follows:

1988-89	3,061,000
1989-90	5,835,000
1990-91	[1]3,894,000
1991-92	[2]3,600,000

[1] This includes £1·5 million for the current TV advertising campaign drawing the attention of 6·8 million families to the personalised message about family credit which now appears in child benefit order books. This tells the family that they may be able to get family credit if their income is less than the figure quoted in the message which is individual to that family.

[3] Expected.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many family credit awards were current, and what was the caseload including backdated awards at the end of each month since April 1989, for employees and self-employed people, respectively.

Mr. Jack: The available information is as follows:

[1] A breakdown between employees and self-employed is not available.
[2] Provisional totals: no breakdown between employers and employed at this stage.
[3] Meaningful figures not yet available because of claims not yet decided.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the latest information he has as to the number of employees and self-employed people, respectively, who are eligible for family credit; and whether he will arrange a special examination of 1989 and 1990 family expenditure survey returns, similar to that carried out on the 1988 return.

Mr. Jack: The latest information about the number of families eligible for family credit is from the special examination of family expenditure survey returns for 1988. This showed that the total eligible population of employees at that time was about 500,000. Reliable estimates of the number of self-employed who are eligible are not possible from family expenditure survey data. It is clear from administrative information and other research that families are moving into and out of eligibility for family credit all the time, so that the composition of the eligible population is constantly changing.

The special examination of the 1988 family expenditure survey returns, which cost over £10,000, was undertaken in early 1989 because we were considering a major advertising campaign. The actual size of the eligible population at any one time is therefore only one, albeit important, factor which needs to be considered. We have no plans to arrange a special examination of family expenditure survey returns for 1989 and 1990.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (a) new claims and (b) renewal claims for family credit were made in each month since April 1989; and how many and what percentage were successful, distinguishing, for both new and renewal claims, between those made by employees and those made by self-employed people.

Mr. Jack: The available information is as follows:

Disability

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will place in the Library the full detailed secondary analysis of the reports of the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys on the prevalence of disability which relate to the number of disabled people who need special diets and their eligibility or ineligibility for the new lower care component of disability living allowance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: When devising the lower rate care component of the disability living allowance, we looked at the OPCS evidence about people who said that they had care needs in connection with bodily functions or key daily tasks, but who would not be eligible for either of the existing rates of attendance allowance. We then looked more closely at the circumstances of these people to see whether we had identified a sensible target group. In particular we looked at what other disabilities these people suffered from—including whether they needed a special diet. The evidence suggests that, as with the existing rates of benefit, the new lower rates are convenient means of identifying people with a whole range of disabilities.

TRANSPORT

Bristol Channel

17. Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the arrangements for liaison between his Department and the Ministry of Defence in the Bristol channel area; and if he will make a statement on the work of Her Majesty's coastguard on Friday 22 February 1991 when shipping was advised to clear the area during a simulation exercise on the jettisoning of bombs by B52 bombers.

Mr. McLoughlin: Close liaison between my Department and the Ministry of Defence is maintained by the maritime rescue co-ordination centres of Her Majesty's coastguard at Falmouth and Swansea and the joint RAF-Royal Navy maritime HQ at Plymouth.

Her Majesty's coastguard had neither knowledge of, nor involvement in, any exercises in the Bristol channel area on 22 February 1991.

Channel Tunnel

19. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about discussions with British Rail about a channel tunnel freight terminal in Greater Manchester.

Mr. Freeman: The location of channel tunnel freight terminals is a commercial matter for British Rail. I understand that it expects to decide later this year between two possible sites to serve Greater Manchester for the start of tunnel operations.

Mr. Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to receive the report of the consultants W. S. Atkins on the evaluation of channel tunnel rail link options; and if he will place a copy in the Library.

Mr. Freeman: W. S. Atkins published on 4 March its interim report to British Rail proposing the detailed methodology for British Rail's comparison of the options for the rail link. I have placed a copy in the Library.

28. Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to receive details of the British Rail proposals for the route of the high-speed rail link to the channel tunnel.

Mr. Freeman: In April or May.

Auxiliary Coastguard Service

20. Mr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received on the review of the auxiliary coastguard service.

Mr. McLoughlin: As intended, the review has attracted numerous representations, mostly addressed to the coastguard regional controllers.

Network SouthEast

22. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on Network SouthEast's achievements against its performance objectives in this year.

Mr. Freeman: There are parts of NSE where quality of service is not yet up to the standard passengers have a right to expect, although there has been a general improvement during 1990-91. As NSE's investment programme comes to fruition, quality of service on all routes should show further improvements.

Traffic Speed, London

23. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the estimated current speed of traffic in London; what are his future projections; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Speeds vary between areas, from around 11 mph in central London—with little variation through the working day—to 17 mph and 20 mph in the peak and off-peak in outer London. These figures indicate that average speeds on London's major roads are about 16 mph in the peak periods and 19 mph during the rest of the day. We do not produce forecasts of overall traffic speeds.

Rural Railways

24. Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to review rural railway investment.

Mr. McLoughlin: No. It is for the British Railways Board to carry out any such review.

Road Construction

25. Mr. Hague: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many road schemes are under construction in the current financial year.

Mr. Chope: In the current financial year 107 schemes have been or will be under construction. The total length is some 337 miles with a value of over £1·5 billion.

Toll Roads

26. Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on his policy towards the inclusion of privately toll-funded stretches within the national roads programme.

Mr. Freeman: We are confident that the private sector has a worth while and increasing part to play in the provision of new roads infrastructure in the United Kingdom.

British Rail Vehicles

27. Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many new vehicles British Rail currently has on order.

Mr. Freeman: British Rail has on order 111 locomotives, 606 electric multiple units, 490 diesel multiple units, 70 coaches, 745 wagons, and 14 channel tunnel trains consisting of 252 coaches and 28 power cars.

London Regional Transport

29. Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what levels of investment he expects to see in London Regional Transport during 1990-91; and what they were in 1989-90.

Mr. Freeman: Investment by London Transport in 1989-90 was £443 million. Investment this year is forecast to be £630 million—an increase, in cash terms, of over 40 per cent.

London Underground

30. Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will next meet the chairman of London Underground to discuss the operation of the London underground.

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington) earlier today.

M4

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his latest estimate of the date on which construction works for the widening of the M4 between the M25 and Swindon will start; and if he will make a statement on the progress of preliminary works.

Mr. Chope: We have three separate scheme commissions looking at the options for widening the length of M4 betweeen the M25 and Swindon. All three are progressing satisfactorily and we aim to make announcements about preferred options before the end of the year. Because timing is heavily dependent on the type of works proposed the planned programme will be part of those announcements.

Footpaths (Cycling)

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his policy on the control of the use of footpaths by cyclists; how many injuries to pedestrians on footpaths caused by cycles there have been; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: It is illegal to cycle on footpaths; the exclusive right of way is on foot. The responsibility for the control and use of footpaths rests with individual local authorities. The Department has published advice on aspects of shared use by pedestrians and cyclists in local transport note 2/86—HMSO—copies of which have been placed in the Library. Figures for injuries caused by cyclists to pedestrians on footpaths are not collected centrally.

Buttermere Valley (Parking)

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will call in under reserve powers available to him the decision of Cumbria county council to restrict parking in the Buttermere valley.

Mr. Chope: No. This is essentially a local highways issue. The authority would be expected to comply with those sections of the Road Traffic Regulations Act 1984 and traffic signs manual covering environmentally sensitive areas.

Pipelines

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 11 February, Official Report, column 309, what will be the capacity of the new pipeline from Goyt valley to Audenshaw; and what percentage of treatment capacity at Denton could be met by this supply at any given time.

Mr. Chope: The pipeline will be capable of transferring 44 megalitres of untreated water per day to the Audenshaw reservoirs. This will enable North West Water to maintain the existing 28-day emergency supply. Treatment capacity should remain the same.

North Devon Link Road

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many compensation claims have been submitted in respect of the North Devon link road steps 2(a) and 2(b); in which years they were submitted; how many are still outstanding; and, where a figure has been agreed, how long it takes for payment to be made.

Mr. Chope: A total of 132 claims have been received: 58 date from 1986, 69 from 1987, 4 from 1988 and one from 1989; 118 are still outstanding, of which 22 are in the last stages of legal completion. Advance payments are available on request from the date entry is taken and 92 claimants have received at least one such payment. The figures exclude the 1 ft square plots at Great Western green where 129 claims out of 130 remain outstanding.

Once compensation is agreed, it takes an average of six months to complete the legal processes and make the final payment, but this time can be affected by a number of factors outside the Department's control. Claims attract interest, at statutory rates, from the date of entry on to the land until payment is made.

Public Transport Infrastructure

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many applications for section 56 grants under the Transport Act 1968 his Department has received; and in how many of these cases grants have been provided;

(2) if he will list those applications for section 56 grants under the Transport Act 1968 which have been successful indicating in each case the project concerned, the level of support provided and the date on which the grant application was approved.

Mr. Freeman: Since 1985, when such grants became available for large new public transport infrastructure projects, there have been 12 applications. Of these, three have been approved and a further four are under consideration. A number of promoters have been in contact with the Department about the possibility of grants for other projects, but have not made full applications. The successful applications are listed in the table.

Project	Date approved	Grant £ million
Merseyrail safety work	March 1989	0·3
Manchester Metrolink	October 1989	[1]53·0
Sheffield Supertram	December 1990	[2]

[1] Approximate figure; grant is being paid towards 50 per cent. of eligible costs within a cash ceiling.
[2] Exact figure not yet determined.

Bicycle Lights

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to ensure that all bicycles are sold with working front and rear lights.

Mr. Chope: I refer to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) on 1 March, at column 625.

Members of the European Parliament

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many letters he has received since 4 January 1990 from Members of the European Parliament concerning local or national matters; and if he will make it his practice, where the former are concerned, to provide the hon. Member for the local constituency with copies of any such correspondence for his or her information.

Mr. McLoughlin: Ministers at the Department of Transport have received 134 written communications from Members of the European Parliament since 4 January 1990 that concern local or national matters. If there is no Community content at all in the MEP's letter and a constituency interest predominates it is our general practice to suggest that the MEP should refer the case to the hon. Member for the constituency concerned. As with other correspondence, replies to MEPs' letters would normally be copied to the hon. Member concerned only if the MEP had himself copied his letter in this way.

No Smoking Day

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to support smokers in his Department to give up smoking on the eighth No Smoking Day on 13 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: Posters advertising No Smoking Day and information leaflets will be displayed in all the Department's main offices throughout the country, and an article will be placed in the Department's in-house journal. Guidance has been given to all staff on damage to health caused by smoking. Welfare officers are on hand to give help and advice to staff who wish to give up smoking and on the availability of classes for this purpose. However, in the end it is a matter of individual choice.

Heathrow-Glasgow Flights

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to announce his decision on the appeal by British Midland Airways against unfair competition on the Heathrow to Glasgow air service.

Mr. McLoughlin: My right hon. and learned Friend is considering British Midland Airways' appeal against the Civil Aviation Authority's decision in respect of services on the London Heathrow to Glasgow, Edinburgh and Belfast routes. His decision will be announced as soon as possible.

Earphones

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will commission a study into the effects of wearing earphones connected to transistor radios or cassette players on the safety of pedestrians and cyclists using public roads.

Mr. Chope: No. The highway code for young road users already contains advice about the potential danger of wearing personal stereos.

M1-M62 Link

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to make an announcement with regard to the proposed route of the M1-M62 link road in West Yorkshire.

Mr. Chope: I hope that, following consultation on route options later this year, it will be possible to announce a preferred route in 1992.

Buses, London

Mr. Haselhurst: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he intends to announce his plans for the deregulation of the London bus market.

Mr. Rifkind: I have today published the consultation paper "A Bus Strategy For London" which sets out our plans for the deregulation of the London bus market together with a range of proposals aimed at making bus services in London more attractive to passengers. The closing date for comments is 7 May.

The Government are firmly committed to the future of bus services in London. Deregulation will bring more competition between more operators which will increase the choice and quality of services available to the passenger. However, deregulation will require primary legislation to safeguard the future of the concessionary fares scheme for London as a whole, and to alter London Transport's statutory duties to make them more compatible with a deregulated bus industry. Primary legislation must await a suitable opportunity, so I am unable yet to give any firm indication of timing.

THE ARTS

Area Museum Councils

31. Mr. Dunn: To ask the Minister for the Arts what proposals he has to improve the relationship between the work of the Museum and Galleries Commission and the area museum councils.

Mr. Renton: The Museums and Galleries Commission enjoys a good working relationship with the area museum councils in the United Kingdom. From the grant-in-aid it is to receive from the Office of Arts and Libraries in 1991-92, the commission has allocated nearly £3·3 million to the area museum councils in England. This represents an overall increase of 15 per cent. on the allocations for 1990-91.

Museums and Galleries (Refurbishment)

36. Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Minister for the Arts what steps he is taking to ensure that the necessary refurbishment of museums and galleries is being systematically and professionally undertaken.

Mr. Renton: I have commissioned Arup Research and Development to conduct a survey of the building renovation needs of the museums and galleries which I sponsor. I expect to receive its report in summer 1991.

School Libraries

38. Mrs. Heal: To ask the Minister for the Arts whether he plans to update the Office of Arts and Libraries' report entitled "School Libraries: The Foundations of the Curriculum".

Mr. Renton: This report was produced by the Library and Information Services Council for England. It has no plans to update it, but the council maintains a regular interest in school libraries and associated services.

Greater London Arts

39. Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Minister for the Arts when he next plans to meet the chair of the Arts Council to discuss the financial support for Greater London Arts.

Mr. Renton: I meet the chairman of the Arts Council regularly to discuss a wide range of matters affecting the performing arts. The funding of Greater London Arts is a matter for the Arts Council, and the chairman has kept me closely informed of developments.

Tobacco Companies (Sponsorship)

Mr. Amos: To ask the Minister for the Arts what information he has on the current annual total of sponsorship of the arts by tobacco companies; if he will list these individually; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: Business sponsorship of the arts in the United Kingdom now stands at over £35 million a year. The current annual total of sponsorship by tobacco companies is not known. Arts organisations take their own decisions in choosing what sponsorship to accept.

Tobacco Industry

Mr. Amos: To ask the Minister for the Arts how many meetings he, his predecessor or his Department's officials have had with representatives of the tobacco industry since 1 January 1989; and if he will list the dates, venues and purpose of each meeting.

Mr. Renton: No meetings have taken place with representatives of the tobacco industry during the period in question.

No Smoking Day

Mr. Amos: To ask the Minister for the Arts what plans he has to support smokers in his Department to give up smoking on the eighth No Smoking Day on 13 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I welcome the proposed No Smoking Day. The Office of Arts and Libraries has permanent restrictions on smoking in the workplace. Counselling is always available, for smokers and for those who wish to give up the habit, through the departmental welfare officer.

British Library

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Minister for the Arts whether he expects the British Library to be completed by the agreed date; and whether the works will be within budget.

Mr. Renton: Work on the new British Library building at St. Pancras is on schedule for the planned opening of the first phase in 1993 and for completion in 1996. The project is proceeding within budget. The Government are investing £450 million in the project which will bring together most of the Library's London-based stocks and reading rooms on a single site, and will provide vastly improved facilities and better conservation.

Written Answers to Questions

THE ARTS

Child Care

Dr. Marek: To ask the Minister for the Arts what is the number of workplaces for civil servants in the Office of Arts and Libraries; what proportion of the total number have an on-site nursery facility; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide a holiday play scheme; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide after-school child care facilities; what charges are made for use of any facility; what the net cost has been for the provision of these facilities; and what estimate he can make of any future expenditure.

Mr. Renton: Staff of the Office of Arts and Libraries are employed at Horse Guards road, SW1 and in St. Christopher house annex, Sumner street, SE1. Neither has an on-site nursery or after-school child care facilities. A survey carried out in 1989 by the Cabinet Office, which provides personnel and welfare services to my office, found that there was a low level of interest in such facilities.

The Westminster holiday play scheme operates in the Government offices, Great George street, however, and is available to the staff of my Department.

TRANSPORT

Child Care

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the number of workplaces for civil servants in his Department; what proportion of the total number have an on-site nursery facility; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide a holiday play scheme; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide after-school child care facilities; what charges are made for use of any facility; what the net cost has been for the provision of these facilities; and what estimate he can make of any future expenditure.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Department of Transport has 797 workplaces for civil servants, of which 43 house more than 50 staff each. An on-site nursery is provided at the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre in Swansea. Holiday playschemes will be available to DTp staff in Birmingham, Coventry, Exeter, Bristol, Manchester, Nottingham, Swansea and central London in or near the workplace. After-school child care facilities are not provided. Typical charges for holiday play schemes are under £5 per child per day. The nursery charges parents £44·50 per child per week. Net costs for the provisions of these facilities, most of which are run in conjunction with other employers, are modest but precise figures are not readily available. Departmental policy is to continue to expand provision in co-operation with other Government Departments and private employers where this offers value for money.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether Her Majesty's Government was consulted by the European Commission over the grant of a £200 million loan to Eurotunnel; and if he will take steps to establish the conditions under which this loan was approved by the Commission.

Mr. Freeman: The European Commission has kept the Government informed of Eurotunnel's application for a loan and the conditions under which the loan would be made. Council approval is required before the loan is granted.

London Underground

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received on the new safety instructions issued to London Underground staff; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: None. These are revisions to existing safety instructions which London Underground has discussed with the Health and Safety Executive's railway inspectorate and the London fire and civil defence authority, whose comments have been incorporated in the draft revisions.

Driving Tests

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans there are to introduce a course by bicycle as part of the standard driving test, to ensure that drivers are aware of cyclists through experience; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: None, but a test candidate's awareness of the consideration required towards cyclists and other road users forms a critical part of the driving examiner's road safety assessment on test.

London Red Routes

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library the map used in Committee on the Road Traffic Bill that showed likely red routes in Greater London.

Mr. Chope: I have arranged for copies of the map that was referred to in Committee to be placed in the Library. The map does not, however, show proposals for priority routes in central London. We shall be giving further consideration to these and other proposals before we undertake formal consultation on the priority route network. An explanatory note has been added to the map.

Lower Lea Bridge

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will state what features to facilitate bus services he expects to incorporate in the rebuilt roads on either side of the new Lower Lea bridge.

Mr. Freeman: The rebuilding of roads on either side of the Lower Lea road crossing is being carried out by the London Docklands development corporation and the borough councils concerned. It will be for them to decide what features to help buses should be provided.

In planning improvements on the nearby A13 trunk road at the Ironbridge and Canning Town we shall be consulting London Transport and the boroughs on the additional facilities that might be provided to assist buses and bus users without jeopardising safety.

Auxiliary Coastguard Service

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy to discuss the outcome of the review of the auxiliary coastguard service with the hon. Members for South Hams and for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) before reaching any decisions.

Mr. McLoughlin: I will be ready to meet my hon. Friends to discuss the outcome of the review of Her Majesty's coastguard sector organisation and auxiliary coastguard service before reaching any decisions.

Newbury Bypass

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the progress of the Newbury bypass.

Mr. Chope: Following the decision anounced in July 1990 to adopt a western bypass of the A34 at Newbury, the Department has consulted on minor modifications to the route and side road alterations and will announce the outcome shortly. This will be followed by the publication of further draft orders including a compulsory purchase order for the land needed for the scheme. The draft orders will be open to objection and representations in the usual way and if necessary a further public inquiry will be held. Subject to the satisfactory completion of these procedures the scheme is on target for tender invitation and the start of construction in 1993.

Rail Electrification

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the progress of authorisation for the provision of electrification and the provision of rolling stock from the Leeds to Bradford and Aire Valley railway system.

Mr. McLoughlin: We are reserving resources to enable a start to be made on the provision of the infrastructure, and are at present considering proposals for the acquisition of the rolling stock.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

EC Software Directive

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will make it his policy to seek amendment to the EC draft software directive to ensure that computer interfaces do not become subject to copyright;

(2) if he will make it his policy to seek amendment to the EC draft software directive to ensure that an interface is defined objectively and not by the computer or software manufacturer.

Mr. Leigh: The directive would oblige member states to extend copyright protection to the expression of a computer program but not to ideas and principles underlying the program. This corresponds with existing copyright law in the United Kingdom. Interface specifications will not therefore acquire copyright protection as a result of the directive. The directive already employs the term "interface" in an objective sense and does not therefore give the creator of a computer program the right to define what part of the program constitutes an interface for the purposes of the directive.

Film Industry, France

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had with the European Commission about the provision of state aids to the French state-owned film and TV production company, Société Francaise de Production.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend has had no such discussions. Approval by the Commission for the recapitalisation of the Société Francaise de Production did not involve consultation with member states.

Cross-Media Promotion

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has received the report of Mr. John Sadler into standards of cross-media promotion.

Mr. Lilley: I have today published the Sadler report into standards of cross-media promotion as Cm. 1436. I am very grateful for the careful research and analysis which Mr. Sadler has carried out in response to my predecessor's request and I welcome the publication of the report.

Before I take a final decision on my course of action I should be very interested to hear views from anybody who wishes to comment, particularly those who would be affected by his recommendations. Comments should reach my Department by 19 April, after which I will announce my plans.

Export Credits Guarantee Department

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson) of 5 March, Official Report, columns 88-89, what steps he proposes to ensure that the selected tenderers on his short list to take over the insurance services group of the ECGD have adequate capital resources;

(2) pursuant to his answer of 5 March, what consultations he has had with the parent companies of trade indemnity to make its status on the short list for the trade sale of the insurance services group of the ECGD conditional on additional capital resources being provided.

Mr. Sainsbury: Shortlisted bidders have been requested to meet the DTI (insurance division) to discuss their plans for the business and capital requirements for the new company. The business will need sufficient capital to satisfy the regulatory requirements of the DTI and prudential requirements. For reasons of commercial confidentiality, it would not be appropriate to disclose details of discussions with any of the companies invited to tender.

Whisky

Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations Her Majesty's Government has made to the authorities in Taiwan in respect of the discriminatory effect of their tax regime on imports of Scotch whisky.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 11 March 1991]: The authorities in Taiwan are well aware of the United Kingdom's dissatisfaction. Her Majesty's Government have no formal dealings with the Taiwan authorities, but the British Overseas Trade Board's area advisory group for Taiwan, the Anglo Taiwan trade committee, takes every opportunity to draw our concerns on this matter to their attention, both in Taipei and London and will continue to do so. The Government have also raised the matter with the European Commission.

Post Office Staff

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has on the extent to which the measures applicable to postal and catering executive grades, as set out in P1 U0012, have been followed in the Royal Mail's reorganisation of Quadrant.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 8 March 1991]: The appointment and, where necessary, both the relocation and termination of employment of Post Office employees are operational matters for the Post Office.

Northern Region

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will list for the constituencies of Tynemouth, Langbaurgh, Darlington and Stockton, South those companies granted regional selective assistance since June 1983, together with the amounts involved.

Mr. Leigh: The information requested is available only at disproportionate cost. However, details of grant recipients were published quarterly in "British Business" up to September 1989 and thereafter in the Department of Employment "Gazette". The publication dates for the relevant issues of the journals are set out in the table.

EC Grants

Mr. Robert Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will outline the basis of the additionality conditions as applied by the United Kingdom Government in the context of the terms of EC grants and payments as set out in Community legislation; and if he will list those Community countries that follow the same procedures as the United Kingdom.

Mr. Leigh holding answer 11 March 1991]: The Government take into account expected levels of Community receipts when setting their expenditure programmes, which are thus higher than they would otherwise be. The detail of public expenditure planning systems varies from member state to member state within the Community.

ENERGY

International Atomic Energy Agency

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if Her Majesty's Government will increase the United Kingdom grant to the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: No. The International Atomic Energy Agency's budget is agreed annually by the board of governors and is confirmed at the general conference. The United Kingdom's contributions are calculated on the basis of the United Nations formula for establishing the scale of contributions to international organisations.

Value for Money

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what measures of performance are employed by his Department to ensure value for money.

Mr. Wakeham: The Department of Energy ensures value for money by setting a variety of demanding financial and performance targets and monitoring the results. "The Government's Expenditure Plans Within the Energy Sector 1991-92 to 1993-94"—Cm. 1505—gives examples of the performance measures against which departmental programmes are evaluated. It also provides details of efficiency savings against administration costs. Targets relating to departmental purchasing are recorded in the "CUP Annual Targets and Savings Return".

Mining Licences

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he intends to review the current arrangements for governing the distribution of licences to mine coal (a) in deep mines and (b) in licensed mines.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: British Coal is reviewing its licensing procedures in the light of increases in the limits applicable to licensed opencast and deep mine operations introduced by the Coal Industry Act 1990.

Plutonium

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Newport, West of 4 March, Official Report, column 17, how much of the plutonium arising from foreign spent fuel to which he refers was reprocessed prior to 1973; and what safeguards applied to civil nuclear materials at Sellafield prior to United Kingdom accession to the European Atomic Energy Community on 1 January 1973.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Approximately half a tonne of the plutonium referred to by the hon. Member was reprocessed before 1973. Prior to this date, civil nuclear material at Sellafield was subject to the United Kingdom's own system of accountancy and control.

Electricity Generation

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the cost per unit of electricity generated at current fuel input prices (a) at National Power's coal-fired stations, (b) at National Power's oil-fired stations, (c) by National Power's gas turbine generators, (d) at Nuclear Electric's advanced gas cooled reactor stations and (e) at Nuclear Electric's Magnox reactor stations.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: This is a matter for the companies concerned.

Radioactive Wastes

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Newport, West of 4 March, Official Report, column 17, whether the conditioned wastes to which he makes reference include both low and intermediate-level radioactive wastes arising from reprocessing foreign spent fuel.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The conditioned waste referred to in my reply to the hon. Member comprises high, intermediate and low-level waste. As I indicated, it is planned to return all high-level waste as soon as practicable after vitrification. In respect of some of the less radioactive wastes, however, there may be other options worthy of study—for example, whether it would be sensible to substitute an equivalent quantity, in radiological terms, of higher-level wastes.

Licensed Coalmines

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) whether he intends to revise upwards the maximum number of employees allowed to work below ground at licensed coalmines;

(2) what are the maximum permitted numbers of employees to work below ground in a licensed coalmine (a) in any single shift, (b) in any 24-hour period and (c) in any production week.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Coal Industry Act 1990 raised the limit on the number of men that could be employed to work underground in a licensed deep mine from 30 to 150. The Government have no plans to raise this limit further.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Israel

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action Her Majesty's Government are proposing to the United Nations Security Council regarding violations by the Israeli Government of (a) the Geneva conventions and (b) United Nations Security Council resolutions, regarding their treatment of Palestinian people.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: United Nations Security Council resolution 681 of 20 December 1990 provides a basis for continuing activity by the council on the protection of the Palestinian population of the occupied territories. As required under the resolution, the secretary general will shortly be reporting to the council on the matter.

NATO

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of NATO towards applications to join it from former Warsaw pact countries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: None of the former Warsaw pact countries have applied to join NATO. There is, however, general agreement within the alliance that membership for former Warsaw pact countries is not a practical option. Nonetheless, the declaration of the NATO summit held in London in July 1990 invited the Soviet Union and all the other countries of the Warsaw pact to establish regular diplomatic liaison with NATO. All the countries concerned have taken up this invitation.

Mecca Tunnel Disaster

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions have been held with the Saudi Arabian Government regarding compensation to the families of British citizens known to have died in the tunnel disaster at Mecca on 2 July 1990.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if any progress has been made with the Saudi Arabian Government in tracing British citizens missing since the tunnel disasters of 2 July 1990.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The Saudi Arabian authorities are still unable to trace the three missing British pilgrims. They informed the consulate-general in Jedda on 10 March 1991 that they had been able to produce better quality photographs of victims of the tragedy which may assist identification. The British embassy in Riyadh and consulate-general in Jedda have provided all available information to the Saudi authorities and continue to press them to pursue their efforts to identify the missing victims.

Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what meetings of the tripartite commission for the restitution of monetary gold have been held since 29 May 1985; and what was discussed.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: There have been four formal meetings of the tripartite commission for the restitution of monetary gold since the beginning of 1985. The proceedings of the commission are confidential.

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much gold, by value and weight, is under the control of the tripartite commission for the restitution of monetary gold: and where it is stored.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The tripartite commission holds a little over 7 tonnes of gold, in the Federal Reserve bank in New York and in the Bank of England. The total value is approximately US $85 million.

Kurds

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what meetings have been held with representatives of Kurdish political parties from (a) Iran, (b) Iraq, (c) Syria and (d) Turkey; what support has been offered to them; and what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards demands for Kurdish self-determination.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We believe that the Kurdish people should enjoy proper representation and respect for human rights in all of the countries in which they live. But as a signatory to the treaty of Lausanne of 1923, which established the present boundaries in the area, we cannot seek support for the establishment of a separate Kurdish state within these boundaries.

Iraq

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what occasions since March 1988 Her Majesty's Government's diplomatic representatives in Iraq met the Government to discuss (a) human rights violations, (b) the rights of Kurdish people, (c) the arms trade and (d) trade between the United Kingdom and Iraq.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Until they were withdrawn on 12 January, members of the British embassy in Baghdad were in regular contact with the Iraqi authorities and took many opportunities to raise our concerns with them about human rights violations in Iraq, including in relation to the Kurds. They also discussed trade between the United Kingdom and Iraq and our concern about Iraq's alleged attempts to acquire arms illegally in the United Kingdom.

Albanian Gold

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if any recent discussions have taken place with the Government of Albania regarding the various claims in respect of the award of the International Court of Justice in 1949 following the incident in the Corfu channel and the Albanian gold held in the Bank of England.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: British and Albanian officials met in November and December of last year to discuss outstanding bilateral issues.

Kuwait

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions have been held with the Emir of Kuwait concerning representative democracy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I have nothing to add to the reply I gave to the hon. Member on 26 February, at column 463.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Payroll Giving

Dr. Marek: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give an indication of the growth of the number of people taking advantage of the payroll giving to charity scheme since its inception, the corresponding amount of revenue forgone by the Treasury and the previous comparable estimates given by him.

Mr. Maude: Estimates are as follows:

Payroll giving scheme

Year	Donors (thousands)	Donations (£ million)	Cost of tax relief (£ million)
1987-88	55	1·0	0·3
1988-89	120	3·5	1·0
[1]1989-90	190	7·0	2·0
[1]1990-91	250	10·0	3·0

[1] Provisional.

Child Care

Dr. Marek: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the number of workplaces for civil servants in the Treasury, Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise; what proportion of the total number have an on-site nursery facility; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide a holiday play scheme; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide after-school child care facilities; what charges are made for use of any facility; what the net cost has been for the provision of these facilities; and what estimate he can make of any future expenditure.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information requested is as follows:

	Treasury	Inland Revenue	Customs and Excise
Workplaces	6	668	530
On-site nursery
Number	[4]	[2]	[3]
Proportion (per cent.)	17	0·5	0·2
Holiday play scheme
Number	[1]	26	24
Proportion (per cent.)	[1]	3·9	4·5
After school care	0	0	0

[1] The Treasury has no on site holiday play schemes at present, but it is involved in play schemes in the immediate vicinity of three of its workplaces.
[2] In addition Inland Revenue has one off-site shared nursery and a further two on-site and three off-site nurseries being developed.
[3] In addition Customs and Excise have reserved places in five other nursery schemes and a further three on-site nurseries are being developed.
[4] From 1 April.

Small Businesses

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many small businesses have registered for VAT in the northern region; how many have deregistered; and what is the surplus or deficit, for each year since 1983.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Statistics cover all businesses registering or deregistering for value added tax although in practice most could be termed small ones. The local VAT offices in Carlisle, Newcastle upon Tyne, Middlesbrough and Washington covers areas in addition to the northern region of Tyne and Wear, Cleveland, Durham, Cumbria and Northumberland. The number of VAT registrations and deregistrations processed by those offices was:

Year	New registrations	Deregistrations	Net change
1985	7,461	7,521	− 60
1986	7,745	7,343	+ 402
1987	7,926	6,652	+1,274
1988	9,756	7,232	+2,524
1989	10,449	7,594	+2,855
1990	9,073	7,819	+1,254

Records go back only to 1985.

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many small businesses have registered for VAT in the constituencies of Tynemouth, Langbaurgh, and Darlington and Stockton, South; how many have deregistered; and what is the surplus or deficit, for each year since 1983.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Statistics cover all business registering or deregistering for value added tax although in practice most could be termed small ones. The local VAT offices in Newcastle upon Tyne, Middlesbrough and Washington cover areas in addition to those listed. The number of VAT registrations and deregistrations processed by those offices was:

Year	New Registrations	Deregistrations	Net Change
1985	6,051	6,244	− 193
1986	6,303	5,867	+ 436
1987	6,345	5,358	+ 987
1988	7,854	5,746	+2,108
1989	8,409	5,998	+2,411
1990	7,290	6,357	+ 933

Records go back only to 1985.

Bankruptcy

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many petitions for bankruptcy have been originated by the VAT office for each year since 1985.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The following petitions for bankruptcy have been made by Customs and Excise for the years in question with orders made shown alongside:

	Petitions	Orders made
1985	1,622	883
1986	2,022	1,082
1987	1,456	895
1988	2,253	1,025
1989	2,905	987
1990	4,452	1,259
1991	396	[1]140

[1] (January only).

Personal Equity Plans

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list, for each year that PEPs have been in operation (a) the number and proportion of people with PEPs who are on the higher rate of tax and the number on the basic rate and (b) the cost to the Exchequer in total of PEPs and per person with a PEP.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 25 February 1991]: Information on personal equity plans is available only in respect of the number of plans and the amounts invested. Estimates of the direct revenue costs are as follows:

	Total (£ million)	Per Personal Equity Plan £
1986-87	[2]	[2]
1987-88	5	10
1988-89	15	35
1989-90	20	25
1990-91[1]	45	35

[1] Provisional.
[2] Negligible.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for each year that PEPs have been in operation (a) the number of people with PEPs, (b) the average holding per person in a PEP and the distribution of holdings and (c) the distribution of PEP holdings by region.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 25 February 1991]: Information is not available in the form requested.

The number of plans taken out since the introduction of personal equity plans is estimated as follows:

	Number
1987	270,000
1988	120,000
1989[1]	580,000
1990[2]	200,000
Total	1,170,000

[1] Includes the first quarter of 1990.
[2] Second and third quarters of 1990.

The average value of the investment in each plan at the end of the year is estimated as follows:

1987	1,650
1988	1,950
1989-90	2,900

There is no information available on the distribution of the level of investments or the regional distribution of investors.

Profit-related Pay

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average income and the distribution of income of those in profit-related pay schemes.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 25 February 1991]: Average annual earnings of participants, including those working part-time, in registered profit-related pay schemes were about £12,500 in February 1991. I regret that information on the distribution of earnings is not available.

No Smoking Day

Mr. Amos: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to support smokers in his Department to give up smoking on the eighth No Smoking Day on 13 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 11 March 1991]: The no smoking policy in operation in my Department was set out in my reply on 7 February, at columns 171-72. Self-help groups have been run to support smokers who wish to give up smoking, but there are no plans to take any further measures in support of No Smoking Day.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Slaughterhouses

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish the communications to his chief veterinary officer and to other Ministry officials by European Community veterinary inspectors about the common deficiencies of slaughterhouses they visited in 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: It would not be appropriate to publish this correspondence between EC Commission officials and officials in my Department, as the information requested includes confidential details of the commercial activities of certain companies. I will, however, write to the hon. Member further on this matter.

Veterinary Investigation Service

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the numbers of (a) veterinarian, (b) scientific, (c) administrative and (d) other posts that will be lost as a result of his decision to close and reorganise the Veterinary Investigation Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: An estimated 13 veterinary, 14 scientific, 11 administrative and 14 laboratory support posts will be lost when the reorganisation of the VI service is completed in three or four years' time. Everything possible will be done to help staff find alternative jobs and to keep redundancies to a minimum.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Ghana

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what aid has been provided to Ghana over the past two years.

Mrs. Chalker: Information is as follows:

	£ thousand
	1988	1989
Gross bilateral aid	32,976	50,206
Mulilateral aid attributable to United Kingdom	11,890	n.a.
of which through EC	2,130	n.a.

Figures for 1990 are not yet available.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what conditions have been attached to the granting of aid with regard to improvements in human rights in Ghana.

Mrs. Chalker: We have made it clear to the Ghanaian authorities that our decisions on the allocation of bilateral aid funds for Ghana will take account of the extent to which they develop accountable and democratic institutions and respect for human rights. We shall continue to urge them to introduce the necessary reforms to obtain these objectives.

Cyprus

Mr. Faulds: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the figure of overseas aid provided over the last three financial years to the island of Cyprus; and what proportion of those sums has gone to the Turkish Cypriot sector.

Mrs. Chalker: Under the ODA's bilateral aid programme technical cooperation funds were provided as follows:

1988-89	301,000
1989-90	231,000
[1]1990-91	266,000

[1] (Estimate).

About 42 per cent. of the allocations for the three years taken together were directed to the Turkish-Cypriot community.

In addition training awards were provided by the ODA under the Commonwealth scholarship and fellowship plan:

1988-89	242,000
1989-90	233,000
1990-91	216,000

About 12 per cent. of the allocations for the three years taken together were for Turkish Cypriots.

Support has also been provided from aid and trade provision funds for two projects in the Republic of Cyprus, with annual disbursements as follows:

1988-89	184,000
1989-90	674,000
1990-91	25,000

Iraq

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what humanitarian aid has been provided to Iraq since 15 January; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: In addition to emergency relief supplies provided by the International Committee of the Red Cross and funded from its Gulf appeal to which Her Majesty's Government contributed £2·5 million, the European Community has provided humanitarian aid through the ICRC totalling £2·5 milion. Britain's share of this is approximately £420,000.

A multi-agency United Nations mission is currently in Iraq to assess humanitarian needs. It will make recommendations to the secretary-general on emergency actions the United Nations might take. We will consider responding to any subsequent appeal for funding launched by the secretary-general.

Famine

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his assessment of the number of people at risk from famine in Ethiopia and Sudan; how much British food aid has been made available; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The World Food Programme estimates that in Ethiopia there are some 7·45 million people in need of food aid and in Sudan around 7·7 million. Since September 1990 the Government have committed a total of 60,300 tonnes of food aid to Ethiopia, and 35,550 tonnes to Sudan. A total of 35,300 tonnes will have been delivered to Ethiopia by the end of March and 15,550 tonnes to Sudan. The balance will be supplied over the coming months.

DEFENCE

Gulf Fatalities

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will break down the fatalities of service men in the Gulf conflict by country of permanent residence within the United Kingdom.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Because of the mobile nature of service life, the information requested is not available. The country of residence of the next of kin of those who died while serving in the Gulf area or following evacuation to the United Kingdom for medical treatment is shown below:

Country	Number of fatalities[1]
England	[2]25
Scotland	4
Wales	[2]3
Germany	4

[1] Figures comprise fatalities which occurred between 2 August 1990 and 8 March 1991

[2] Figures include one civilian serving with the Royal Fleet Auxiliary

Gulf Forces

Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans are being made for the return of British forces from the Gulf.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The withdrawal of British forces from the Gulf will continue progressively, following the return of the first personnel on 10 March. The precise timing of the return of units will depend on circumstances. During the next few weeks, some RN personnel, 7th Armoured Brigade group, and the bulk of RAF combat aircraft will return.

Walter Somers Ltd.

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence further to his answer of 6 March, Official Report, column 224, what assessment was made by the Ministry of Defence metallurgical expert of the technical aspects of the steel tubes which Walter Somers Ltd, proposed to export to Iraq as a result of his two telephone conversations with the company.

Mr. Alan Clark: The two telephone conversations did not establish that the steel tubes had a military purpose.

Export Controls

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether Ministry of Defence officials are involved in discussions with other countries as part of the co-ordinating committee for multilateral export controls.

Mr. Alan Clark: Yes.

Iraqi Defence Industry

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his assessment of the effect of British exports of non-lethal defence equipment on the Iraqi defence industry.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is extremely unlikely that any United Kingdom defence equipment could have enhanced the capability of the Iraqi arms industry to any significant degree.

The Gulf

Mr. Higgins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the present arrangements for blueys and parcels posted to members of Her Majesty's forces in the Gulf will continue until they return.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There are no plans to change present arrangements.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Civil Scientific Research

7. Mr. Quentin Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of gross domestic product the Government spend on civil scientific research; and what are the comparative figures in Japan and the United States of America.

Mr. Alan Howarth: In 1988 the United Kingdom Government spent 0·55 per cent of gross domestic product on civil scientific research. The corresponding figures for Japan and the United States of America were 0·45 and 0·39 per cent.

Qualifications

16. Mr. Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proposals he is considering for the reform of qualifications for 16 to 19-year-olds.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend is considering advice from the School Examinations and Assessment Council on proposals for new general principles to govern A-level and AS syllabuses. The National Council for Vocational Qualifications is reforming vocational qualifications. We want many more young people to take the vocational route to higher qualifications and better jobs.

Students

17. Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on financing the expansion of student numbers.

Mr. Alan Howarth: We welcome the continuing expansion of student numbers which, promoted by our policies, is spreading the benefits of higher education ever more widely. We are committed to supporting this with appropriate levels of public spending. At the same time, we look for further improvements in the efficiency of provision and continued broadening of the higher education system's funding base.

Nursery Education

18. Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proposals he has to improve the quality of nursery education as suggested in the report "Starting with Quality"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: "Starting with Quality" is concerned with the educational experience of three and four-year-olds across various settings. Much of it addresses the needs and responsibilities of local providers of services. We have, therefore, sent copies of the report to local education authorities, local authority social service departments and other interested bodies. In addition, the Department of Health and this Department plan to issue guidance on the implementation of the Children Act which will draw, where appropriate, on the report.

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proposals he has to increase the number of places available in nursery education; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett).

Standard Spending Assessments

19. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what effect he has calculated the standard spending assessment for 1991-92 will have on the education service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney).

Teacher Training

20. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what discussions he has had with the Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education regarding training for the teaching of reading as part of initial teacher training.

Mr. Fallon: Department of Education and Science officials and Her Majesty's inspectorate have regular discussions with the Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education members and officers regarding many aspects of initial teacher training, including the teaching of reading.

Adult Education, Bury

21. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received in relation to the provision of adult education in Bury.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. Friend has received one representation with 33 signatures about the possibility that the Bury arts and crafts centre might be closed.

Further Education

22. Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to extend the legislation for grant-maintained schools to include colleges of further education.

Mr. Eggar: The Education Reform Act 1988 introduced a number of significant changes in the funding, governance and management of colleges. My right hon. and learned Friend is watching carefully to see how those changes work out in practice. No possibility has been ruled out for the future.

Education Authorities

23. Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will seek to move towards a system whereby education authorities are purchasers of education places other than providers thereof.

Mr. Fallon: Under local management of schools and more open enrolment, parents will now become the effective purchasers of school education as funds follow pupils to the school of their choice. By April 1993 at least 85 per cent. of potential school budgets must be delegated to the school, and at least 80 per cent. of each budget must be allocated to pupil numbers.

Grammar Schools

24. Mr. Roger King: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the future of grammar schools.

Mr. Fallon: The organisation of school provision is a matter for individual local education authorities. My right hon. and learned Friend considers any proposals to reorganise schools, including proposals for the establishment or closure of grammar schools, on their merits. He has said that he would look very carefully at any proposals to close grammar schools or end selective education, taking full account of expressed parental wishes.

Scientific Research

25. Dr. Bray: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met Sir Mark Richmond to discuss the funding of scientific research; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My right hon. and learned Friend occasionally meets the chairman of the Science and Engineering Research Council. I have met Sir Mark Richmond twice recently. We discussed a number of matters including the funding of scientific research.

Students' Unions

26. Mr. Douglas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the responses which have been received from students' organisations and Scottish universities with regard to the future of students' unions.

Mr. Alan Howarth: I have received a number of responses to my letter of 29 November 1990. As the consultations are still in progress, it would be inappropriate for me to comment further.

Education Budgets

27. Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of local education authority budgets is on average spent on the provision of central services and administration; and which authorities are the three highest and the three lowest in this respect.

Mr. Fallon: The latest information available relates to LEA spending on excepted items under local management of schools. According to authorities' budget statements, the average percentage of the LMS potential schools budget which is being withheld from schools in 1990-91, is some 16·2 per cent. Those budgeting to spent the highest percentages of the potential schools budget on discretionary excepted items are Westminster, 22 per cent., Kingston upon Thames, 21·5 per cent., and Haringey, 20·6 per cent. Those budgeting to spend the lowest percentages—so delegating the highest percentages to schools—are Bolton, 10·9 per cent., Berkshire, 12·3 per cent., and West Sussex, 12·5 per cent. Comparable information is not available for the FE or other education sectors.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the average amount of external funding per pupil in grant-maintained schools for the current year; and what is the comparable figure for the last complete year before the same schools acquired grant-maintained status.

Mr. Eggar: Most recurrent funding for grant-maintained schools is paid through annual maintenance grant, the majority of which is a sum which seeks to replicate the amount which would have been allocated to the school had it remained under the control of the local education authority. Also within annual maintenance grant is a sum in lieu of central services previously provided by the authority which in the current financial year averaged an additional 16 per cent. The central services element of annual maintenance grant will be standardised at that rate in 1991-92.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many (a) primary and (b) secondary schools have (i) applied for and (ii) achieved grant-maintained status.

Mr. Eggar: The number of primary and secondary schools which have become grant-maintained or are proceeding through the GM process is as follows:

	Secondary	Primary	Total
Operating under GM status	50	0	50
Approved but not yet operating under GM status	14	0	14
Published proposals with decisions pending	23	2	25
Preparing GM proposals following ballots in favour of seeking GM status	23	11	34
Holding or committed to a ballot on GM status	30	13	43

Value for Money

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what measures of performance are employed by his Department to ensure value for money.

Mr. Eggar: This Department ensures value for money from its purchases by setting demanding savings targets and monitoring the results. These are recorded in the central unit on purchasing annual targets and savings return.

Hounslow

Mr. Ground: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what percentage of its potential schools budget the London borough of Hounslow is delegating to schools in the current financial year; and how much it will need to delegate to meet the proposed requirements in the draft circular on local management of schools;

(2) what effect the proposals contained in the draft circular on local management of schools will have on the amount delegated to schools by the London borough of Hounslow as against the current financial year.

Mr. Fallon: Hounslow local education authority is currently delegating to schools 81·6 per cent. of its potential schools budget. The draft circular issued in December 1990 proposed that from April 1993 a minimum of 85 per cent. should be delegated. On the basis of Hounslow LEA's 1990-91 budget statement, that would add about £1·76 million to school budgets—an average of about £23,000 per school.

Compulsory Schooling

Dame Jill Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list those countries which have compulsory schooling starting for a younger age group than in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Fallon: Compulsory education age limits are listed in the "UNESCO Statistical Yearbook 1990". Of the 170 countries for which limits are given, Gibraltar is the only one where compulsory schooling starts at an earlier age than in the United Kingdom.

Purchase and Distribution

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many people in his Department are wholly or substantially involved in purchasing stores and distribution activities.

Mr. Eggar: This Department employs a central purchasing unit comprising six full-time purchasing staff and a publications distribution centre with 13 operatives.

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the full annual cost, including overheads, of his Department's purchasing activity.

Mr. Eggar: This Department's central purchasing unit's full annual costs are approximately £165,000.

Welsh Plant Breeding Station

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the present state of the Welsh plant breeding station, Gogerddan, Aberystwyth; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Progress in establishing the new Agricultural and Food Research Council institute of grassland and environmental research centred on the Welsh plant breeding station is well under way. Construction of new laboratory and associated facilities at the Aberystwyth site costing £5·1 million is now in progress.

The institute also includes sites at North Wyke in Devon and Bronydd Mawr near Brecon. An additional site at Trawsgoed will be purchased from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. Buildings and facilities at the North Wyke and Trawsgoed sites are planned at costs of £1·6 million and £1 million respectively.

The new institute will provide the strategic science base to meet the environmental and land use challenges of the next century, and will be capable of attracting research supported by industry on the milk, beef and sheep sectors.

Physical Education

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on physical education and sport in schools.

Mr. Atkins: I refer my hon. Friend to my right hon. and learned Friend's response to the interim report of the national curriculum physical education working group, a copy of which is in the Library. The Government's policies on physical education and sport in schools were also set out in my response to the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) in the debate on the Adjournment on 28 February, Official Report, column 1211.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Homeless Claimants

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what instructions have been given to the staff on the use of the Thames North and Thames South offices in handling homeless claimants.

Miss Widdecombe: Staff engaged on income support operations have been advised that the offices at Thames North and Thames South cater for single men and women without a settled way of life or who normally reside in certain hostels or resettlement units. The offices are not intended for use by temporarily homeless or unemployed people who do not normally have an itinerant way of life and who have come to London and the south-east in search of work.

Order Books

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, further to his answer to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North of 7 March, when he expects to complete his consideration of a redesigned benefit order book.

Miss Widdecombe: We expect that a redesigned benefit order book will be available in 1992.

National Insurance

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of social security expenditure was met by national insurance contributions for each of the years since 1961 for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement on future trends in this figure.

Mr. Jack [holding answer 7 February 1991]: The table shows the percentage of social security benefit expenditure met by national insurance contributions for each year from 1960-61 to 1989-90, and the planned figure for 1993-94 which is taken from the 1991 departmental report. Foster Parents

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people in each Welsh county are currently (a) foster parents and (b) adult family placement carers.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: This information is not collected centrally.

Old Age Psychiatry

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) of 19 February, Official Report, column 90, what factors caused the increase in hospital bed provision for old age psychiatry in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: In 1989 the Royal College of Psychiatrists formally recognised the psychiatry of old age as a separate sub-specialty. Consequently, consultants have been appointed to sub-specialist posts and a significant proportion of beds which prior to 1 April 1989 were classified generally under "mental illness" have been designated as "old age psychiatry" beds. In addition, there has been an underlying growth in the number of people over 75 cared for in mental illness hospitals, reflecting the increasing number of very elderly people in the population at large.

Fishing, Ceredigion

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the present state of the fishing industry in Ceredigion.

Mr. David Hunt: About 70 licensed vessels operate out of ports in Ceredigion, the majority on a part-time and/or seasonal basis. Over the period 1985 to 1989 the quantity of fish landed has remained fairly constant at around 50 tonnes, but the value has increased from £88,000 in 1985 to £216,000 in 1989.

Dentists

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many dentists have left the national health service in Wales since the introduction of the new contract.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Numbers of dentists withdrawing from family health service authority lists are collected centrally only on an annual basis. A survey conducted in January and February of this year collected information on the provision of dental care. Out of 562 dentists contacted, which represents 62 per cent. of those on family health service authority lists at the time, three had ceased to provide NHS services since 1 October 1990.

History

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has had from teachers of history concerning the national curriculum; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Representations have been made from time to time on a variety of matters concerning the national curriculum by individual history teachers, or via the Association of History Teachers in Wales.

More recently representations have been made by 10 individual history teachers or teachers responding through their local education authority and the Association of History Teachers in Wales on the draft order for history in the national curriculum and on the proposals for the study of all national curriculum subjects by pupils aged 14 to 16 years—key stage 4.

Following the extensive consultation which has taken place, an order for history will shortly be placed before the House under the provisions of the Education Reform Act. In due course proposals for the study of all national curriculum subjects at key stage 4 will be published for consultation.

Shotton Steelworks

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make an official visit to Shotton steelworks in Clwyd.

Mr. David Hunt: I regularly visit the Clwyd area, but I have no present plans to visit Shotton steelworks.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many health service trusts there are in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: None yet.

Welsh Office Initiatives

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the implementation of the urban programme, urban development grant, the programme for the valleys and the Cardiff Bay development corporation.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: I am pleased to announce the publication of the 1988-89 annual report of the urban programme, urban development grant, programme for the valleys and Cadiff Bay development corporation. The report details the contribution these schemes are making towards alleviating the problems of economic and social deprivation in Wales. Copies of the report have been placed in the Library of the House.

Constructors Tern

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what additional funding he proposes to make available to South Glamorgan health authority to compensate for additional borrowing costs arising from the receivership of Constructors Tern.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: There is no question of the South Glamorgan health authority having to borrow money as a result of Constructors Tern being taken into receivership.

Hospitals, South Glamorgan

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the chairman of South Glamorgan health authority concerning a review of his approval of the authority-proposed third major district general hospital.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: None.

Regional Health Authorities

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are the numbers employed in each Welsh regional health authority's administration office.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Information, on a comparable basis, on the numbers of staff working in district health authorities' headquarter units is not available centrally.

NHS Land Sales

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what additional funding he proposes to make available to South Glamorgan health authority to compensate for the level of surplus land sales being below expectations.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: None. Under current arrangements South Glamorgan health authority has full responsibility for the sale of surplus property. It is for the authority to manage its land sales programme and realise its expectations.

The Gulf

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what additional funding he proposes to make available to South Glamorgan health authority to compensate for additional costs arising from bed disposition arising from the Gulf war; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The Department has written to the relevant district health authorities inviting them to submit substantiated claims for compensation for preparations made for possible receipt of Gulf war casualties. This is in line with undertaking given previously by the Government. South Glamorgan health authority has submitted a claim which is currently being considered by the Welsh Office.

SCOTLAND

Non-fossil Fuel Obligation

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will apply the non-fossil fuel obligation to Scotland as it is applied in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend has no current plans to do so.

Scottish Enterprise

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has considered the terms of transfers of employment currently being offered by Scottish Enterprise to Training Agency staff; whether these meet the terms of guarantee given; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend approves, in conjunction with Her Majesty's Treasury, certain specific aspects of the terms of employment which will apply to Scottish Enterprise staff. It is a matter for Scottish Enterprise itself to ensure that the terms of individual offers of employment, taken as a whole, comply with paragraph 16(3) of schedule 1 to the Enterprise and New Towns (Scotland) Act 1990. The 1990 Act provides for any dispute as to whether the terms of paragraph 16(3) have been complied with to be resolved by an industrial tribunal and this is not, therefore, a matter for my right hon. Friend's consideration.

Crown Immunity

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the categories of hospital and the aspects of their work, which enjoy Crown immunity.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The NHS and Community Care Act 1990 provides for the removal from 1 April 1991, with limited exceptions, of those Crown immunities currently applied to hospitals managed by health boards and the state hospital. The exceptions are as follows:

(a) exemption from the requirement to carry insurance against injury or disease sustained as a result of employment as required by the Employers Liability (Compulsory Insurance) Act 1969 since the NHS makes equivalent arrangements for staff under the NHS (Injury Benefit) Regulations 1974;

(b) immunity from motor vehicle taxation for NHS vehicles under the Vehicles (Excise) Act 1971;

(c) the retention of Crown status for the purposes of Section 48 of the Copyright, Designs and Patients Act 1978 which relates to Copyright on material communicated to the Crown in the course of public business;

(d) immunity from the requirement to effect third party insurance under the Road Traffic Act 1988.

NHS trusts will not be Crown bodies, but any hospitals under their control will also benefit from the remaining immunities listed above with the exception that immunity from the requirement to effect third party insurance is limited to ambulances only. Hospitals in the private sector will continue, as at present, to be required to meet all relevant statutory obligations.

Achondroplasia

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of hospitals in Scotland providing facilities for the treatment of achondroplasia.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Treatment for those who suffer from this disease will be provided in a number of departments of major acute and children's hospitals, particularly orthopaedic departments. There is, however, no one unit dedicated to the treatment of this particular disease.

Electricity Privatisation

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what share incentives will be offered to employees and pensioners when the two Scottish electricity companies are privatised; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: The Government attach particular importance to the opportunity which privatisation will provide for employees to become shareholders in Scottish Power plc and Scottish Hydro-Electric plc. The special offers to employees will comprise:

1. A Free Offer

Employees will be offered free shares to a fully paid value of about £140, plus shares at a fully paid value of about £2 for every year of continuous service in the electricity supply industry up to a date close to flotation.

2. A Matching Offer

Employees will also be offered two free fully paid shares for every share bought at the offer price on a matching basis up to a maximum fully paid value of about £460 worth of free shares. Under this element of the package, if an employee bought shares with a fully paid value of £230, he would receive free shares to a fully paid value of £460.

3. A Discount Offer

Employees will be able to buy shares up to a maximum fully paid value of about £1,250 of additional shares at a discount of 20 per cent. from the offer price.

4. A Priority Offer

Employees applying for shares will be treated on a priority basis, over the general public, up to an individual fully paid limit of shares worth about £15,350. This may be subject to scaling down if the number of shares in either company applied for by employees and pensioners exceeds a prescribed proportion of the total number of shares on offer.

The free and matching share offers will be available to employees who satisfy certain minimum qualification periods of length of employment and hours worked per week. The discount and priority offers will be available to each person employed at a date close to flotation.

We have decided that pensioners of the companies should be able to apply on a priority basis, over the general public, for shares up to a fully paid limit of about £15,350, subject to any necessary scaling down.

We have also made special arrangements for employees and pensioners of Scottish Nuclear Ltd., which will not be floated on the stock exchange. Employees and pensioners of Scottish Nuclear will receive offers of shares in Scottish Power plc. on terms similar to employees and pensioners of ScottishPower.

Further details of the share offer arrangements will be made available to employees and pensioners in due course, including those resulting from Inland Revenue, stock exchange and other requirements applying to these offers.

Items in Lieu of Tax

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if any works of art have been accepted in lieu of inheritance tax since he last made an announcement.

Mr. Lang: I am pleased to announce that the following works have been accepted in lieu of inheritance tax;

Item	Amount of tax satisfied £
Four old master drawings (by Mirola, Barocci, Cortona and Reni)	64,490
Harpsichord by Burkat Shudi	35,000
Portraits of Charles Hope and Professor Hill by Sir Henry Raeburn	48,439

The four old master drawings have been allocated to the National Gallery of Scotland. The Raeburn portrait of Charles Hope has been allocated to the Scottish national portrait gallery. The Shudi Harpsichord and the Raeburn portrait of Professor Hill have yet to be allocated.

Child Care Law

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he proposes legislation to implement any of the recommendations of the committee set out to review child care law in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 11 March 1991]: Once we have assessed the recommendations of the review in the light of the many comments received we shall decide which can be accepted and how they can be implemented, by primary legislation, by regulations or by guidance.

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received following upon the publication of the report of the committee set up to review child care law in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 11 March 1991]: To date, a total of 83 responses have been received from a wide range of organisations and individuals. We are analysing these responses carefully before making any decisions on the individual recommendations of the review.

RECHAR

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will detail the representations that have been made to the European Community by his office in order to ensure that the provisions of Community regulations on additionality are fully met in respect of RECHAR programmes in eastern and western Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart [holding answer 8 March 1991]: My office has made no representations to the European Commission on this matter. However, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has written to the European Commission on the question of additionality and RECHAR.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Property Identification

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether it is the policy of his Department to mark property with an indelible mark or similar means of identification.

Dr. Mawhinney: Where practicable, certain items of value are marked and serial numbers recorded.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the Northern Ireland Office last conducted a survey of the ethnic origins of its employees; when it next plans to do so; and whether he will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: In June 1988 the home civil service completed a four-year programme of ethnic origin surveys covering all staff then in post. The Northern Ireland Office has continued to monitor staff who join the home civil service group in the Department and to update its records. The Northern Ireland Office is an equal opportunity employer and this is emphasised in all recruiting campaigns and advertising. The Northern Ireland civil service is not required to monitor the ethnic origins of staff, nor has it plans to do so.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many and what percentage of officers in each grade (1 to 7) and overall in the Northern Ireland Office are (a) women and (b) from ethnic minorities, respectively.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Northern Ireland civil service employs 12,416 female staff which constitutes 42 per cent. of the service. The Northern Ireland office—NIO—now employs 86 women in the Home Civil Service—HCS—staff group which constitutes 43·6 per cent. of the total.

The detailed information sought is as follows:

Grade	Number of females		Percentage
	NICS	HCS	NICS	HCS
1	—	—	—	—
2	—	—	—	—
3	1	—	2·5	—
4	—	—	—	—
5	14	—	7·6	—
6	51	—	28·4	—
7	74	3	8·3	5

Twenty-one full-time members and one part-time member of staff—11 per cent.—in the home civil service group of the NIO are from ethnic minorities. The Northern Ireland civil service is not required to monitor the ethnic origins of its staff.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he has taken to recruit members of ethnic minorities in top grades of employment at the Northern Ireland Office.

Dr. Mawhinney: The home civil service and the Northern Ireland civil service are fully committed to ensuring equality of opportunity for all applicants including any from ethnic minorities. The Northern Ireland Office is an equal opportunity employer and this is emphasised in all our recruiting campaigns and advertising. If direct recruitment for certain senior posts in the NIO were to be necessary, it would be conducted with guidance from the Civil Service Commission. Within Northern Ireland itself, religion is a more significant equality of opportunity consideration than ethnic origin. Consequently the Northern Ireland civil service has not taken any specific action to recruit members of ethnic minorities in top grades of employment.

Civil Servants

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many of the civil servants employed by his Department were born in a foreign state;

(2) how many civil servants in Northern Ireland, other than those in the Northern Ireland Office, were born in a foreign state.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information could be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what restrictions operate in the employment of (a) foreign nationals, (b) Commonwealth citizens and (c) citizens of the Irish Republic, as (i) civil servants, or (ii) public servants in Northern Ireland; and whether such restrictions are uniformly applied throughout the United Kingdom.

Dr. Mawhinney: To be eligible for appointment to the Northern Ireland civil service, a candidate must be a Commonwealth citizen, although the Civil Service Commissioners may in exceptional circumstances decide to grant exemption from this requirement. The discretionary powers exercised by commissioners have included recruitment to scarcity occupations where suitably qualified candidates were not available and where an applicant has been closely associated with Northern Ireland or where the post is considered not to be covered by article 48(4) of the treaty of Rome.

To be eligible for appointments in the home civil service, candidates must be Commonwealth citizens, British protected persons or citizens of the Republic of Ireland.

Radioactivity

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table showing the intensity of radioactivity present in the (a) soil, (b) peat, (c) grasses and (d) heather in the areas of (i) Glenshane, County Londonderry, (ii) Belraugh, County Londonderry and (iii) Glenwherry, County Antrim when the effect of the radioactive discharges from Chernobyl were first measured and showing the present levels in each of those areas; and what is his estimate as to when those levels will have fallen to the point where all restrictions on the movement of sheep can be removed.

Mr. Hanley: The soil-to-plant-to-animal transfer of radio caesium is complex and influenced by so many factors that vegetation levels would not be a reliable indicator on which to base firm conclusions. It is only through systematic monitoring of sheep populations in the restricted areas that appropriate data can be acquired to manage a restricted area. It is on the basis of such data that the Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland was able to reduce the size of areas under restriction in Co. Londonderry. It is not possible to predict how long restrictions will remain in place. They will be lifted as soon as it is possible to do so without compromising the food chain, but we might still have to wait a considerable time before that is possible.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table showing the acreage in each of the areas of Glenshane, County Londonderry, Belraugh, County Londonderry, and Glenwherry, County Antrim named in SR(NI), 1991, No. 8 Public Health, Food Protection (Emergency Prohibitions) Order (Northern Ireland) 1991; if he will indicate the reduction in acreage in each case from the order superseded by this order, and the acreage at present under forestry plantations which were planted (i) before and (ii) since the discharge of radioactive material from Chernobyl; and if he will show for each of the designated areas the number of sheep kept on them.

Mr. Hanley: The information is as follows:

	Glenwherry	Glenshane	Belraugh
Acreage in areas designated in SR 1991 No. 8	8,620	10,487	1,305
Reduction in acreage from SR 1987 No. 367	—	247	943
Number of breeding ewes in current restricted areas	7,000	14,000	1,300
Acreage under forestry in current restricted areas which was planted—
(i) Before Chernobyl accident	165	1,099	—
(ii) After Chernobyl accident	172	195	—

Fish

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what information he has as to the present stocks of (a) salmon, (b) sea trout, (c) brown trout, (d) pollan, (e) perch, (f) bream and (g) pike in (i) Lough Neagh, (ii) upper Lough Erne and (iii) in lower Lough Erne; and what were the comparable figures five, 10, 20 and 30 years ago;

(2) if he will publish a table to show (a) the number and type of nets or other commercial fishing engines in freshwater lakes and rivers operating in Northern Ireland in the 1990 season, (b) the species taken by each such engine, or from each fishery and the weight of each species taken, (c) the value of such fish by species from each fishery and (d) the comparable figures for 1985, 1980 and 1970;

(3) what size of (a) salmon, (b) sea trout, (c) pollan, (d) brown trout, (e) perch, (f) bream and (g) pike could escape through the mesh of the net mesh sizes allowed for use in the commercial freshwater fisheries of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: The information requested is not held centrally but I will write to the hon. Gentleman when the information has been obtained and place a copy of my letter in the Library.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information he has as to (a) the minimum, (b) the maximum and (c) the average size and weight of brown trout from Lough Neagh which spawn in the lough's catchment area; and whether such fish spawn annually or biannually.

Mr. Hanley: The minimum size of spawning trout corresponds to the minimum size at maturity for males. This is of the order of 20 to 25 cms in size and 5 to 6 oz in weight. No data are available on maximum or average sizes or weights. These trout tend to spawn annually.

River Dun (Breakwater)

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the breakwater at the mouth of the River Dun was erected, when planning permission was sought, and granted; and whether any objections were made to his Department about this structure.

Mr. Hanley: The breakwater at the mouth of the River Dun was constructed in 1987. Planning permission for the breakwater was sought on 14 January 1988 and attracted six objections. This planning application was withdrawn on 27 April 1988. A new planning application was submitted on 16 January 1989. Four objections to this application were received. Planning permission was granted on 5 July 1989.

Social Security

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the number of benefit payments paid by (a) order book, (b) Girocheque, (c) automated credit transfer and (d) payable order during the year 1989-90.

Mr. Hanley: The information requested is as follows:

	Number
(a) order books	29,589,904
(b) girocheques	3,999,309
(c) automatic credit transfers	492,579
(d) payable orders	83,780

The payable order figure relates only to payments of retirement and widows benefits. Another 118,724 payable orders were issued but benefit payments cannot be disaggregated from the total of administrative and benefit payments.

Fair Employment Agency

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many cases of discrimination against (a) Roman Catholics and (b) Protestants the Fair Employment Agency has found in each of the years since its establishment.

Mr. Hanley: The information is as follows:

Findings of unlawful discrimination made by Fair Employment Agency

Year	Protestant	Roman Catholic
[1]1976-1979	1	4
1979-80	—	3
1980-81	—	2
1981-82	2	2
1982-83	—	4
1983-84	2	5
1984-85	2	6
1985-86	4	1
1986-87	—	12
1987-88	—	3
1988-89	—	6
1989-90	1	6

[1] In the first three years of the agency's existence composite figures only were produced (end March).

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the cost of supporting the Fair Employment Agency in each of the years since its foundation.

Mr. Hanley: The costs of supporting the Fair Employment Agency and Fair Employment Commission over the period 1976 to 1991 were as follows:

1 September 1976—31 March 1977	40,850
1 April 1977—31 March 1978	81,605
1 April 1978—31 March 1979	116,000
1 April 1979—31 March 1980	154,000
1 April 1980—31 March 1981	189,000
1 April 1981—31 March 1982	201,000
1 April 1982—31 March 1983	226,300

1 April 1984—31 March 1985	258,000
1 April 1985—31 March 1986	288,000
1 April 1986—31 March 1987	383,000
1 April 1987—31 March 1988	512,000
1 April 1988—31 March 1989	769,900
1 April 1989—31 March 1990[1]	1,309,000
1 April 1990—31 March 1991[2]	1,519,000

[1] The Fair Employment Agency was renamed Fair Employment Commission by Section 1 of the Fair Employment (NI) Act 1989 with effect from 1 January 1990.

[2] First full year of the Fair Employment Commission.

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many allegations of discrimination have been referred to the Fair Employment Agency in each of the years since its foundation.

Mr. Hanley: The information is as follows:

Complaints of Unlawful Religious and/or Political Discrimination received by the Fair Employment Agency

Year	Number
[1]1977	120
1978	120
[1]1979	120
1979-80	42
1980-81	49
1981-82	50
1982-83	33
1983-84	71
1984-85	81
1985-86	81
1986-87	86
1987-88	87
1988-89	125
[2]1989-90	138

[1] In the first three years of the agency's existence composite figures only were produced.

[2] The Fair Employment Tribunal is empowered to hear complaints of acts of alleged discrimination against individuals, on grounds of religious belief or political opinion, where those acts occurred on or after 1 January 1990. The Fair Employment Agency's power to adjudicate in such complaints relates only to those complaints where acts of alleged discrimination occurred before 1 January 1990.

[3] End of March.

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many cases of discrimination have been found against (a) Roman Catholic and (b) Protestant employers by the Fair Employment Agency in each of the years since its foundation.

Mr. Hanley: The commission does not keep statistics about whether employers involved in individual complaints of discrimination are perceived to be Protestant or Roman Catholic.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for 12 March.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an Audience of Her Majesty the Queen.

Private R and D

Dr. Bray: To ask the Prime Minister if he will outline the reconciliation between the figure for expenditure on research and development in private industry made by the Ministry of Defence of £1,202 million for 1988-89 as shown in table 2b of the "Annual Review of Government Funded Research and Development 1990" and the amount received by industry from the Department in 1989 of £630 million according to table 7 of the Central Statistical Office's "Business Bulletin" issue 14/91.

The Prime Minister: Reasons for the apparent difference between the two estimates of defence research and development expenditure are provided in the Cabinet Office's "Annual Review of Government Funded R and D 1990" (page 18, paragraph 2). As indicated in paragraph 18 of the Government's reply (Cm 1467) to the report of the House of Lords Select Committee on Science and Technology on Definitions of R and D (HL Paper 44), we intend to pursue further with industry the reasons for these differing assessments.

UN Children's Organisation

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the Government's contribution to the United Nations Children's Organisation.

The Prime Minister: The United Kingdom made a voluntary contribution of £8·5 million to UNICEF's core budget in 1990. This was our largest ever contribution.

In 1990 we also paid £1·52 million to UNICEF in response to special appeals.

ENVIRONMENT

Water Act (Covenants)

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions he has had an opportunity to enter into a covenant with a company holding an appointment under chapter 1 of part II of the Water Act 1989 for the purposes set out in section 152(7) of that Act; how many covenants have been entered into; on how many occasions he has declined to enter such covenants; and what were the reasons in each case.

Mr. Trippier: The Secretary of State has not entered into any covenants under section 152(7) or declined any recommendation that he should do so. The Department does not hold information on cases determined by the Countryside Commission under the general authorisation dated 1 September 1989 which do not require the Secretary of State's specific approval.

Land Disposal

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions the conditions of a consent or authorisation for the disposal of land, or an interest or right in or over that land, have been made in accordance with section 152(5)(a) of the Water Act 1989 to direct the disposal to a specified person where that land is situated in a national park, the Broads, an area of outstanding natural beauty or a site of special scientific interest and has not been acquired compulsorily.

Mr. Trippier: The Secretary of State has not received any recommendation from the Countryside Commission to direct disposal to a specified person under section 152(5)(a).

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has received any requests from (a) water undertakers, (b) statutory bodies or (c) voluntary bodies to revise or amend the general authorisation dated 1 September 1989 issued under section 152 of the Water Act 1989 concerning the disposal of land in a national park, the Broads, an area of outstanding natural beauty or a site of special scientific interest.

Mr. Trippier: The Countryside Commission, the Nature Conservancy Council and the Office of Water Services have all expressed the view that the general authorisation should be revised. The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds has written to us to the same effect; but we have not received any letters from water undertakers.

Water Quality

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all the supply areas and parameters for which the drinking water inspectorate has made provision to allow drinking water supplies to exceed the water quality standards laid down under the Water Act.

Mr. Trippier: Copies of relaxations authorised by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment under regulation 4 of the Water Supply (Water Quality) Regulations 1989 have been placed in the Library of the House.

Water Charges

Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what levels of increase in water charges have been agreed between the Government and the water companies over the next nine years;

(2) what estimate of inflation has been used in the calculation of water charges for the next nine years.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment set limits (K factors) on the extent to which water charges may be increased over and above the increase in the retail prices index for the 10 years from 1 April 1990. Lists of the K factors for each water and water and sewerage company were deposited in the Library of the House. In determining the K factors assumptions were made about future inflation levels, but the K factors themselves would have been affected very little by alternative inflation assumptions. Responsibility for overseeing water charges and for any amendments to the K factors for a company falls to the Director General of Water Services.

Environmental Protection Act

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when general guidance notes for local authorities on the implementation of part I of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 will be published.

Mr. Trippier: The Department intends to send pre-publication copies of general guidance notes for the implementation of part I of the Environmental Protection Act to local authorities this month, and I will send a copy to the hon. Member. The notes will be published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office as soon as possible thereafter.

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if special financial resources will be allocated to local authorities to enable them to implement the requirements of the Environmental Protection Act.

Mr. Baldry: An additional £11 million in capital allocations has been allocated in 1991-92 to waste disposal authorities in England for improvements to landfill sites and other disposal facilities to enable them to meet the higher standards that will be required by the Environmental Protection Act. Further provision is planned for future years. As with all new duties falling on local authorities, the revenue consequences of the Environmental Protection Act, have been reflected in the 1991-92 revenue support grant settlement.

Landfill Sites

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish (a) the number of landfill sites in England and (b) a list of those sites that have been visited by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution, together with the dates of those visits.

Mr. Trippier: It is the responsibility of waste disposal authorities to issue waste disposal licences and to ensure that any conditions of the licences are met. Information on the number of landfill sites in England is therefore not held centrally.

I will write to the hon. Member about the second part of her question.

Water Pipes

Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his latest estimate of the cost of placing responsibility for all water pipes with the water companies.

Mr. Trippier: We have no plans to make water companies responsible for any water pipes other than those already vested in them, and have therefore not prepared any estimates of the cost of doing so.

Genetically Modified Organisms

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information on genetically modified organisms, which have been released to the environment, is currently available to the public; whether this information is available centrally; and whether the information includes a description of the genetically modified organisms, the name and address of the releaser, the purpose of the release, the location of the release, a summary of the risk assessment, methods and plans for monitoring, and methods and plans for emergency response.

Mr. Trippier: My Department has no current arrangements for making such information available to the public. Provision for public registers of information about genetically modified organisms is, however, made in part VI of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. The location of such registers and the particulars of the matters to be included on them will be prescribed in regulations under part VI on which my right hon. Friend will consult later this year. Meanwhile the operative regulations for the control of all activities using genetically modified organisms are the Genetic Manipulation Regulations 1989, which are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment.

Site Authorisation

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment who has responsibility for issuing authorisation to sites with a mixture of part A and part B processes.

Mr. Trippier: The Environmental Protection (Prescribed Processes and Substances) Regulations 1991, which were laid before the House today, contain a series of rules for determining the control authority in cases such as those where there is a mixture of part A and part B processes on the same site. It will depend, among other matters, on whether the processes are undertaken by the same operator and whether they fall within the same section of schedule 1 to the regulations. The rules are explained in "Integrated Pollution Control—A Practical Guide" which was published on 28 February and a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State may, exceptionally, direct, under section 4(4) of the Environmental Protection Act, that processes are transferred from local authority to national inspectorate (air only) control.

Cryptosporidiosis

Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to receive reports from the communicable disease surveillance centre and the drinking water inspectorate in connection with the recent outbreak of cryptosporidiosis in Humberside.

Mr. Trippier: I understand that a report from the outbreak control team is imminent. When it is available the drinking water inspectorate can continue its investigation.

Helicopters

Mr. Jessel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether planning permission is required to allow helicopters to land on the tops of buildings.

Mr. Yeo: This will depend on the details of what is proposed, and is for the local planning authority to judge in the first instance.

Recycling

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the supplementary credit approval scheme for funding recycling projects in England and Wales was established; what funds are available to it; and over what time scale the scheme operates.

Mr. Baldry: Supplementary credit approvals for investment in recycling facilities are being made available from 1991-92 for local authorities in England only. We have made provision for a further £30 million of such supplementary credit approvals in 1992-93 and 1993-94.

Drinking Water

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what factors he considered before deciding not to review the permissible level of lead in drinking water; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. Friend considered whether any new evidence or considerations had become available.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what time scales are to be afforded to water suppliers in order to meet (a) the informal standards on pesticides, and (b) all other health-related, toxic or microbiological, standards in the EC drinking water directive, such as polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons, solvents and lead.

Mr. Trippier: The standards set in the EC drinking water directive have been incorporated into the Water Supply (Water Quality) Regulations 1989. Most water supplies already meet most of the standards in the regulations. The supplies that do not yet comply are the subject of remedial action which will generally bring them into compliance by 1995. This remedial action is set out in undertakings given by the companies under section 20 of the Water Act 1989 and copies of these are in the Library. The only standards set by the regulations in respect of pesticides are the ones in the EC directive and it is to those standards that the actions specified in the relevant undertakings relate.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many authorisations have been granted for departures from his Department's regulations for drinking water quality; and if he will list these departures, together with time scales for their remediation.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has authorised 719 relaxations under regulation 4 of the Water Supply (Water Quality) Regulations 1989. Most of them contain provision for work to be carried out to achieve the relevant standard by, at latest, 1995. The remainder are subject to review by 1994. Copies of the relaxations have been placed in the Library of the House.

Access to Information

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to implement the EC directive of 7 June 1990 on the freedom of access to information on the environment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The Government fully support the directive. Indeed, we played a full part in the discussions which resulted in its formulation. The United Kingdom is committed to implementing the directive in domestic law by the end of 1992, and my Department will shortly be issuing a consultation paper on ways of achieving this.

Hazardous Waste

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to prevent ships carrying cargoes of dangerous disposable waste from entering British ports.

Mr. Trippier: No. There are already effective safeguards in respect of the import of hazardous waste. Under the Transfrontier Shipment of Hazardous Waste Regulations 1988 a disposer may not accept an import of hazardous waste unless his disposal authority has approved the dispatch of the waste from the country of production.

Nitrogen Oxide (Monitoring)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to increase the number of nitrogen oxide monitoring stations.

Mr. Trippier: Plans to expand the monitoring of air quality in the United Kingdom were announced in the White Paper "This Common Inheritance" last September.

As a first step an enhanced urban monitoring network is to be put in place this year. It will include an increased number of stations for monitoring nitrogen oxides.

Housing Action Trusts

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much public expenditure in total will be available for housing action trusts in 1991-92, 1992-93 and 1993-94 and in subsequent years; and how much specifically has been earmarked for housing action trusts if they proceed in (a) Waltham Forest, (b) Hull and (c) elsewhere.

Sir George Young: Present planned public expenditure provision for housing action trusts is £10·3 million in 1991-92, £67·3 million in 1992-93 and £69·0 million in 1993-94. Planned provision for 1994-95 will be announced in autumn 1991 following the 1991 public expenditure survey. Specific annual allocations for individual trusts have not yet been made. The amount needed by a trust in a particular year can be determined only when the trust has been established and has drawn up its corporate plan.

Environmental Health Officers

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many qualified environmental health officers are currently employed by local authorities in England; how many vacancies for such officers exist; and what action he is taking to ensure that a sufficient number of officers will be available in future.

Mr. Key: Information on the numbers of qualified environmental health officers is not collected by my Department. It is for each local authority with powers in this field to decide how many officers are needed and to make arrangements for recruiting them.

Leybucht Bay Judgment

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply of 7 March, Official Report, column 243, when he expects the official English translation of the Leybucht Bay judgment to be available to him.

Mr. Trippier: Responsibility for the production of the official English translation of the judgment rests with the European Court of Justice. I cannot forecast when this will be available.

Community Charge

Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many residents in Wolverhampton in the current financial year have benefited from transitional relief in the payment of their community charge;

(2) how many residents in Wolverhampton will benefit from the community charge reduction scheme.

Mr. Key: About 16,500 people in Wolverhampton are benefiting from transitional relief in 1990-91. Information on the number of people in each charging authority area who will benefit from the community charge reduction scheme in 1991-92 will be available once authorities have submitted their grant claim forms.

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if police officers living in section houses in the metropolis where the rates were paid by the receiver are eligible to receive a reduction in their community charge.

Mr. Key: Entitlement to the automatic reduction is not affected by the fact that the rates had been paid by another person.

Local Government Finance

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what grant per poll tax payer has been given in Lewisham, Hammersmith and Fulham and Ealing.

Mr. Key: Government grants, consisting of revenue support grant, specific grants, specific grants in aggregate external finance, community charge benefit grant and transitional relief grant, are per head of relevant population in 1990-91, £738 in Lewisham, £765 in Hammersmith and Fulham and £667 in Ealing.

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what grant per poll tax payer is received by Chorley, Pendle, West Lancashire, Chester, Blackpool and Swindon.

Mr. Key: Government grants, consisting of revenue support grant, special grants, specific grants in aggregate external finance, community charge benefit grant and transitional relief grant, are per head of relevant population in 1990-91 as follows:

Government grants per head of relevant population

Chorley	255
Pendle	329
West Lancashire	297
Chester	213
Blackpool	290
Thamesdown	237

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many standard poll tax payers are registered in (a) Wigan, (b) Salford, (c) Bolton and (d) Westminster.

Mr. Key: The available information reported by local authorities is as follows:

Number of unoccupied properties on the community charges register subject to a standard community charge at 1 June 1990, including properties subject to a standard charge with a multiplier of zero

	Number
Wigan	4,302
Salford	3,006
Westminster	18,607

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what grant per poll tax payer is received by (a) Liverpool, (b) Wirral and (c) Sefton.

Mr. Key: Government grants, consisting of revenue support grant, special grants, specific grants in aggregate external finance, community charge benefit grant and transitional relief grant, are per head of relevant population in 1990-91, £814 in Liverpool, £439 in Wirral and £325 in Sefton.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what grant per poll tax payer is received by Bradford local authority and Wandsworth local authority for 1990-91.

Mr. Key: Government grants, consisting of revenue support grant, special grants, specific grants in aggregate external finance, community charge benefit grant and transitional relief grant, are per head of relevant population in 1990-91, £613 in Bradford and £677 in Wandsworth.

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what grant per poll tax payer is received by each of the local authorities in Greater Manchester.

Mr. Key: Government grants, consisting of revenue support grant, special grants, specific grants in aggregate external finance, community charge benefit grant and transitional relief grant, are per head of relevant population in 1990-91, as follows:

Government grants per head of relevant population

Bolton	416
Bury	278
Manchester	866
Oldham	505
Rochdale	459
Salford	565
Stockport	267
Tameside	347
Trafford	349
Wigan	306

Mr. Duffy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what grant per poll tax payer is received by (a) each of the four metropolitan local authorities in South Yorkshire and (b) each of the Scarborough and Bridlington local authorities.

Mr. Key: Government grants, consisting of revenue support grant, special grants, specific grants in aggregate external finance, community charge benefit grant and transitional relief grant, are per head of relevant population in 1990-91, as follows:

	Government grants per head of relevant population £
Barnsley	323
Doncaster	338
Rotherham	275
Sheffield	309
Scarborough	180
East Yorkshire	260

London Borough of Ealing

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his oral answer of 27 February, Official Report, column 967, what is the total additional assistance that has been given to the London borough of Ealing towards its housing revenue account; which Ministers took part in the negotiations; and under what authority and for what specific purposes the assistance was given.

Sir George Young: The Department has agreed to advance the London borough of Ealing £5 million of housing revenue account subsidy from 1992-93 to 1991-92 to give the council more time to overcome the problems created by the previous Labour administration's setting of a totally unrealistic budget. The advance of subsidy is being provided under sections 80 to 87 of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) considered and approved the London borough of Ealing's request.

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage level of rent increase has been applied in Ealing since May 1990 for council house tenants.

Mr. Yeo: I understand that since May 1990 the London borough of Ealing has increased council rents once, in January 1991 by 38·6 per cent., eqivalent to £10·77 per week.

Employment Land

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if, for the purpose of county structure plans and local plans, employment land is deemed to include land for all types of employment such as industry, retail, commercial and leisure.

Sir George Young [holding answer 11 March 1991]: No. Plans should make distinctions between different types of employment-generating development, to the extent that they have different implications for land use. Retail development, for example, will often have different implications from industrial use. Further advice is given in the relevant planning policy guidance notes.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Dangerous Criminals

Dame Jill Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on how he intends to ensure that offenders who are a persistent danger to women receive tougher sentences.

Mr. John Patten: The Criminal Justice Bill strengthens the court's powers to protect the public from persistent violent and sexual offenders. Courts will be able to impose a custodial sentence or a longer one than justified by the seriousness of the offence upon a sexual or violent offender who poses a risk of serious harm to the public. They will also be able to order longer and more intensive supervision for sex offenders following their release from custody or when they are sentenced to a community penalty.

Gambling

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the latest figures, expressed in £ million per annum and £ per head of the population, for gambling in the United Kingdom on (a) off-course and on-course betting, (b) amusement machines, (c) casinos, (d) bingo, (e) football pools and (f) small lotteries.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Estimated figures for gambling turnover (i.e. amount staked) in the financial year 1989-90 are tabulated below. Those for off-course betting, pool betting and bingo are based on returns to Her Majesty's Customs and Excise. Those for casinos and lotteries are taken from the annual report of the Gaming Board for Great Britain, although the latter includes only those lotteries registered with the board. The estimates for on-course betting and gaming machines cannot be calculated directly and should be treated with extreme caution. The turnover per head per annum is based on an estimated population of 57·2 million.

	Estimated turnover/year £ million	Turnover/ head/year £
Off-course betting	5,734	100
On-course betting	743	13
Gaming machines	3,494	61
Casinos	1,881	33
Bingo	807	14
Pools	715	12·5
Lotteries	23	0·4

Lotteries

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether the completion of the internal market in the European Community after 1992 will have any impact on the controls imposed by United Kingdom law on the distribution and sale of lottery tickets produced by other member countries;

(2) whether it is the policy of Her Majesty's Government, in the context of the completion of the single market, to maintain national legislation on gambling games on grounds of public morality and consumer protection.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Commission's White Paper programme for the completion of the single market does not contain proposals for the harmonisation of gambling legislation. So far as we are aware, the Commission does not at present have plans to bring forward any such proposals. It is Her Majesty's Government's policy that controls on gambling are matters for national authorities.

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has contacted the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany on the distribution of Suddeutschen Klassenlotterie tickets in the United Kingdom; and whether he has asked that Government to withdraw authorisation of that lottery in Germany.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have discussed with the Federal Republic of Germany possible means of preventing the distribution of Suddeutsche Klassenlotterie tickets in the United Kingdom. The director of the lottery has drawn to the notice of the lottery's agents that the mass promotion of the lottery in another country where that is unlawful is contrary to the rules under which the agents operate. We shall continue to liaise with both the director and the relevant authorities in Germany about examples of agents promoting the Suddeutsche Klassenlotterie in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what measures he has taken to prevent the unauthorised sale of foreign lottery tickets in the United Kingdom;

(2) what representations he has recently made to Governments of member countries in the European Community to prevent the unauthorised sale of lottery tickets in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Together, where appropriate, with the Gaming Board for Great Britain, Her Majesty's Customs and Excise and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, a number of measures are taken to prevent or curtail the promotion of foreign lotteries in the United Kingdom.

Representations are, if necessary, made to the authorities in the country concerned. Of European Community countries, such representations have been made to the Federal Republic of Germany. Representations have also been made to the authorities in Austria, as a result of which that country's national lottery has undertaken to cease their promotional activities in this country, and to the authorities in British Columbia, Canada.

If advertisements for foreign lotteries appear in magazines published here, the provisions of our law are drawn to the attention of the publishers who have previously undertaken not to publish such advertisements again. In addition, Her Majesty's Customs and Excise have seized substantial quantities of promotional letters intended to be posted individually here but imported in bulk.

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has on lottery sales, in £ million per annum, in EC countries.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We do from time to time receive information about expenditure on gambling in other EC countries, but we do not at present have any consistent or reliable figures for lottery sales. Such figures may in due course be available as part of a study now being conducted on behalf of the European Commission.

Visitors

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of visitors admitted to the United Kingdom in each month of 1990.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The available information is given in the table:

Ordinary and business visitors[1] admitted to the United Kingdom 1990

Month	Total
January	338,000
February	351,000
March	472,000
April	508,000
May	645,000
June	793,000
July	896,000
August	726,000
September	636,000
October	534,000
November	422,000
December	398,000
Annual total	6,720,000

[1] Excluding European Community nationals.

Immigration (Carriers' Liability)

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total amount paid (a) by airlines and (b) by ferry operators under the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act 1987 in each month of 1990: and how much remains outstanding in unpaid penalties in respect of notices served in (a) 1988, (b) 1989 and (c) 1990.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The accounting system does not differentiate between airlines and ferry operators; the analysis requested could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. The total amount paid by all carriers in each month of 1990 was as follows:

January	234,000
February	198,000
March	368,000
April	59,000
May	339,000
June	250,000
July	202,000
August	221,000
September	210,000
October	415,000
November	670,000
December	241,000
Total	3,407,000

The following amounts remain outstanding in respect of notices served in each of the following years:

1988	1,203,000
1989	2,201,000
1990	5,943,000

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will indicate (a) how many notices were served under the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act 1987, (b) in how many cases representations were made and (c) in how many cases discretion was exercised.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The total number of notices issued to carriers (for example airlines and sea operators) to 31 January 1991 was 26,604. Representations were made by carriers to the ports in 7,179 cases. Discretion was exercised in 5,627 cases, either as the result of written representations made by carriers after receipt of a notice or on subsequent review at immigration service headquarters.

Asylum

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has on the number of applications made for asylum in each European Community country in (i) 1980, (ii) 1988, (iii) 1989 and (iv) 1990.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The available information is given in the table:

Applications for asylum in European Community countries[1]

	1980	1988	1989	1990[2]
Belgium	2,700	5,100	8,100	12,950
Denmark	50	4,650	4,600	5,300
Federal Republic of Germany	107,800	103,100	121,300	193,050
France	13,700	31,600	58,750	56,050
Greece	1,800	8,400	3,000	4,400
Italy	2,450	1,300	3,350	4,750
Netherlands	3,200	7,500	13,900	17,600
Portugal	n.a.	350	150	100
Spain	n.a.	3,300	2,850	6,850
United Kingdom	2,350	5,250	16,300	30,000

[1] Information is not available for the Republic of Ireland and Luxembourg.
[2] Some of the 1990 figures are provisional estimates.
n.a. = not available.

Criminal Responsibility

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he has any plans to raise the age of criminal responsibility from 10 years;

(2) what factors were taken into account in deciding to establish the age of criminal responsibility at 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We have no plans to raise the age of criminal responsibility. It was raised from eight years to its present level of 10 years by the Children and Young Persons Act 1963.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is giving any consideration to changing the age of criminal responsibility to fall into line with other European member states after 1992.

Mr. John Patten: The arrangements for dealing with young offenders differ between the member states of the European Community. There is no common age of criminal responsibility.

Wormhoudt Massacre

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr of 13 December 1990, Official Report, column 490, if he has received a report from the German prosecuter following interviews with survivors of the Wormhoudt massacre of 5 October 1989, and other statements provided on 20 June 1990.

Mr. John Patten: I understand that the German prosecutor has not yet reached a decision on this case.

Immigration

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions have been held with other European Community Governments concerning the entry of Iraqi and Palestinian people to any member state since 15 January; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: During the hostilities there was a continuing exchange of information between European Community governments about the terrorist threat and measures to counter it, including the deportation or exclusion of individuals judged to pose a threat to security.

Electoral Registration

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what advice is given to electoral registration officers on production of non-English language materials to promote electoral registration.

Mrs. Rumbold: In 1988 and 1989 we issued to electoral registration officers sets of model explanatory notes on the registration process in a number of ethnic minority languages, together with guidance on their use. The 1989 revision remains extant. In general, registration officers are themselves best placed to assess the needs of the local ethnic minority population and to produce their own material accordingly.

Juvenile Offenders

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the rates of juvenile offending per head of population in all EC countries in ascending order.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Iraqi Nationals

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Iraqi nationals have to undertake weekly reporting to police stations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Four Iraqi nationals who are the subject of either deportation or illegal entry action are required to report weekly to the police; one other is required to report twice weekly. In addition, a number of Iraqis will have been instructed to report to the police at weekly intervals by immigration officers at ports and airports. Details are not available centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what date the Government proposes to make a statement on changes in immigration rules in respect of refugees and asylum-seekers.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Asylum arrangements are under review, but it is too early to say when or in what way changes might be introduced.

Children and Young Persons Act

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if there are plans to implement sections 4 and 5 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1969.

Mr. John Patten: No. These provisions, which have never been implemented, will be repealed by the Criminal Justice Bill.

Mr. Les Huckfield

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Chief Constable of Merseyside as to the cost so far of investigations into the conduct of Mr. Les Huckfield.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: No.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Chief Constable of Merseyside on civil actions outstanding against him or his officers relating to Mr. Les Huckfield.

Mr. John Patten: No.

Children

Dame Jill Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the steps the Government has taken to endorse parents' responsibility for their children's behaviour.

Mr. John Patten: The Criminal Justice Bill contains provisions designed to bring home to parents their accountability when their children offend. It contains provisions for parents' attendance at court with their children, for parents' payment of their children's fines and for parents to be bound over to look after their children properly.

Shop Squatting

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received regarding the practice known as shop squatting in vacant retail premises; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We have received representations from a number of hon. Members and others about squatting in vacant shops. We are examining the law as it affects the unlawful occupation of buildings generally to assess whether any change is needed, but we have not yet reached conclusions.

Hunting

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek a report from the chief constable of Hampshire on the total number of police involved in policing New Forest hunts on Boxing day and new year's day 1990.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the chief constable that 23 uniformed officers and six special constables were in attendance when the New Forest hunt met on Boxing day 1990 and that 10 uniformed officers were deployed on new year's day 1991.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek a report from the chief constable of Hampshire on the number of occasions in 1990 when police video cameras were used to film hunt protesters in the New Forest.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the chief constable that the police used video cameras at 14 hunt meetings in 1990.

Homelessness

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what requests for financial assistance to be given in 1990-91 and 1991-92 he has received from Swansea Accommodation for the Single Homeless.

Mr. John Patten: Swansea Accommodation for the Single Homeless, supported by the West Glamorgan probation service, has applied for funding for five bed spaces for offenders in 1991-92. This is being considered. I am told that we received no request for 1990-91.

Child Care

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of workplaces for civil servants in his Department; what proportion of the total number have an on-site nursery facility; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide a holiday play scheme; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide after-school child care facilities; what charges are made for use of any facility; what the net cost has been for the provision of these facilities; and what estimate he can make of any future expenditure.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The Home Office employs staff in some 320 workplaces throughout the country. Nursery provision is generally focused on areas which have considerable concentration of staff: it is already available in Croydon and in Bootle and will shortly be available in Westminster and north London. Holiday play schemes are also available in Croydon, Bootle and Westminster as well as at Peterborough, but there is no current provision for after school child care. The Department contributes to the cost of the existing provision and would expect to continue to so subsidise any future similar initiatives in which its local managers are prepared to invest. There is no central record of costs nor estimate of future costs.

EMPLOYMENT

Departmental Achievements

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the principal achievements of his Department since June 1987.

Mr. Jackson: Employment has continued to rise, and the work force in employment is now over 27·3 million, the highest ever level, over 2·3 million higher than in June 1987. Unemployment is just under 1 million lower than at the June 1987 election. The United Kingdom continues to have one of the lowest unemployment rates in the European Community. Only Germany, Luxembourg and Portugal have lower rates. The number of people who have been unemployed for more than 12 months has fallen by 59 per cent. since July 1987. Unemployment among the 18 to 24s is also down by over a third since October 1987. In December 1990 under-25s EC unemployment rate for the United Kingdom is 10·5 per cent. compared with the EC average of 16 per cent.

Over the last three years, the Government have radically reformed the framework within which training and enterprise are supported in Britain. We have created a network of local training and enterprise councils to give business a leading role in local training and economic development. We have stimulated the development of a comprehensive system of industry training organisations. Through the National Council for Vocational Qualifications, we have made substantial progress with the reform of vocational qualifications, producing a ladder of opportunity for individuals to climb to higher levels of competence.

The Government's training measures, now under the local direction of TECs, have helped substantial numbers of people. In recent years 2·7 million young people have benefited from youth training; 900,000 unemployed adults from employment training; and 850,000 from the technical and vocational education initiative. 84,000 students annually are now benefiting through the enterprise in higher education initiative. The growth of training in Britain in recent years is demonstrated by the 70 per cent. rise shown by the labour force surveys 1984-89 in the numbers of employees receiving training from their employers.

The technical and vocational education initiative (TVEI) has helped schools in all LEAs to make their curricula relevant to the world of work and has provided a substantial increase in the numbers of students obtaining a record of achievement.

Compacts, which are bargains between young people from inner city areas, schools, employers and training providers, are operational in 47 areas; 15 more are planned. In the first 29 areas over 50,000 students are covered by the job with training guarantee; over 300 schools are participating; over 5,000 employers are actively involved; and 25,000 jobs with quality training have been pledged for successful compacts graduates.

The education business partnerships initiative was launched in 1990 with plans to set up single partnerships in each TEC area to improve work relevant education opportunities and widen business involvement.

Following a successful pilot programme, career development loans were made available throughout Great Britain in July 1988 to help individuals pay for vocational training of their own choice. By the end of January 1991 over 15,000 people had invested some £44 million in their own future through training. More than four out of five people paying for their training using a career development loan go into or are already in jobs on finishing their training.

The number of small firms in Britain and the level of self-employment continue to rise rapidly. In 1988 and 1989 the number of VAT-registered firms grew by 152,000. The number of self-employed people rose by 520,000 between June 1987 and June 1990. Early indications for 1990 based on VAT registrations are that there continues to be a significant increase in the number of businesses.

Since 1987 we have continued our step-by-step approach to the reform of industrial relations and trade union law, which has helped to bring about the significant improvement in industrial relations during the 1980s.

The Employment Act 1988 gave union members the right to restrain their union from calling on them to take industrial action without a proper secret ballot, the right to inspect union accounting records, the right to elect all principal union leaders by secret postal ballot under independent scrutiny, and the right not to be unjustifiably disciplined by their union. The Commissioner for the Rights of Trade Union Members was established to assist union members taking certain proceedings.

Employees were protected, in all circumstances, against dismissal for membership or non-membership of a trade union, and organising industrial action to establish or maintain any closed shop practice was made unlawful.

The Employment Act 1989 promoted equality of opportunity for women in employment, removed unnecessary restrictions on young people in work, and paved the way for the removal of the weight of Industrial Training Board bureaucracy from major sections of British industry.

The main industrial relations and trade union law provisions of the Employment Act 1990 came into force on 1 January 1991. They give anyone refused a job on the grounds of membership or non-membership of a trade union a right of complaint to an industrial tribunal, make a trade union responsible in law for a call to take industrial action by any of their officials, and make it unlawful to organise secondary industrial action or action in support of an employee dismissed while taking unofficial industrial action. In addition, any employee taking unofficial action will know that they risk losing the right to claim unfair dismissal if they are dismissed. New requirements on union election and strike ballots enhance union members' democratic rights, and the powers of the Commissioner for the Rights of Trade Union Members are extended to enable her to assist proceedings arising from a breach, or possible breach, of a union's rule on certain matters.

A new statutory code of practice "Trade Union Ballots on Industrial Action" came into operation on 11 April 1990. The code promotes desirable practices in relation to the conduct by trade unions of such ballots.

As a result of the abolition of the highly restrictive dock labour scheme by the Dock Work Act 1989, the efficiency and labour productivity of the former scheme ports has been transformed and new business opportunities in and around the ports are flourishing.

The employment service (ES) was created in October 1987 by bringing together in one organisation both job placement and payment of benefits to unemployed people, in order to provide a more coherent and effective service to those in need of help to get jobs and thereby fill employers' vacancies. In April 1990 the ES was established as the largest "next steps" agency to date.

In 1989-90 the ES placed in jobs 1·85 million people, 80 per cent. of whom were unemployed. The ES is continuing to improve its services and programmes with the introduction of back to work plans for all unemployed people, the establishment of a unified advisory service, and extra help for those unemployed for over six months.

The ES has made a successful start to the process of combining the functions of job centres and unemployment benefit offices under one roof, so that clients can benefit more easily from the full range of ES services. The Government are investing £70 million in the new network of 1,100-1,200 offices, which will be completed by 1994.

In 1990 my Department issued a consultative document "Employment and Training for People with Disabilities", setting out proposals to increase the effectiveness of the services which assist people with disabilities to prepare for, gain and retain employment. Responses to this document are now being considered.

The Department has continued to play an active role in the discussions of EC social affairs policies and the United Kingdom, as shown in a recent report by the European Commission, is the only member state to implement all 18 existing measures in the social field.

We have also continued our programme to modernise and update the law relating to health and safety at work, in particular by a major revision of the law governing the control of substances potentially hazardous to health in the work place.

Disabled Workers

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what recourse is available to disabled people who consider they have been unjustifiably discriminated against in the field of employment.

Mr. Jackson: Where people feel that discrimination in employment arises from their having a disability they can discuss the matter with the Disablement Advisory Service or a disablement resettlement officer who, where appropriate, can contact the employer and seek to overcome any prejudice or misunderstanding, including providing guidance on the wide range of help available for integrating people with disabilities into the work force. If they meet the qualifying conditions they may be able to complain of unfair dismissal to an industrial tribunal. Along with other employees, in the appropriate circumstances they can also complain to an industrial tribunal about discrimination on grounds of sex, race and membership or non-membership of a trade union, for which there is no qualifying period of service.

Registration

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement outlining those occupations in the United Kingdom at risk from member states of the European Community due to the lack of mandatory registration.

Mr. Forth: Member states in the Community are bound by the treaty articles and associated legislation concerned to achieve the free movement of persons, services and capital. These requirements affect all occupations. If the hon. Gentleman has a particular risk in mind, perhaps he would write to me.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the criteria by which TECs will be paid their output-related funding for 1991-92 for (a) youth training, (b) employment training or (c) the enterprise allowance scheme; on what evidence their performance will be assessed; who is responsible for collecting and evaluating this evidence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: For youth training (YT), TECs will be paid output-related funding in 1991-92 for national vocational qualifications (NVQs), or equivalent qualifications, at level II and above gained by those trainees who have remained in training for a minimum period of one month. Additionally, payment will be made for NVQs, or equivalent qualifications, gained at level I by some special training needs trainees.

For employment training (ET), TECs will be paid output-related funding for NVQs, or equivalent qualifications, gained by those trainees (other than trainees in skill shortage occupations or who are returning to the labour market) who have remained in training for a minimum period of one month. Payment will also be made for such trainees who are in a job, self employment, or full-time education or training three months after leaving ET.

Payment will be made for trainees in skill shortage occupations or who are returning to the labour market who gain NVQs, or equivalent qualifications, at level II and above and are in a job, self employment, or full-time education three months after leaving ET.

For the enterprise allowance scheme, TECs will be paid output-related funding for scheme entrants and for 12 week and 26 week business survivors.

Evidence that outputs have been achieved will be collected and held by TECs and training providers and will be available for audit by the Employment Department.

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give a summary of the information that has been collected by his Department from area offices and TECs about the employment training recontracting that has taken place showing (a) which TECs or area offices have reduced or terminated ET contracts, or plan to, giving the number of contracts involved and (b) which TECs or area offices have had problems finding alternative places for trainees who have been displaced from training programmes as a result of recontracting, giving the number of trainees involved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: My Department is currently negotiating contracts with training and enterprise councils (TECs) for the delivery of employment training (ET) in 1991-92. Decisions on contracts with individual training providers are a matter for TECs.

Information is not held centrally on numbers of ET contracts which are reduced or terminated nor on the numbers of ET trainees transferred to alternative training providers.

My right hon. and learned Friend announced to the House on 26 February provision of an additional £120 million for ET in 1991-92. This additional resource will enable ET to continue to play its important role in helping long term unemployed people back to work.

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the allocated budget of each of the operational TECs for 1991-92, showing the amounts contracted for (a) youth training, (b) employment training and (c) the enterprise allowance scheme.

Mr. Jackson: Contracts with TECs are still subject to negotiation.

Northern Region

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people were self-employed in the Northern region in February 1981, June 1987 and February 1991.

Mr. Forth: Information on the number of self-employed in the northern region is available only on a quarterly basis up to September 1990. The information is as follows:

Self-employed in Northern Region

	Number
March 1981	83,000
June 1987	108,000
September 1990	114,000

Purchasing and Distribution

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the full annual cost, including overheads, of his Department's purchasing activity.

Mr. Forth: On the latest information available the annual cost of the Department's purchasing activities including overheads is £2·14 million.

This information is taken from the report submitted to the Central Unit on Purchasing for the financial year 1989-90.

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people in his Department are wholly or substantially involved in purchasing stores and distribution activities.

Mr. Forth: On the latest information available the Department has 111 people wholly involved full time in purchasing stores and distribution services.

Accurate figures for staff who are substantially involved in these activities are not available.

This information is taken from the report submitted to the central unit on purchasing for the financial year 1989-90.

Restart Courses

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) whether an unemployed person who has been required to attend a restart course and fails to do so, or fails to complete the course, is entitled to a copy of the mandatory attendance at restart courses form RC3, which is completed by the claimant adviser; whether they can refuse to sign the RC3 if they disagree with what the claimant adviser has written down as their reason for non-attendance; and if he will make a statement;

(2) whether, after two years unemployment, an unemployed person who is on a waiting list for either (a) an employment training place, or (b) any other education or training course, or (c) waiting to start on the enterprise allowance scheme or (d) waiting for a place on a jobclub would be recognised as having good cause for not participating in a compulsory restart course; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the employment service executive agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred these questions for reply.

Value for Money

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures of performance are employed by his Department to ensure value for money.

Mr. Jackson: My Department has a wide range of performance indicators designed to measure value for money. The recently published departmental report lists the performance indicators used in the Employment Department group and includes specific sections on value for money initiatives and the cost effective use of resources. A copy has been placed in the House of Commons Library. Each part of the group identifies annual efficiency gains of at least one and a half per cent. of running costs. In 1989-90 the total gain across the group was £30 million, more than 3 per cent. of running costs.

Power Station Emissions

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the emissions of particles contaminated with legionella feeli and E. coli organisms from power station cooling towers.

Mr. Forth: No definitive data on the microbiological emissions in the drift from power station cooling towers have been produced in the United Kingdom. However, I am not aware of any epidemiological evidence for cases of human disease associated with the emission of these or any other organisms from such towers.

Employment Service

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will give details of his policy with respect to access by disabled people to employment service facilities;

(2) if he will make arrangements to allow for access by people with disabilities to the employment service office at Malton, North Yorkshire; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what account he takes of travel distance and available transport systems in making a decision to approve closures of jobcentres in rural areas;

(4) what special measures he takes to ensure access to, and information about, jobcentre services in dispersed rural areas;

(5) if he will introduce five-day working at the employment service's office at Malton, North Yorkshire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the employment service executive agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred these questions for reply.

Training

Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will make a statement on the representations he has received from Mr. T. L. Cox, on behalf of the Leicestershire employment training managers' forum, dated 26 February; what reply he has sent; and what specific training arrangements he envisages for ethnic minority groups or disadvantaged persons.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. and learned Friend has received the letter from Mr. T. L. Cox on behalf of the Leicestershire employment training managers forum dated 26 February 1991. I will reply to Mr. Cox shortly.

The Leicestershire training and enterprise council (TEC) will have responsibility for specific training arrangements including training for those with special needs when it becomes operational from 1 April 1991. The TEC's plans will have to include an assessment of those needs and a description of how the TEC intends to meet them.

Disablement Resettlement Officers

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what response he intends to make to the Employment Committee's recommendation in its first report of Session 1990-91 that the number of disablement resettlement officers and the resources made available for their work should be the subject of a Government review.

Mr. Jackson: In its report, the Employment Committee said that it would draw attention to various particular concerns which it expected the Government to address when considering the response to the consultative document "Employment and Training for People with Disabilities". My right hon. and learned Friend, the Secretary of State, has written to the Chairman of the Committee to express his pleasure at the participation of the Committee in the consultative process, to say that the Committee's comments will be given full consideration along with all others received and to commit himself to keeping the Committee informed on progress on all the issues they raised. We are still considering the responses to the consultative document.

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when the budget for the Devon and Cornwall TEC in youth training will be notified; what is the reason for the delay; by how much it will be above or below the total for the previous year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson [holding answer 11 March 1991]: The contract with Devon and Cornwall TEC is at present subject to negotiation. I will write to the hon. Gentleman when the contract is finalised.

South Glamorgan TEC

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment on what date his director of field operations first contacted the chairman of South Glamorgan TEC concerning the procedure for carrying out the construction of the new TEC headquarters.

Mr. Jackson [pursuant to his reply, 26 February 1991]: I regret that the information given in my reply of 26 February at column 480 was incorrect.

The first contact took place on 7 December 1990 and was in the form of a telephone conversation.

HEALTH

Food Safety

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list (a) companies, (b) trade associations, (c) individuals and (d) other organisations (i) who have submitted written evidence and (ii) whom his Department has met in relation to his Department's draft food hygience training consultation document issued in relation to the Food Safety Act 1990.

Mr. Dorrell: A list of organisations that responded to the consultation document has been placed in the Library. Seven individual members of the public also responded.

Representatives of the Department have discussed proposals on hygiene training for food handlers with outside bodies on numerous occasions.

St. Paul's Hospital, Liverpool

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) whether he will meet a delegation from the community health councils for central and southern Liverpool, the rector of Liverpool parish church, and a cross-party group of hon. Members and local councillors to discuss the future of St. Paul's hospital, Liverpool;

(2) what representations he has received from the rector of Liverpool parish church concerning St. Paul's eye hospital; and if he will publish his response.

Mr. Dorrell: We have received from Canon Frayling a copy of the submission he made to Liverpool health authority. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has written to him explaining that under the procedure for consultation it would not be appropriate to comment while the matter is still under consideration by the Liverpool health authority and the Mersey regional health authority. For the same reason it would not be appropriate for my right hon. Friend to meet a delegation at this stage.

Maternity Services

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he issues any guidance about (a) the number of midwives and (b) the number of other staff required for the adequate staffing of an ante-natal clinic.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: No. This is a matter for local management. Staffing levels are likely to vary depending upon the type of service that is provided locally and the catchment areas which clinics serve.

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research has been done on the use of epidural anaesthesia in childbirth, other than caesarean deliveries, relating to (a) maternal satisfaction, (b) percentage requiring forceps deliveries, (c) effect on babies' sucking ability and (d) any other matters.

Mr. Dorrell: The Department has provided core funding to the national perinatal epidemiology unit in Oxford since 1978. Since its inception, the unit has been conducting a systematic assessment of evidence about the effectiveness and safety of perinatal care. This has involved conducting a systematic review of controlled trials in overviews (meta-analyses) which culminated in the publication in 1989 of "Effective Care in Pregnancy and Childbirth" (Oxford University Press) part of which reviews the evidence relating to epidural anaesthesia, a copy is available in the Library.

In addition, the Department has provided part-funding to a confidential enquiry into pain relief in labour undertaken by the National Birthday Trust in June 1990 and has also funded research on the postpartum consequences of epidural anaesthesia as part of a programme of work on postnatal maternal health at the health care research centre, University of Birmingham.

We do not keep a central register of research funded by other agencies.

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which research projects relating to ante-natal care have been funded by the Government in the last 10 years; and what information he has on other ante-natal research projects which have been undertaken in that period.

Mr. Dorrell: The Department has funded numerous projects on antenatal care in the last decade. It has provided core funding to the national perinatal epidemiology unit in Oxford since 1978. The unit undertakes a wide programme of research including surveys and other studies using observational data, randomised controlled trials and syntheses of the results of research evaluating the effects of care. The unit has produced nearly 500 publications, of which probably more than half relate to care during pregnancy. The Department has also funded a midwifery research initiative based at the unit since February 1988.

The Department does not keep a central register of research on specific topics funded by other Government Departments or their agents.

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether any health authority now maintains a flying squad for use in connection with home confinements.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: All health authorities must ensure that they have satisfactory arrangements for an immediate response to any obstetric emergency occurring outside hospital.

Child Care

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the number of workplaces for civil servants in his Department; what proportion of the total number have an on-site nursery facility; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide a holiday play scheme; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide after-school child care facilities; what charges are made for use of any facility; what the net cost has been for the provision of these facilities; and what estimate he can make of any future expenditure.

Mr. Dorrell: The Department has 46 work places. The majority of staff are based in London at the Elephant and Castle and in Westminster. A holiday play scheme which has been run at the Elephant and Castle since 1989 is now part of a wider Westminster holiday play scheme. No after-school care facilities and, at present, no on-site nursery facilities are provided. The Department has arranged seven places at a private day nursery in the Elephant and Castle area. Plans for further child care provision include a 25-place nursery as part of redevelopment at the Elephant and Castle, and a 30-place nursery at Quarry house, Leeds.

The Department subsidises the costs of both holiday play scheme and nursery places. Current costs to parents are: play scheme: £10 annual registration fee and a daily charge of £5; nursery places: £50 per week. The subsidy for the play scheme in 1989 was approximately £4,200 in 1990, £4,600 and in 1991 it is estimated at £5,200. The departmental contribution to nursery places for 1991 is estimated at £24,000. The Department has a provisional child care budget for 1991-92 of £82,000.

Children's Eye Services, Liverpool

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many children's ophthalmic beds are currently provided in Liverpool, and at what hospitals; and what proposals have been made to alter these arrangements.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact Michael Emberton, the chairman of the Liverpool health authority, for details.

Caring Occupations

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the member states of the European Community which operate a system of registration for employees involved in caring occupations.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Information on registration systems for the health care professions is currently being collated by the European Commission from data provided by member states. We do not anticipate full details being available before 1992.

Traffic Casualties

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received about section 155 of the Road Traffic Act 1972; and if he will consider bringing forward proposals to annul that section of the Act.

Mr. Dorrell: The provisions of section 155 of the Road Traffic Act 1972 were consolidated into section 158 of the Road Traffic Act 1988. Representations about this section of the Act are received from time to time from, among others, hon. Members, motoring organisations and the public. The Government are on record that they intend to abolish the right of hospitals (but not general practitioners) to collect the emergency treatment fee, when a suitable legislative vehicle becomes available.

Health Service Staff

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he has made any analysis of the relative change in remuneration of health service ancillary staff as compared with medical, nursing and other groups of staff;

(2) if he has any plans to bring the pay of health service ancillary staff into line with other public sector groups.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The pay and conditions of service of National Health Service ancillary staff are matters for negotiation in the ancillary staffs Whitley council. Comparisons with the pay of other staff groups in the national health service and elsewhere are a factor in the negotiations along with others including affordability. Management's objective is to enable adequate staff of the requisite calibre to be recruited, motivated and retained locally.

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many national health service doctors and nurses were employed in the Northern region in 1980 and 1990.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The available information is given in the tables.

Hospital and community health service medical staff in the Northern region at 30 September each year

Year	Whole time equivalent (WTE)
1980	2,431·1
1981	2,484·5
1989	2,801·3

The information for 1990 is not yet available. Figures include permanent paid, honorary and locum staff.

NHS staff in post at 30 September each year

Year	Nursing and midwifery[1] WTE[2]
1980	[3]25,170
1981	26,210
1989	27,800

Information for 1990 is not yet available. The figure for 1981 is shown because of the reduction in nurses working hours—see foot note [3].

Source: Department of Health (SM13) Annual Consensus of NHS Non-Medical Manpower.

[1] Includes agency staff.

[2] All figures are independently rounded to the nearest ten WTE.

[3] Figures not adjusted to take account of the reduction in nurses working hours during 1980-81 (from 40 to 37·5 hours per week).

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will institute a study of the cost to the health service of high rates of turnover amongst ancillary staff and of the level of stress thereby imposed on nurses through an increased work load.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Turnover rates among ancillary staff vary substantially in different parts of the country. It is for local management to determine staffing requirements and to deal with the consequences of any high rate of turnover.

Patients (Safety)

Mr. Hill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what instructions are given to regional health authorities concerning the danger of foreign objects being left in patients; and what safety checks are obligatory;

(2) what is the procedure to recall patients for abdominal x-ray to ascertain the position of clips not extracted during operations;

(3) what is the procedure to warn patients after operations that clips are still in the patient.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This is a matter for the professions concerned. Guidelines are provided in "Theatre Safeguards" published by the Medical Defence Union, the Medical Protection Society, the Medical and Dental Defence Union of Scotland, the Royal College of Nursing and the National Association of Theatre Nurses, a copy of which will be placed in the Library.

Ashworth Hospital

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether any video cameras have been installed at Ashworth hospital for the purpose of monitoring patients.

Mr. Dorrell: Video cameras are used solely for monitoring the movement of patients in the hospital grounds and for security surveillance of visitors entering and leaving the hospital. There are no cameras installed in the ward areas.

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to institute an independent public inquiry into events at Ashworth hospital; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The chief executive of the Special Hospitals Service Authority stated on 5 March that there would be a full and searching inquiry into the incidents described in the programme "A Special Hospital". We are in touch with the authority about the form the inquiry should take. An announcement will be made as soon as this has been decided.

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he proposes to take so as to ensure that the seclusion rooms at Ashworth hospital are properly monitored by service staff at all times.

Mr. Dorrell: The Special Hospitals Service Authority informs me that it has reviewed and revised its policies relating to seclusion. The new policies take account of the guidance in the code of practice under section 118 of the Mental Health Act 1983 which the Department issued in 1990, and have been discussed with the Mental Health Act Commission. They include stricter criteria for observing patients in seclusion. The new policies are now in operation together with formal arrangements for monitoring their effectiveness. The authority has agreed with the Commission to keep this matter under review.

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will obtain a copy of the film, "A Special Hospital" shown on Channel 4 on 4 March, for his departmental library.

Mr. Dorrell: We already have a recording of this broadcast.

Cancer Screening

Dame Jill Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the countries which have a structured breast screening programme similar to that introduced by Her Majesty's Government.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The United Kingdom was the first country in the European Community to introduce a nationwide breast screening programme.

The Netherlands, Finland and Sweden have policies and national screening programmes similar to those introduced in the United Kingdom.

Within Europe several countries have now decided to introduce screening, as have Australia, New Zealand and several provinces in Canada.

Capital Projects

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he will list the major capital projects commenced in the northern region in each year since 1987, together with the cost of each.

Mr. Dorrell: According to central information, the capital schemes costing over £1 million commenced in northern region since 1 January 1987 are as follows:

Year commenced and scheme		Tender cost £ million
1987	South Shields General Scheme 3/1	12·2
1987	St. Georges Hospital Boilerhouse	1·2
1987	Westmoreland DGH Scheme 1/1	15·6
1988	Darlington Memorial Maternity Department	1·1
1988	Hartlepool DGH Scheme 3/2	4·4
1988	Newcastle General (Phsychological Medicine)	1·8
1988	Royal Victoria Infirmary Scheme 1/5	23·3
1988	South Cleveland General Scheme 2/1A	1·3
1988	South Cleveland—Hemlington Brokerage	2·6
1989	Bensham ESMI Day Unit	1·6
1989	Hartlepool DGH Maternity Department.	1·8
1989	Tynemouth Vic. Jubilee Inf. EMI Wards	1·4
1989	Wansbeck General Hospital Scheme 1/1	21·1
1989	Westmoreland DGH Scheme 1/2 Residencies	1·0
1990	Shotley Bridge Psychiatric/Psychogeriatric	1·1
1990	West Cumberland—Refurbishment Phase 2	2·2

Public Health Laboratory

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his plans to charge environmental health departments for statutory tests at the public health laboratory.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) on 1 March 1991 at column 633.

Sterilisation

Mr. Hill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many female sterilisation operations are carried out in the national health service per year; and how many claims for compensation are made.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: In 1988-89, the latest year for which figures are available, an estimated 91,100 female sterilisation operations were carried out in the NHS in England. Information about the number of compensation claims is not collected centrally.

Project 2000

Mrs. Golding: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action is being taken to up-rate the bursaries paid to student nurses under the Project 2000 scheme.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We are continuing to keep bursary levels under review in the light of recruitment and retention trends and the current earning power of existing student nurses.

Emergency Alarms

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for health what joint funding is available to enable health authorities and others to purchase emergency alarm systems for elderly and disabled people.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Decisions on joint funding are for health authorities to take at local level.

Transplant Service

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made to establish the United Kingdom tranplant service as a special health authority.

Mr. Dorrell: Regulations to establish the new authority, with effect from 1 April 1991, were laid before Parliament on 8 March 1991.

I am pleased to confirm that Dr. John Evans, previously a deputy chief medical officer and administrative deputy secretary in the former Department of Health and Social Security, has accepted an invitation to be chairman of the new authority, which will be known as the United Kingdom Transplant Support Service Authority (UKTSSA).

The members of the authority will be:

Professor Peter Morris, Nuffield Professor of Surgery at the Radcliffe Infirmary, Oxford, with an international reputation in the transplant world;

Professor Richard Batchelor, Professor of Immunology at the Royal Postgraduate Medical School, Hammersmith Hospital, who has been a major figure in the development of transplantation immunity;

Mr. Trevor Rippington, an ex-regional treasurer of South-West Regional Health Authority, and

Mr. John Thornton, business manager for Praxis plc of Bath.

The new authority will, for the time being, be based at the Southmead hospital in Bristol which is currently the location of the United Kingdom transplant service.

I hope that these new arrangements will facilitate improvement of the United Kingdom's already excellent record on organ transplantation. We have around 8,000 patients with a functioning kidney graft.

In 1989, 1,732 cadaveric kidney transplants were performed in the United Kingdom; 295 heart transplants, and a similar number of liver transplants. A further 94 heart/lung transplants were carried out.

Transplantation of organs has been one of the great medical advances of the last 25 years. Operations not long ago considered to be in the realm of fantasy are today a matter of routine.

The Government are totally committed to the organ transplant programme, and increasing the supply of donor organs for transplantation is one of our priorities.

Achondroplasia

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his reply of 5 March, Official Report, column 119, if he will list the number of hospitals providing facilities for the treatment of achondroplasia.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not collected centrally. Local health authorities are responsible for determining what services to make available for this condition, in the light of their assessment of local needs and priorities, as against resources.

Dental Practice Board

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what official arrangements are made to protect the confidentiality of information concerning dental patients sent by dentists to the Dental Practice Board; and whether he will make a statement;

(2) what communications he has received from the General Dental Practitioners Association regarding the activities of the Dental Practice Board; and whether he will make a statement;

(3) what statutory authority has been used by the Dental Practice Board in connection with home visits by officials of the Dental Practice Board.

Mr. Dorrell: Apart from the board's being subject to the Data Protection Act 1984, any member of the Dental Practice Board's staff who breaches confidentiality may be subject to disciplinary action. The secretary of the General Dental Practitioners Association wrote to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 25 February 1991 about home visits to patients. Such inquiries are made by the board in the course of referring a matter to a Family Health Services Authority for investigation. Home visits to patients are only undertaken when the board has reason to believe that there has been non-compliance with the regulations governing the provision of general dental services.

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many home visits on the initiative of the Dental Practice Board have been made to dental patients during the last six months; for what purposes; and with how many dental practitioners involved;

(2) how many cases of fraud or other malpractice have been discovered by the Dental Practice Board following home visits by their officials;

(3) what criteria are used by the Dental Practice Board in deciding whether to initiate home visits to dental patients;

(4) what has been the total cost of the visits by Dental Practice Board Officials to dental patients during the last 12 months.

Mr. Dorrell: In the last six months 85 home visits by members of the boards investigation staff have been carried out, involving eight dental practitioners, in cases where the board had reason to believe that there had been non-compliance with the regulations governing the provision of general dental services. In the past 12 months there have been 312 patient interviews involving 17 practitioners. The police have been consulted in connection with four of these cases and their inquiries are continuing. Seven dentists, including two of the four involved in police inquiries, have been referred to the Dental Service Committee of the relevant family health services authority. In the case of nine dentists the Dental Practice Board's inquiries are continuing and one case has been dropped. The cost of home visits over the past year is estimated at £3,500.

Social Services

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the expenditure per head of population for each social service authority in 1990-91 and, adjusted for the change in input unit costs, in 1979-80.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is given in the table.

Drugs

Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what was the drugs bill in family health services in the last financial year;

(2) what was the drugs bill for the national health service per head of population (a) in 1989-90 and (b) in the current financial year.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Expenditure by the family health services for drugs in England in 1989-90 was £1,942 million. The 1989-90 cost per head of population of all NHS drugs (including drugs in the hospital and community health services) was £49·40. A comparable figure is not yet available for the current financial year.

Abortion

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in which hospitals and medical centres in the United Kingdom clinical trials of the abortificient drug RU486 have been carried out; over what periods those tests were conducted; how many women were involved; and how the tests were funded.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Under the terms of section 118 of the Medicines Act and for reasons of commercial confidentiality, the Licensing Authority is forbidden from disclosing information on clinical trials.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Holohoax

Mr. Janner: To ask the Attorney-General what consideration has been given by the Director of Public Prosecutions to initiating proceedings in respect of the publication entitled Holohoax distributed by the Gentile Awareness League.

The Attorney-General: The Director of Public Prosecutions has received two complaints concerning the publication entitled Holohoax. He has referred these complaints to the Metropolitan police, but at this stage the police are not in a position to submit a file to him for his consideration.

TRANSPORT

Road Building

262. Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will list major road building projects supported by his Department in the Northern region in each year since 1987, together with the cost of each.

Mr. Chope: The major trunk schemes completed or under construction for each year since 1987 are as follows:

		Cost £ million

Litter

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer to the hon Member for Rugby and Kenilworth of 7 March, if he will give details of the litter collection that has so far taken place on motorways and the number of miles of motorway that have been cleared.

Mr. Chope: Under present arrangements, litter is cleared from England's 1,600 miles of motorway at least once per year and more often on stretches which are particularly prone to littering. In difficult and dangerous locations such as the central reservation, litter clearance is carried out in association with other maintenance activities, where possible, in order to minimise traffic disruption and delays.

In 1989-90 the Department of Transport mounted a £1 million campaign to put an extra effort into clearing motoways and trunk roads to complement the work of the Tidy Britain Group. In the current financial year resources for litter clearing on motorways have been doubled to some £3 million.

Goods Vehicles

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many articulated vehicles plated at a train weight exceeding 31 tonnes and licensed as private light goods are specified as authorised vehicles in standard international licences issued to United Kingdom operators under the Goods Vehicles (Operators' Licences, Qualifications and Fees) Regulation 1984; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Licensing of a heavy goods vehicle at the light goods vehicle rate is permitted when the vehicle is not being used to carry goods for hire or reward or in connection with a trade or business. Operator licensing does not apply to such vehicles.

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what evidence he has of United Kingdom articulated vehicles registered as private/light goods operating for hire or reward at their plated weights in EC member states; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: I am aware of the concerns of the Road Haulage Association in this respect.

The Department does not collect data on vehicle excise duty paid by United Kingdom vehicles used in other EC member states. Bilateral agreements with other EC states, and the treaty of Rome, provide for exemption from VED for temporarily imported vehicles registered in other EC states.

It would be an offence for a vehicle registered in the United Kingdom to operate in this country for hire or reward while licensed at less than the appropriate rate of VED. Spot checks on vehicles returning from abroad are carried out periodically.

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if, in enforcing EC controls on the operation of United Kingdom registered goods vehicles, he will (a) require certificates of private/light goods status for heavy goods vehicles from their operators, (b) make a false declaration of such status an offence and (c) require all articulated vehicles to be registered in accordance with their plated train weight; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Vehicles are licensed in the United Kingdom on the basis of a declaration by the applicant stating the use to which the vehicle will be put. It is an offence knowingly to make a false or materially misleading statement in an application for a vehicle licence. And it is the responsibility of the keeper to relicense the vehicle in the appropriate tax class should the use of the vehicle be changed during the period of a licence

When registering a goods vehicle the applicant must state the vehicle's gross weight. If, after registration, this changes the applicant is required to notify the licensing authority.

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many articulated vehicles plated at a train weight exceeding 31 tonnes are registered in the United Kingdom under the Road Vehicles (Registration and Licensing) Regulation 1971 as private/light goods vehicles and thus pay vehicle excise duty at an annual rate of £100 only; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: DVLA records show 827 such vehicles licensed in the private and light goods tax class. Application for a vehicle licence is based on a declaration by the keeper as to the intended use of the vehicle. It is an offence knowingly to make a false or materially misleading declaration in an application for a vehicle licence.

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will consult foreign Governments to arrange for information on illegal operations by United Kingdom based goods vehicles operating abroad to be passed on to the licensing authorities in the United Kingdom for any action by them; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will seek the co-operation of other EC member states to inform him and where practicable to prosecute, under their national law, users of United Kingdom registered vehicles operating in contravention of EC rules; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: EC regulations and the United Kingdom's bilateral agreements with other countries already provide for Governments to notify each other of infringements of laws by the other party's road hauliers.

This information is passed to the traffic commissioners, who are responsible for drivers' and operators' licences and who may consider taking disciplinary action in addition to any prosecutions or other action undertaken by the foreign authorities.

Anti-fouling Paint

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to include the details of the anti-fouling paint in use as part of the information which harbour masters are entitled to call for before permitting a ship to dock.

Mr. McLoughlin: The International Maritime Organisation has recommended that release rates of harmful compounds in anti-fouling paints should be controlled, that standard means of measuring this should be developed and, more generally, that the effectiveness of control measures should be monitored. However, there is no evidence that the anti-fouling paints on ocean-going vessels significantly affect aquatic life and, except in dry-docking operations, no controls are planned at present.

ENERGY

Power Stations

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what consideration he has given to the need to make available to new entrants to the industry, sites with an established use for electricity generation which are redundant or no longer in use and which are currently owned by electricity generating companies.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Schedule 3 to the Electricity Act 1989 provides for the compulsory acquisition of land by electricity licence holders for licence-related purposes.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will issue a direction to require generating companies holding land on which are redundant, closed or demolished power stations to release that land where requested to prospective new entrants to the generating industry at a price to be agreed by an independent agency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I have no such power. The disposal of land held by generating companies is a matter for their commercial judgment, subject to the compulsory purchase provisions in schedule 3 to the Electricity Act 1989.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what is the number and total area in hectares of sites in the ownership of (a) National Power and (b) PowerGen on which electricity generation activity has ceased and which are being retained by those companies;

(2) how much land which has at any time been used for electricity generation but which is not being used for power generation purposes is held by (a) National Power and (b) PowerGen in Warwickshire.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: These are commercial matters for each company.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many closed power station sites there are in Warwickshire; and what is the present ownership and status of each of these sites.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: As far as my Department is aware, there is only one former power station site in Warwickshire. Details of the ownership and status of that site are commercial matters for the company concerned.

Nuclear Power

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what recent representations he has recieved from Nuclear Electric relating to the decommissioning of nuclear power stations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My officials have a regular dialogue with Nuclear Electric covering a wide range of matters relating to their operations. I understand that the company is reviewing its decommissioning strategy and is keeping my officials informed.

Electricity Privatisation

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many employees subscribed for shares in the privatisation of the electricity distribution companies.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: About 84,000 employees and 21,000 pensioners of the 12 regional electricity companies, the National Grid Company and the Electricity Association applied for and received shares. Between them they were allocated almost 160 million shares, representing about 7·4 per cent. of the total equity of the 12 regional electricity companies.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Sunbeam Nursery, Croydon

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the level of charges payable by part-time staff using the Sunbeam day nursery in Croydon; and what is the level of subsidy provided by Government Departments for part-time employees.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Part-time staff using the Sunbeam nursery in Croydon pay £12·50 per day. The level of subsidy provided by Departments for part-time and full-time employees is £5·78 per day.

Child Care, Croydon

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will provide the latest estimates of the total number of employees who may be eligible to take up the child care services provided by the Sunbeam day nursery in Croydon broken down by (a) gender and (b) part-time or full-time employees.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Information is not available in the form requested. Every civil servant of either sex working full or part-time for one of the Government Departments[1] which have established the Sunbeam nursery in Croydon is eligible to use the child care facilities the nursery provides.

[1]Home Office, Lord Chancellor's Department, Property Services Agency, Department of Social Security, Land Registry, Department of Employment and Customs and Excise.

Deportation

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to make a decision regarding the deportation order against Mr. Hazem Ali Hassan, a constituent of the hon. Member for Sunderland, South.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. Friend has decided not to proceed with deportation action against Mr. Hassan and he was released from detention on 8 March.

Racist Literature

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what international co-operation there is on the suppression of racist and anti-semitic literature.

Mrs. Rumbold: I am not aware of any specific consideration given in any international group to such literature.

Speeding Offences

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 1 March, Official Report, column 647, in what form information concerning prosecutions for speeding offences is kept.

Mr. John Patten: Statistics for offences relating to motor vehicles are published annually in a Home Office statistical bulletin, with more detailed figures given in the companion volume of supplementary tables. The most recent bulletin, issue number 34/90, includes statistics for 1989. A copy of these publications is in the Library.

The statistics are broken down into 25 offence groups; speed limit offences are covered by offence group 16.

Fire Service

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set out by rank the annual pay rates of all grades of fire officer and retained fire officer, and what are the arrangements for the payment of pensions.

Mr. John Patten: The Home Office has no formal involvement in fire service pay negotiations; the following information has been obtained from the National Joint Council for Local Authorities' Fire Brigades.

The annual pay rates of chief fire officers are determined at the discretion of the employing authority, but are normally determined in relation to the population within the brigade area. The following table gives details of population ranges and corresponding salary ranges:

Annual pay rates for Chief Fire Officers by population range.

Population range	Salary range		Higher maximum for metropolitan brigades[1]
	Minimum £	Maximum £	£
Up to 240,000	34,689	46,854
240,001 to 360,000	35,592	48,741
360,001 to 460,000	36,885	50,631
460,001 to 600,000	38,259	51,909
600,001 to 760,000	39,651	53,754

940,001 to 1,200,000	41,676	57,570	60,186
1,200,001 to 1,700,000	43,713	58,890	61,566
1,700,001 to 2,300,000	45,123	60,654	63,411
2,300,001 and over	46,668	62,421	65,259
London	53,670	71,784	75,048

[1] At the discretion of the employing authority.

The annual pay rates for assistant chief officers except those appointed as deputy chief fire officers, are determined in the same way as those for chief fire officers. The salary ranges are set at 75 per cent. of those for chief fire officers for the equivalent population ranges, subject to an underpinning minimum of £34,428. Salary ranges for those appointed as deputy chief fire officers are set at 80 per cent. of those for chief fire officers for the equivalent population ranges, subject to an underpinning minimum of £35,205.

The annual rates of whole-time ranks from firefighter up to senior divisional officer are set out in the following table:

Annual pay rates of wholetime ranks: Firefighter up to and including Senior Divisional Officer

Rank	Minimum £	Maximum £
Senior Divisional Officer	26,085	[1]28,143
Divisional Officer I	24,234	[1]25,977
Divisional Officer II	21,942	[1]24,321
Divisional Officer III	20,664	[1]22,152
Assistant Divisional Officer	19,290	[1]21,090
Station Officer	18,300	[1]19,740
Sub-officer	15,777	17,016
Leading firefighter	15,390	16,020
Firefighter	11,313	[2]15,009

Notes:

[1]Ranks at Station Officer and above may attract a flexible duty supplement of 20 per cent.

[2]Subject to being fully qualified.

The annual retainers for retained firefighters are set out in the following table:

Annual retainers for retained firefighters

Rank	One to three years' service £	More than three years' service £
Station Officer and above	1,716	1,944
Sub-officer	[1]1,413	[1]1,521
Leading firefighter	1,371	1,413
Firefighter	1,257	1,371

[1]Enhanced payments are made to Sub-officers in charge of fire stations. In addition, retained firefighters are paid fees for attendance at incidents, attendance at drill nights and extra duties. Retained firefighters are also eligible for payments under the long service bounty scheme.

The arrangements for the payments of pensions are as follows. Whole-time firefighters are pensioned under an unfunded statutory scheme, the provisions of which are administered locally by fire authorities. Members contribute 10·75 per cent. of their basic pay towards the cost of their benefits. The balance is met by the employing authorities, supported through the revenue support grant system. Retained firefighters qualify for payments in respect of injury benefits in certain circumstances, but are otherwise not involved in the occupational scheme.

Metropolitan Police

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average time that an applicant to join the Metropolitan police special constabulary has to wait from the time of application to their acceptance.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: It takes on average three months to process such applications.

Iraqis

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Iraqis and other nationals were taken into custody in Scotland in connection with events in the Gulf; and for how long each was detained.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Nineteen Iraqis were served with notices of intention to deport and taken into custody on 17 January in Scotland following the outbreak of hostilities in the Gulf. Three were released on 23 January when they made voluntary departure from the United Kingdom. One was released on 7 February, one on 13 February, two on 19 February and 12 on 8 March. No other nationals were detained in Scotland in connection with events in the Gulf.

Probation Service

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will make a statement on the future of the probation service in Wales;

(2) what plans he has to put parts of the probation service out to tender in Wales.

Mr. John Patten: Decisions on the future organisation of the probation service in England and Wales are being considered in the light of responses to the Green Paper, "Supervision and Punishment in the Community" (Cm. 966) and an announcement will be made as soon as possible. We are consulting the probation service and the independent sector throughout England and Wales about how best they can work together in dealing with offenders in the community, and will make an announcement on these issues in due course.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) 28 February, Official Report, column 571, what is his estimate of the cost of poll tax proceedings in each clerkship in the period 1 April to 31 December 1990; if he will undertake to place such information for each quarter in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost, since the cost of proceedings varies from court to court according to local circumstances. It is, however, estimated that community charge enforcement proceedings in the period to 31 December 1990 cost overall in the region of £7 million.

Bomb Hoaxes

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has now reviewed the maximum penalties for bomb hoaxes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: A bomb hoax is an irresponsible waste of other people's time and effort, which can cause massive disruption and endanger lives by making it more difficult to identify and to respond to genuine warnings. Eighty-four hoax calls were received in the 24 hours following the Paddington and Victoria bombs on Monday 18 February and 789 by 3 March.

We have now concluded the review of maximum penalties for this offence announced by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State during Report stage of the Criminal Justice Bill, Official Report, 25 February 1991, column 689.

We shall table an amendment to the Criminal Justice Bill proposing to increase a magistrate's power to imprison a person found guilty of a bomb hoax from three months to a maximum of six months. We also propose to increase the maximum penalty from five to seven years in prison if the case goes to the Crown court. This is a clear indication of the seriousness with which we view this offence.

Asylum

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of applications for asylum in the United Kingdom made in each month of 1990, showing the number of applications by country.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 12 March 1991]: Reliable monthly estimates of the number of applications for asylum in the United Kingdom in 1990 cannot yet be made, but provisional indications are that the total in 1990 was of the order of 30,000, including associated dependants. This figure does not include applications for upgrading to refugee status by those previously granted exceptional leave.

Estimates for 1990 will be published as usual in the annual Home Office statistical bulletin "Refugee Statistics, United Kingdom" later this year.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total number of people who applied for political asylum in 1990; what was the number from each country; what was the number who were new arrivals in the United Kingdom; and what was the number who had already entered the United Kingdom in previous years.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 12 March 1991]: Reliable estimates of the number of applications for asylum in the United Kingdom in 1990 by nationality are not yet fully available. However, provisional indications are that the total number was of the order of 30,000, including associated dependants, comprising about 12,000 applications made on entry at ports and an estimated 18,000 applications made after their arrival in the United Kingdom. These figures do not include applications for upgrading to refugee status by those previously granted exceptional leave.

Estimates for 1990 by nationality will be published as usual in the annual Home Office statistical bulletin "Refugee Statistics, United Kingdom" later this year.

Iraqi Nationals

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Iraqi nationals have entered the United Kingdom since 1 January; how many have been refused entry; and how many have been deported.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 12 March 1991]: Since 1 January six Iraqi nationals have been removed from the United Kingdom under deportation powers. A further eight Iraqi passengers were removed in January after being refused leave to enter the United Kingdom. Information on admissions since 1 January and on passengers removed since 1 February is not yet available centrally.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any Community-wide procedures have yet been adopted for the validation of new animal scientific procedures or the validation of new products.

Mr. Forth: I have been asked to reply.

The European Community has no standard validation procedures for new animal scientific procedures. It has adopted animal scientific procedures for the testing of chemical substances which have been validated under the auspices of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development. The Community's National Co-ordination Committee for testing methods oversees all testing methods.

The sixth amendment to the European Community's dangerous substances directive established a notification scheme for new chemical substances which entails the collection and scrutiny of data on such substances.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Expenditure, Northern Region

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much was spent per pupil in the Northern region in (a) current expenditure and (b) capital in 1980 and 1990.

Mr. Fallon: In 1979-80 local education authorities in the Northern region spent an average of £530 per pupil on current school-based expenditure and £40 per pupil on capital expenditure. These figures were £1,380 and £55 per pupil respectively in 1988-89, the latest year for which data are available.

Free School Meals

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what guidance and advice he gives to local education authorities on the provision of free school meals in primary and secondary maintained schools; and if he plans any changes in such guidance and advice.

Mr. Fallon: My right hon. and learned Friend has issued no guidance on the provision of free school meals. It is for each local education authority to secure that such refreshment as it deems necessary is made available free of charge in the middle of the day to pupils whose parents are in receipt of income support.

Student Allowances

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much money has been paid to local education authorities to reimburse them for expenditure on vacation hardship allowances; and how many students have benefited in each of the last five years including the current year to date.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Local education authorities in England and Wales currently have a discretionary power under the Education (Mandatory Awards) Regulations 1990 to pay a means-tested allowance of up to £53·50 a week during a vacation to students on designated courses who would, in the authority's opinion, otherwise suffer undue hardship. Since 1 April 1990, authorities' expenditure on mandatory awards has been reimbursed by 100 per cent. grant from my right hon. and learned Friend. Lower rates applied in earlier years.

Authorities' expenditure on the allowance and the number of students in receipt of it from 1986-87 onwards are given in the table. Figures are not yet available for either 1989-90 or the current year and, in the latter case, are likely to be affected by the improved arrangements for student support.

Academic year	Number of students	Value of allowances (£)
1988-89	305	40,837
1987-88	322	47,706
1986-87	288	36,425

Access Funds

Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what resources will be available for the access funds in 1991-92.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The sum of £25·8 million will be available for the access funds in Great Britain for the 1991-92 academic year.

My Department's share will be £23·01 million. This sum is being allocated between the three funds as shown in the table.

	£ million
Undergraduate fund	13·10
Postgraduate fund	5·74
Further Education fund	4·17

NORTHERN IRELAND

Social Security

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the number of beneficiaries who received (a) attendance allowance, (b) invalid care allowance, (c) severe disablement allowance, (d) mobility allowance, (e) income support, (f) one-parent benefit, (g) family credit, (h) housing benefit, (i) community care grant, (j) budget loans and (k) crisis loans during the year 1989-90.

Mr. Hanley: The average numbers receiving these benefits at any one time during the year 1989-90 was as follows:

	Number
Attendance Allowance	31,600
Invalid Care Allowance	7,000
Severe Disablement Allowance	12,900
Mobility Allowance	14,100
Income Support	188,800
One-Parent Benefit	22,600
Family Credit	14,700
Housing Benefit
Rent Rebate	108,000
Rent Allowance	21,000
Rates Rebate	107,100

In addition there were 52,066 budgeting loans, 21,057 crisis loans and 28,883 community care grants from the social fund.
Note: Beneficiaries may be receiving more than one benefit at any one time

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the number of beneficiaries who received (a) unemployment benefit, (b) sickness benefit, (c) statutory sick pay, (d) invalidity benefit, (e) industrial disablement benefit, (f) industrial death benefit and (g) non-contributory retirement benefit during the year 1989-90.

Mr. Hanley: The average numbers receiving these benefits at any one time during the year 1989-90 was as follows:—

	Numbers
Unemployment Benefit	17,100
Sickness Benefit	9,600
Invalidity Benefit	49,100
Industrial Disablement Benefit	5,700
Industrial Death Benefit	1,000
Non-contributory Retirement Benefit	3,200

Statutory sick pay is paid by employers and no information is available about number of recipients.
Note: Beneficiaries may be receiving more than one benefit at any one time.

Pensioners

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many Northern Ireland citizens were in receipt of old-age pension during January and February; and how many such pensioners received cold weather payments during these months.

Mr. Hanley: At 31 March 1990, the latest date for which figures are available, 215,604 people were receiving retirement pension and non-contributory retirement pension. Up to 28 February 1991, 30,897 cold weather payments were made in respect of the period 1 to 14 February to people getting income support including pensioners.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Arms Purchases

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the percentage of gross domestic product spent on arms by countries who are recipients of aid from the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Chalker: The information requested by the hon. Member is not available in a comprehensive or consistent form. The hon. Member will be aware of the work of the Swedish International Peace Research Institute and the International Institute for Strategic Studies, and may wish to refer to the latter's publication, "The Military Balance 1989-90", which is available from the Library of the House.

Iraq

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer of 28 February, Official Report, column 582-83, from which departmental budget the £8·1 million of assistance via the EC will be paid; and from which budget the £3 million of aid referred to in the answer to the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), Official Report, 18 February, column 54, will be paid.

Mrs. Chalker: The £8·1 million assistance provided through the European Community will be attributed to the overseas aid programme.

Of the £3 million emergency assistance, £2·5 million was contributed to the International Committee of the Red Cross from class II, vote 2, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (other external relations), and £0·5 million to the United Nations Disaster Relief Organisation from the Overseas Development Agency's 1990-91 humanitarian assistance budget.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to give humanitarian assistance to Iraq and Kuwait, and from which budget this will be paid; and what plans he has to give reconstruction aid to Kuwait and from which budget this will be paid.

Mrs. Chalker: A multi-agency United Nations mission is currently in Iraq to assess humanitarian needs. It will make recommendations to the Secretary-General on emergency actions the United Nations might take. We will consider responding to any subsequent appeal for funding launched by the Secretary-General.

We have no plans at present to provide humanitarian assistance for Kuwait, but we do expect to assist in the process of reconstruction. Financing it will be a matter for the Government of Kuwait.

Angola

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has concerning the United Nations programme for humanitarian relief in Angola; and what representations he has made to the Government of Angola, and to United Nations' representatives regarding the resumption of the United Nations special relief programme for Angola.

Mrs. Chalker: The United Nations special relief programme was suspended by the Angolan Government on 21 December. We urged the Angolan Government to reinstate the programme without delay and welcome their announcement on 11 March that it is to restart.

ENVIRONMENT

Widowers' Pensions

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on what date he intends to introduce regulations to allow local authorities to meet in full their obligations to pay widowers' pensions.

Mr. Key: Draft regulations, including new widowers' benefits and other proposals, were circulated on 28 December 1990 to local authorities in England and Wales and to other interested parties. The consultation period ended on 15 February and consideration is now being given to the responses. Subject to the necessary parliamentary procedures, the regulations will come into force as soon as possible.

Regeneration Programmes

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the programmes prepared by his Department to help local authorities who have schemes to regenerate decaying areas of their authority commencing in the year 1991-92; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: My Department supports a wide range of programmes promoting the regeneration of inner-city areas and treatment of dereliction. These are:

	1991-92 resources[1] £ million
Urban Programme[2]	243·2
City Grants	66·0
Derelict Land Grant[2]	75·5
Urban Development Corporations	473·1
City Action Teams	8·1
Estate Action Programme[2]	268·0

[1] Central Government provision.
[2] Resourced jointly with local authorities.

Housing renewal programmes, enterprise zones, garden festivals and the Department's inner cities and urban land research programmes also contribute to regeneration.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice he has given to local authorities who wish to invest capital receipts in a regeneration programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: Local authorities are free to invest the usable part of their capital receipts as they wish, including in projects to promote regeneration.

Uniform Business Rate

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many appeals have been lodged in the north-west area against the uniform business rate.

Mr. Portillo: The 12 valuation offices in the north-west have received 68,316 proposals by ratepayers to alter their 1990 rating assessments.

Local Authority Accounts

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many London boroughs have failed to produce audited accounts since April 1985; and for which years.

Mr. Key: The information requested is listed in the table.

The latest year for which audited accounts could be available is 1989-90.

The reasons for late completion of audited accounts vary and may not be within the control of the borough concerned.

Authority	Audits outstanding from stated year to date
Hackney	1984-85
Brent	1985-86
Islington	1985-86
Haringey	1985-86
Lambeth	1985-86
Southwark	1985-86
Hammersmith	1986-87
Hounslow	1986-87
Richmond	1986-87
Waltham Forest	1986-87
Camden	1987-88
Greenwich	1987-88
Lewisham	1987-88
Westminster	1987-88
Bromley	1988-89
Bexley	1988-89
Croydon	[1]1988-89
Ealing	1988-89
Merton	1988-89
Newham	1988-89
Kensington	1988-89
Redbridge	1988-89
Sutton	1988-89
Tower Hamlets	1988-89
Barnet	1989-90
Harrow	1989-90
Kingston	1989-90

[1] Only.

Northern Region

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much has been spent by his Department in revitalising the urban and inner-city areas of the Northern region since June 1987.

Mr. Key: The total sum spent by my Department from 1987-88 to 1990-91 in the nine designated urban areas of the Northern region is almost £396 million. This significant level of assistance has been provided via a range of initiatives geared to regenerate the inner cities and includes expenditure incurred by the Tyne and Wear and Teesside urban development corporations.

Waste Disposal

Dr. Hampson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the progress made on the drafting of the planning policy guidance on waste disposal since his response to the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale (Sir F. Montgomery) on 30 January, Official Report, column 1087; and when he expects publication.

Mr. Yeo: I have nothing to add at this stage to what my hon. Friend said on 30 January; new guidance will be issued in draft for public consultation later this year.

Dr. Hampson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance he currently gives local planning authorities on the siting of municipal waste incinerators; and if he has any plans to change this advice.

Mr. Yeo: The Government have not issued any planning guidance on the siting of municipal waste incinerators. However, work is in hand on the preparation of a planning policy guidance note on pollution and waste management which we plan to issue in draft for public consultation later this year. One of the issues on which we shall consult is the need for guidance on the siting of incinerators.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the level of Government grant per poll tax payer for 1991-92 in (a) Newcastle-upon-Tyne, (b) Gateshead, and (c) Wandsworth.

Mr. Key: Government grants, consisting of revenue support grant, special grants, specific grants in aggregate external finance, community charge benefit grant and transitional relief grant, are per head of relevant population in 1990-91, £579 in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, £415 in Gateshead, and £677 in Wandsworth.

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the level of Government grant for 1990-91 per head of population in (a) the London borough of Wandsworth, (b) Bolsover district council and (c) North-East Derbyshire district council.

Mr. Key: Government grants, consisting of revenue support grant, special grants, specific grants in aggregate external finance, community charge benefit grant and transitional relief grant, are per head of relevant population in 1990-91, £667 in Wandsworth, £196 in Bolsover, and £197 in North-East Derbyshire.

Mr. Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much Government grant per poll tax payer will be received by (a) Wolverhampton and (b) Wandsworth for 1991-92.

Mr. Key: Government grants, consisting of revenue support grant, special grants, specific grants in aggregate external finance, community charge benefit grant and transitional relief grant, are per head of relevant population in 1990-91 £609 in Wolverhampton and £677 in Wandsworth.

Stocken Hall, Rutland

Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment upon what dates since April 1988 inspectors from the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission visited Stocken hall, Rutland, to inspect the condition of the buildings; what similar visits have been paid by officials from his Department since April 1989; and what action has subsequently been taken.

Sir George Young: An inspector from the Historic Buildings and Monuments Commission last visited Stocken hall in January 1990. No visits have been made by officials from my Department since April 1989.

The hall was sold in October 1990 and the owner subsequently received planning permission to convert it into offices, subject to an agreement with Rutland district council which will ensure the complete restoration of the hall. As work has started and the future of the building is secure no action has been taken by my Department.

Community Charge

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list each of the orders relating to the administration of the community charge which were laid before the House between 1 January 1990 and 31 March 1990 for implementation during April 1990; and if he will state the date when each of these instruments became effective.

Mr. Key: The following statutory instruments were laid before the House of Commons between 1 January 1990 and 31 March 1990:

The Personal Community Charge (Relief) (England) Regulations 1990 No. 2
[Came into force 21 January 1990]
The Relevant Population (England) Regulations 1990 No. 68
[Came into force 24 January 1990]
The Charging Authorities (Notification of Population to Precepting Authorities) (England) Regulations 1990 No. 69
[Came into force 24 January 1990]
The Levying Bodies (General) Regulations 1990 No. 70
[Came into force 24 January 1990]
The Internal Drainage Boards (Finance) Regulations 1990 No. 72
[Came into force 24 January 1990]
The Standard Community Charge (Multipliers) Order 1990 No. 129
[Came into force 26 January 1990]
The Community Charges (Co-owners) Regulations 1990 No. 146
[Came into force 26 February 1990]
The Community Charges and Non-Domestic Rating (Demand Notices) (England) Regulations 1990 No. 156
[Came into force 7 February 1990]
The Standard Community Charge and Non-Domestic Rating (Definition of Domestic Property) Order 1990 No. 162
[Came into force 2 March 1990]
The Wimbledon and Putney Commons (Special Levies) Regulations 1990 No. 201
[Came into force 7 February 1990]
The Community Charges and Non-Domestic Rating (Demand Notices) (England) (Amendment) Regulations 1990 No. 366
[Came into force 2 March 1990]
The Community Charges and Non-Domestic Rating (Demand Notices) (City of London) Regulations 1990 No. 369
[Came into force 7 March 1990]
The Personal Community Charge (Relief) (England) (Amendment) Regulations 1990 No. 402
[Came into force 26 March 1990]
The Personal Community Charge (Exemption for the Severely Mentally Impaired) Order 1990 No. 462
[Came into force 1 April 1990]
The Community Charges (Deductions from Income Support) (No. 2) Regulations 1990 No. 545
[Came into force 1 April 1990]
The Community Charges (Administration and Enforcement) (Amendment) Regulations 1990 No. 711
[Came into force 1 April 1990]
The Personal Community Charge (Qualifying Courses of Education) Regulations 1990 No. 712
[Came into force 1 April 1990]

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many different instruments of legislation concerning the administration of the community charge were introduced less than four months before the beginning of the present financial year; and what assessment he has made of the impact on the responsible local authority of the late issue of regulations.

Mr. Key: Seventeen statutory instruments were introduced in the three months preceding the beginning of the present financial year. Substantial effort was put into informing local authorities of forthcoming measures including the sending of circular letters and draft regulations where appropriate. The local authority associations were kept informed of progress through regular meetings with my officials.

Leeds Development Corporation

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when work on the Leeds development corporation's proposed Centre Gate development at the junction of Meadow lane and Great Wilson street, Leeds will commence.

Mr. Key: The developers of the Centre Gate site, Hyperion Properties plc, are working on scheme details. The timetable for implementing the development is dependent on a range of factors including finalising site assembly, stopping up of existing roads and detailed planning permission. A commencement date for work to begin on site is therefore not yet available.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the policies adopted by the Leeds development corporation towards further office development in the Leeds city centre area.

Mr. Key: Leeds development corporation is working with Leeds city council and Leeds City Development Company on a range of schemes which will further the role of Leeds as a business and financial centre. There are particular opportunities for new office development between Leeds city station and the junction of the M1/M621 motorways and on other land adjacent to the Leeds waterways.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the city grants schemes supported by the Leeds development corporation.

Mr. Key: Leeds development corporation is supporting the following schemes with city grant assistance:

Consultant Development Engineering Ltd., Hunslet provision of new factory and offices.

Yorkshire Design Services Ltd., The Malt House, Chadwick Street—conversion to offices.

A Way of Life Ltd., 42 The Calls—conversion to hotel and conference facilities.

Fletcher Properties Ltd., 53 The Calls—conversion to offices.

Speciality Shops Development Ltd., The White Cloth Hall, Crown Street—conversion to retail and cafe/restaurant space.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list by value (a) the site and property improvement grants, (b) community sponsorship grants and (c) environmental improvement grants issued by the Leeds development corporation.

Mr. Key: Leeds development corporation has approved for grant payment the following amounts under these programmes:

(a) Site and property improvement grants—£127,000.
(b) Community sponsorship grants—£23,000.
(c) Environmental improvement grants—£158,000.

Greening Street Playing Field

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he now expects to approve the disposal of the Greening street, SE2 playing field by the London residuary body to the London borough of Greenwich.

Mr. Yeo [holding answer 8 March 1991]: After the information being sought from the London residuary body has been received.

Lambeth Council

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the current level of bank borrowing by Lambeth council which is for the purpose of financing current expenditure.

Mr. Key [holding answer 11 March 1991]: The Department has no information on bank borrowing by Lambeth for the purpose of financing current expenditure. However, according to the latest return provided by Lambeth to the Department, the authority had no outstanding temporary borrowing from the banking sector as at 31 December 1990. Temporary borrowing is the only form of borrowing by which current expenditure may be financed.

Private Rented Houses

Mr. Ridley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the number of privately-owned rented houses in 1979 and 1989, respectively.

Mr. Heseltine [holding answer 12 March 1991]: Information about the number of dwellings rented privately, or with a job or business, as at December 1979 and December 1989 is shown in table 9.3 of "Housing and Construction Statistics 1979-1989". A copy of this publication is in the Library.

Right-to-Buy Scheme

Mr. Ridley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the latest figure for the number of houses sold under the right-to-buy scheme.

Mr. Heseltine [holding answer 12 March 1991]: Between October 1980 and December 1990 over 1 million tenants purchased their homes from local authorities in England under the right-to-buy legislation.

Housing Statistics

Mr. Ridley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the number of households in council housing in 1979 and 1990, respectively; and what was the number of owner-occupied homes in 1979 and 1990, respectively.

Mr. Heseltine [holding answer 12 March 1991]: The information derived from the general household survey is as follows:

England: households (million)

	LA/NT tenants	Owner-occupied
1979	5·4	9·1 (9·0)
1989	4·2	12·5 (13·3)

Note: figures in brackets are number of owner-occupied dwellings.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what criteria are taken into consideration and what procedures are followed in the designation of new sites of special scientific interest.

Mr. Heseltine [pursuant to the answer, 20 February 1991, Official Report, column 171]: I have today published a consultation paper on planning controls over sites of special scientific interest with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

The Government are firmly committed to the conservation of the natural heritage. Sites of special scientific interest are a key part of the nature conservation framework, and we wish to ensure that their value is taken fully into account in the operation of the town and country planning system.

The paper proposes the following additional safeguards for sites of special scientific interest in England and Wales:

- Withdrawal of permitted development rights for certain temporary recreational uses of land;
- An amplification of my policy on calling in planning application;
- Additional advice on environmental assessment;
- A new requirement for local planning authorities to consult the Nature Conservancy Council about planning applications adjacent to sites of special scientific interest.

Comments on the paper, which is available from my Department, are invited by 17 May.

Local Government Finance

Mrs. Currie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what capping criteria he will adopt; which authorities will be designated by these criteria; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: My right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State announced on 31 October 1990 the provisional capping criteria which he intended to adopt. He made clear that authorities should not assume that there would be a de minimis proviso allowing authorities whose budgets were excessive by only a small amount not to be designated. On the information available to us it appears that the following 17 authorities have set budgets which would be excessive, or represent an excessive increase over the previous year, under those criteria:

Barnsley, Basildon, Berkshire, Bristol, Doncaster, Greenwich, Ipswich, Lambeth, Lanbaurgh-on-Tees, Middlesbrough, Milton Keynes, Norwich, Reading, Somerset, Stoke-on-Trent, Warwickshire and Wirral.

As I said in answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) on 5 March at columns 101-02 it is clearly a matter of concern where authorities have decided to budget at levels which under the intended criteria are excessive or represent an excessive increase: it remains open to such authorities to adopt substitute lower budgets if they so wish.

Our present intention is to apply the criteria which my right hon. Friend announced. This is necessarily provisional. We are now looking at local authorities' budgets and when we have completed our consideration of these budgets and all other appropriate matters my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will take his statutory capping decisions. He intends to do so as soon as practicable.

THE ARTS

Arts Bodies (Restructuring)

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will ensure that in any restructuring of the Arts Council or the regional arts boards the fullest consultation takes place with all sections of the organisation and in particular the employees and that a minimum of 14 days' consultation period is provided in all cases.

Mr. Renton [holding answer 11 March 1991]: The Arts Council and the regional funding bodies are responsible for their own arrangements for consultation on matters affecting staff interests. I understand that all the funding bodies have well-established general arrangements which comfortably exceed the minimum period suggested by my hon. Friend for consultation on the staffing implications of the restructuring of arts funding.

Arts Funding

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Minister for the Arts what future arrangements for the funding of the arts have been made; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton [holding answer 11 March 1991]: I announced my decisions on the future direction of the structural reforms of arts funding to the House on 19 December 1990, Official Report, columns 300-11.

CIVIL SERVICE

Next Steps

Dr. Marek: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service if he will make a statement about the interdepartmental review of residual functions set up by the Prime Minister's efficiency unit to look at what responsibilities will be left for Departments once the "next steps" proposals are fully implemented.

Mr. Renton [holding answer 7 March 1991]: The terms of reference of the efficiency unit's interdepartmental study into the relationships between Departments and their agencies were published in the Governments's response (Cm1263) to the Treasury and Civil Service Committee's most recent report on the "next steps" initiative. The unit is due to complete its work in the course of this month.

WALES

Badgers

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has concerning the number of badgers and the current number of active badger setts in Wales; how many such setts have been destroyed during the last three years; and for what reasons.

Mr. David Hunt: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Environment and Countryside on 7 March, column 242-43.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he has taken during the last five years to ensure the protection of the badger population and active badger setts in Wales from damaging forestry operations.

Mr. David Hunt: Badger setts are not on the whole vulnerable to damage from forestry operations, since they are characteristically large, subterranean and in well-drained soils. The Forestry Commission nevertheless endeavours to locate all the badger setts on its land so that they can be protected from any possible damage. It has also published forest nature conservation guidelines, for use by its own forest managers and those in the private sector, which emphasise the importance of good management in protecting animal populations.

Public Health Laboratory Service

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he is proposing to introduce charges in respect of food samples submitted by local authorities to the public health laboratory service for analysis; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: At present laboratories of the public health laboratory service in Wales analyse a limited number of food samples for local authorities free of charge. There are plans to put this arrangement on to a contractual basis, with contracts specifying charges for any work which may be required above an agreed minimum. Such charges will reflect the costs to the laboratories of undertaking work above the agreed level.

Small and Medium-sized Businesses

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what further steps he intends to take to help small and medium-sized businesses in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: Small and medium-sized businesses will be further assisted in Wales by a range of enterprise support policies and initiatives. Last month, I was pleased to launch three new schemes. These were as follows:

The Manufacturing Planning and Implementation Scheme (MPI)

Small and medium-sized companies—up to 500 employees—will be able to obtain grants of up to £50,000 to cover half the costs of hiring external expertise necessary to assist them during the planning and implementation stages of new manufacturing projects so that the firms can introduce modern manufacturing systems.

Small and medium sized enterprises technical advice service (SMETAS)

SMETAS will enable small and medium-sized enterprises to obtain easy access to a broad range of local expertise, such as regional technical centres—RTCs, higher and further education institutions and industry—in order to help them solve immediate problems concerned with the application and use of technology. The scheme will be operated and managed by RTCs initially with financial help from the DTI. The Polytechnic of Wales at Pontypridd will be running the scheme in Wales.

Support for products under research (SPUR)

SPUR is designed to help companies with less than 500 employees develop new products and processes which involve a significant technological advance.

Projects of at least £50,000 eligible costs and of between six months and three years' duration may attract grants of 30 per cent. up to a maximum of £150,000.

In addition, small and medium-sized businesses will continue to be assisted through general economic policies at a national level, existing national enterprise support policies and through initiatives which are unique to Wales. These include:

Enterprise Wales

"Enterprise Wales" was set up in January 1988 to promote the range of Government assistance to businesses in Wales. This assistance is aimed at continuing growth, development and diversity within the Welsh economy and is particularly aimed at small and medium-sized companies and new businesses. Since its launch, thousands of Welsh businesses have used the various services available in the package, which includes assistance or advice on exporting, the single European market, grant schemes, training, research and development and the consultancy initiatives. It is the programme in Wales for delivery of the enterprise initiative.

Export initiative

My Department continues to help existing and potential exporters to enter new markets overseas. Since March 1990 454 companies have been counselled at their request. A further 372 companies have attended seminars provided under the export initative. A programme of trade missions continues, representatives of 24 companies based in Wales were taken to France in October and 29 will go to Italy this month. Further trade missions are planned for next year.

Regional Selective Assistance and Regional Enterprise Grants

RSA is available to help businesses with their investment projects in any sector of commerce or industry in development or intermediate areas. Since 1988, 416 small businesses have accepted offers of RSA totalling nearly £35 million.

REG are available to new and expanding businesses in development areas. Since 1988 667 small businesses have accepted offers of REG totalling over £5·8 million.

Both schemes are being vigorously promoted and funding is available to help eligible projects in future years.

Training and Enterprise Councils (TECs)

TECs will take over responsibility for the small firms service from 1 April 1991. The TECs will integrate the business advice and counselling services with their other enterprise roles to provide a cohesive local service. Six TECs are now operational and the Powys TEC will start operations on 2 April.

WDA/DBRW

Both the development agencies will continue to offer an extensive range of help and advice to small and medium-sized businesses. Last November I announced the provision of additional public resources to the DBRW of £1 million for each of the next three years. This will enable them to commence their special rural action programme which will expand on the good work of the current Western Initiative and is aimed at spreading the business prosperity and confidence that has developed on the eastern side of the board's territory to the deeper, more remote rural areas throughout the region.

Both the DBRW and the WDA make available a grant for local enterprise agencies in Wales. There are now 24 enterprise agencies the operational areas of which cover virtually the whole of the Principality. Small businesses in both urban and rural areas will continue to be able to receive free confidential advice from the agencies, as well as advice on finances, training courses and workspace.

Child Care

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the number of workplaces for civil servants in his Department; what proportion of the total number have an on-site nursery facility; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide a holiday play scheme; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide after-school child care facilities; what charges are made for use of any facility; what the net cost has been for the provision of these facilities; and what estimate he can make of any future expenditure.

Mr. David Hunt: Civil servants in my Department work in 30 separate locations, with the majority of workplaces in Cardiff.

None of the workplaces has an on-site nursery. My Department, with other Government Departments, is working to provide nursery facilities for Cardiff-based staff later this year. Charges have not yet been fixed.

Staff in Cardiff have access to a holiday playscheme run by my Department in conjunction with others during the easter and summer school holidays. Staff in the Welsh Office, London can use the Westminster holiday playscheme organised by the Cabinet Office.

Daily charges for the Cardiff playscheme are £4·50 for the first child, £4·00 for the second and £3·75 for others. The net cost met by Departments in 1991 is £1,500: in addition, administrative support is provided by the Welsh Office.

My Department does not arrange after-school care for the children of staff.

Expenditure on child care next financial year is expected to be around £30,000.

Unemployment

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to reduce unemployment in Cardiganshire and Dyfed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: My Department and other Government agencies operate a wide range of measures aimed at combating unemployment. Dyfed has benefited from a number of these and, since 1988, has secured some 2,500 new jobs.

The Welsh Office and associated bodies will continue to respond swiftly to any opportunities that arise which have the potential to reduce unemployment.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales which hospitals in Wales have now expressed an interest in trust status; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Following the submission of its expression of interest, Pembrokeshire health authority has been invited to prepare an application to become an NHS trust. Over the coming months I expect that other health service units in Wales will similarly express their interest in self-governing status.

Children in Care

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many children in each of the Welsh counties were taken into care in each year since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The information is shown in the following tables:

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will list on a county basis in Wales the location of incinerators used for the disposal of BSE cows; if he will list those counties where there are no such facilities; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will list on a county basis in Wales the number of BSE confirmed cows which were (a) incinerated and (b) buried in 1990 and the most recent figures for 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: The movement of carcases of suspect BSE cattle for incineration or burial is carried out on an England and Wales basis; it is not restricted by county boundaries. There are at present two incinerators in Wales used to handle such carcases, in Clwyd and Dyfed. During 1990, 1,268 carcases were incinerated in Wales and five were buried. Figures for the first quarter of 1991 are not yet available.

Departmental Failure

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the failures of his Department since 1987.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 8 March 1991]: I am satisfied that my Department has made good progress in pursuit of all its major objectives and I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer) today.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the average domestic rate bill in each local authority in Wales which would be necessary to yield the same revenue as his estimated net yield of the community charge in 1990-91 and 1991-92.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett [holding answer 12 March 1991]: The estimated average domestic rate bill for each Welsh district authority required to give the same yield as the community charge in 1990-91 is given in the following table.

Information about community charges set and the consequent yield for 1991-92 is not yet available to the Department.

Government Achievements

Sir Anthony Meyer: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the principal achievements of the Government in Wales since June 1987.

Mr. David Hunt [holding answer 6 March 1991]:

Economic Developments

Employment in Wales reached a record level of 1,236,000 in June 1990 having increased by 15·2 per cent., from 1,073,000 in June 1987.

Reduced seasonally adjusted unemployment in Wales was reduced by 35·5 per cent., from 148,000 in June 1987 to 96,000 in January 1991.

Since 1 June 1987, a total of 411 inward investment projects have been secured for Wales reaching a record level last year. The projects promised over 46,000 new and safeguarded jobs and £2·5 billion of investment. Among the largest projects are those announced by Ford, Bosch, TSB, Toyota, National Provident Institution and British Airways.

Projects that have been helped include Bosch's £100 million project at Miskin which is expected to create more than 1,200 jobs and the British Airways aircraft maintenance project at Cardiff (Wales) airport, which is also expected to create over 1,200 jobs and provide a centre of excellence with a trained and highly skilled work force. Substantial assistance has also been provided from the regional development grant scheme which closed to new application on 31 March 1988.

Since the Cardiff Bay development corporation was established in 1987 to regenerate the former commercial centre of the city the Government have made available, or have announced, over £190 million in grant in aid to enable it to carry out its task. To date, the corporation has acquired over 600 acres of land; agreed a major redevelopment programme with the biggest private sector landowner in its area; made available a prestigious 120 acre site for business, industrial and leisure-related development, successfully relocated 60 companies within its area and undertaken a large number of infrastructure, environmental and community schemes, including agreement to a substantial contribution to the costs of the Butetown link road.

Government Programmes

Seven training and enterprise councils covering the whole of Wales have now been established.

In March 1990 a co-operation agreement was signed with Baden-Wurttemberg, one of Germany's most dynamic regions. This is providing many opportunities for Wales to benefit from industrial collaboration, inward investment and joint research.

Financial incentive schemes for industrial development and expansion have played an important role in stimulating investment, creating jobs and improving the economy of Wales. In the period since June 1987, 651 offers of regional selective assistance worth over £242 million have been accepted. Associated investment is over £2·12 billion, and nearly 35,000 new and over 11,800 safeguarded jobs are forecast to stem from this investment.

At £160 million, the Welsh Development Agency's budget for 1991-92 will be the highest ever in both cash and real terms and is well over double the 1986-87 level in cash terms.

Since 1987 the Department has committed nearly £99 million, at today's prices, to the land reclamation programme in Wales, one of the largest and most sustained programmes in Europe which will see the eradication of almost all visually intrusive dereliction by the mid-1990s. The 1990-91 budget at £24·5 million will enable work to progress on over 1,800 acres of derelict land.

Expenditure on the WDA's property development activities has also more than doubled. This has resulted in the provision of over 1 million sq ft of new factory floorspace in each of the last three years, capable of accommodating up to 9,000 jobs each year. Over the same period, the private sector has also provided 715,000 sq ft of development on agency sites.

Since April 1987, urban development grant and its successor, urban investment grant, totalling £21·5 million has been approved in respect of 52 schemes. This is associated with some £87·7 million of private investment and is expected to create a total of some 3,500 permanent and 1,600 temporary jobs. In addition, around 700 residential units will be provided. In the same period £107·8 million has been allocated under the urban programme. Resources for 1991-92 total £37·9 million; this represents a 64 per cent. increase over the 1987-88 provision.

In June 1988, my right hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Walker) launched a three-year programme of action designed to improve economic, environmental and social conditions in the south Wales valleys and in July 1989, a two-year extension of the programme was announced. On 10 December 1990, I announced an extra focus, shifting the emphasis to people and community-based activities while continuing the main elements of the programme. Expenditure on key activities involving the promotion of investment, the creation of jobs and environmental improvement in the valleys is expected to take some £800 million over five years.

Grants totalling £2·2 million have been offered to 60 winning companies under the small firms merit award for research and technology scheme.

European regional development fund (ERDF) assistance to Wales has amounted to some £108 million since 1987.

A £33 million national programme of community interest (NPCI) for Mid Glamorgan has already been successfully completed and a £108 million NPCI for Dyfed, Gwynedd and Powys was approved in 1988. Two further programmes for industrial south Wales and Clwyd were approved in 1989 and 1990 respectively and are now being implemented. The industrial south Wales programme is worth £70 million, including a transfer of some £11 million from the original amount approved for the Dyfed, Gwynedd, Powys programme, and the Clwyd programme is worth £23 million.

A RECHAR programme of over £18 million for the south Wales areas affected by the decline in the coal mining industry is currently awaiting approval from the European Commission.

A two-year enterprise and education initiative, launched in May 1988, established a network of eight advisers operating within LEA boundaries, the advisers' prime objective being to encourage their local business communities to create new or develop existing links with local educational establishments to ensure that every year 10 per cent. of teachers have the opportunity to gain some experience of the world of business; and that every young person has at least two or more weeks of work experience suited to his or her ability and needs before leaving school. The adviser contracts expire on 31 March next. They have already exceeded the targets set and have generated 20,701 pupil work experience and 2,078 teacher placements—148 per cent. and 156 per cent. of their respective targets.

Over £2 million has been made available as grant aid to support village halls and community centre projects.

Amgueddfa'r Gogledd, Llanberis was formally opened by the Minister of State on 14 May 1990. The national museum of Wales spent £704,000 on capital works. The museum is grant-aided by the Welsh Office.

On 1 January 1988 the designated Cambrian mountains environmentally sensitive area was extended by some 80,000 hectares and some 39,700 hectares of the Lleyn peninsula was designated as an ESA.

The scheme aims to promote the co-existence of conservation and efficient farming in areas of national environmental significance perceived to be at risk from increasingly intensive methods of production.

Grants totalling some £2·75 million have been awarded to firms in Wales for the marketing and processing of agricultural produce.

The reform of the sheepmeat regime agreed at the July 1989 Agriculture Council represented a good deal for Welsh sheep producers. The new regime provides them with a clear basis for the future and improves their competitive position with their continental counterparts and prospects for exporting.

In 1989 the Department took full advantage of devaluation of the green pound and paid the suckler cow premium at the highest permissible rate, including the maximum top-up from national funds. As a result, the rate was increased from £33·40 to £47·43 per cow, or 42 per cent. This was worth £7·7 million to producers in Wales in the 1989-90 scheme year. Furthermore, the rate for producers in the less favoured areas has been increased for 1990-91 to £51·69 in recognition of the special difficulties faced by producers raising calves or stores for further finishing in the recent marketing period.

The 1991 rates of payment were increased on average by 14 per cent., representing an additional £4·8 million to Welsh LFA producers and raising the full-year total hill livestock compensatory allowances expenditure in Wales to around £37 million.

EC approval to extend LFA in Wales by 9,300 hectares was obtained in December 1990.

Enfranchisement of the people of Caldey island has been provided by the Caldey Island Act 1990.

On 20 February I announced at Welsh Grand Committee the provision of £20 million of additional resources for spending in rural Wales. This is in addition to the almost £1 million a day already being spent in rural areas.

Social Policies

The Welsh language now has, for the first time, a firm statutory place in the school curriculum for pupils from 5 to 16 in Wales within the national curriculum.

The national curriculum is being introduced progressively into the schools of Wales: mathematics, science, English, Welsh and technology have already begun; history and geography will be introduced from September 1991 and art, music, physical education and modern foreign languages will follow in 1992.

I have undertaken that the national curriculum should be responsive to the distinctive history and culture of Wales: all NC documentation is being provided in Welsh and English; and separate orders will be made for history and geography in Wales to ensure that children have a proper balance of knowledge about Wales, and about the wider world.

Assessment will form an integral part of the national curriculum. The first national assessment of seven-year-olds at the end of key stage 1 in English, mathematics and science will be introduced at the end of the summer term 1991. Welsh and technology will follow in 1992 and thereafter other subjects and key stages as they are progressively introduced into the national curriculum.

Schemes for the local management of schools were formally approved for each of the LEAs in Wales and came into effect on 1 April 1990.

Figures published in the HMI inspectorate (Wales) review of education provision 1989-90 indicated that the number of school leavers with five or more passes at GCSE grades A to C or equivalent had increased from 26 per cent. to 30 per cent. between 1983-84 and 1989-90, while those with no qualifications had fallen from 18 per cent. to 14 per cent.

The number of students on courses of higher education in the Welsh public sector institutions has risen by 15 per cent. from 14,700 in June 1987 to 16,900 today. During the same period the number of students on courses of initial teacher training in Wales rose by 27 per cent. from 2,621 in 1987 to 3,338.

Some £8·5 million has been made available as grant aid under the voluntary aided schools building programme to support building works at voluntary-aided schools; and £13·1 million has been made available, in specific grants and grants, to local education authorities, educational and other bodies in Wales in direct support for the Welsh language. A further £6·8 million is planned for 1991-92, an increase of over 24 per cent. on the current year.

Over 68,700 home improvement grants schemes for private sector dwellings have been completed since June 1987—with a value of some £220 million. In the same period about £360 million has been spent on the renovation of local authority housing stock. More than 8,300 dwellings have been improved in Wales, under enveloping schemes involving expenditure above £62 million since 1987. Over the first two years of the valleys action programme, 5,400 homes were renovated in area-based renewal schemes—exceeding planned targets by 20 per cent. A new renovation grant regime was introduced in 1990. For the financial year 1990-91, £75 million is available to deal with the associated mandatory home renovation grants, and additional resources will be made available to district councils in Wales should that be necessary. The special funding arrangements will continue in 1991-92.

The priority estates programme has demonstrated the benefits of decentralised housing management that is responsive to the wishes of its customers. It has also put targeted capital resources to very effective use.

The Housing Options Wales (HOW) programme was launched in January 1990 to support improvements in local authority housing management, and to provide new opportunities for tenants' groups. It includes a small grants scheme to fund people and projects developing better service delivery; 17 grants have so far been awarded, including intensive training in customer care for two authorities, and all-Wales schemes designed to support improvements in local authority management performance.

The section 16 grant regime supports education and training in housing management and the development of effective tenant participation.

A new requirement on local authorities for their tenants has been introduced—so supplementing the enhanced rights available to council tenants under the Housing Act 1988.

For housing associations, innovative schemes of mixed funding and flexible tenure have been pursued in Wales. Over the period to 1993-94 and from Tai Cymru's inception in 1989, we plan that the total housing association stock in Wales should increase by over a third. For 1991-92 Tai Cymru's gross provision will amount to a record £117 million, which will be supplemented by additional private sector resources making the total programme worth some £160 million.

Three major hospital developments have been completed since June 1987. These are the Prince Philip hospital, Llanelli, Royal Gwent scheme 6 and a new obstetric unit at Llandough hospital.

Three all-Wales treatment centres have been established: the orthopaedic treatment centre at Prince of Wales hospital, South Glamorgan, the general surgical treatment centre (varicose veins and hernias) at Bridgend general hospital, Mid Glamorgan; and the ophthalmic treatment centre at Ysbyty Gwynedd, Gwynedd. Within the United Kingdom, treatment centres are unique to Wales and intended to offer an effective alternative method of delivering speedier health care to those suffering from key disabling conditions. The record of each centre indicates that this is the case.

Since 1979, in-patient throughput has risen to record levels, with the number of in-patients treated up by 34 per cent; new out-patients treated increased by 28 per cent.

Improvements in regional health services include the upgrading of cardiac facilities for adults and the provision of a new paediatric cardiac unit at the University hospital of Wales; a bone marrow tissue typing laboratory in Cardiff; the provision of three new subsidiary renal dialysis units at Cardiff, Merthyr and Wrexham; the procurement of three linear accelerators for Velindre hospital, Cardiff and Singleton hospital, Swansea; provision of eight computerised tomography scanners at strategic locations throughout Wales; the development of a breast screening service for women in the 60 to 64 age group throughout Wales with site work under way for the relocation of the burns, plastic and maxillo-facial surgery service to a purpose-built unit at Morriston hospital, Swansea from St. Lawrence hospital, Chepstow.

Since 1986-87, resources made available to the national health service in Wales have risen by over 25 per cent. in real terms. The service is now treating more people than ever before.

The successful introduction of general management into the NHS in Wales has been completed, and effective mechanisms for manpower resource planning, training and management have been established.

In 1988 a corporate management programme for the NHS in Wales was published. In December 1990, the programme was updated to reflect the impact of the NHS reforms, and restyled as "NHS Wales: Agenda for Action".

Also in 1988, the Welsh health planning forum was set up. In 1990 the Secretary of State endorsed its statement of "Strategic Intent and Direction for the NHS in Wales".

Substantial progress has continued under the all-Wales strategy for the development of services for people with a mental handicap. There have been significant increases in funding every year, with a record of over £26 million being provided in 1990-91. The number of families receiving regular support at home has expanded considerably and by 1989-90 over 3,000 were doing so.

In June 1989 the mental illness strategy was launched to promote more responsive and locally based services for treating and supporting those suffering from mental illness. Over £2 million is being made available to support new patterns of service in 1990-91.

Significant progress has also been made under the initiative on the care of the elderly in Wales. Over 60 demonstration projects are being supported, a number of which involve partnership between statutory and voluntary sectors. Welsh Office funding of over £2 million is being made available in 1990-91.

Pembrokeshire health authority has been invited to submit a formal application to become the first NHS trust in Wales. NHS trusts are a natural element in the Government's plans for reforming the NHS and improving services to patients.

Nineteen trunk road schemes have been completed since June 1987 totalling some 42 miles. Work is in progress on a further seven schemes comprising about 18 miles. The transport grant settlement will enable work to start on the Pontypool western bypass and the lower valley relief road in 1991-92.

Steps have been taken to simplify and improve the planning system and to speed up its operation, while ensuring that it continues to protect and enhance the environment. There have been reductions in the time taken for handling inspectors' appeals of 14 weeks for inquiries, and five weeks for written representations.

A circular has been issued making it clear that the Welsh language may be a material consideration in planning matters.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Social Fund

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he has any plans to allocate further funds to local office social fund budgets.

Mr. Scott: I am pleased to be able to announce that a further allocation of £1,012,000 was made to 60 local offices at the end of February 1991. This additional money has been distributed to alleviate pressure on the social fund budgets in these offices. Details of the offices concerned and the additional amounts allocated have been placed in the Library.

Cold Weather Payments

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in which newspapers and on what dates the Department's local offices in (a) Strathclyde and (b) Inverclyde advertised the availability of both qualifying conditions and application forms for special cold weather payments.

Mr. Scott: It is important to note that not every local office in the Strathclyde and Inverclyde area will have placed advertisements in the local press since the areas covered by the relevant local newspapers often overlap local office boundaries. Advertisements were also placed in the Scottish national press on six separate occasions between 23 January 1991 and 30 February 1991.

National Insurance

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether Serviscope Ltd., Barnsley, have paid all relevant insurance contributions on behalf of employees; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: I will write to the hon. Member about this matter as soon as possible.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will specify the savings to the Exchequer from the extension of the maximum period of disqualification for full unemployment benefit from six to 13 weeks, as decided in 1986, and from 13 to 26 weeks, as introduced in 1988; and if he will specify the savings in each year since the changes were made and the projected saving in 1991.

Mr. Scott: The estimated benefit savings in the first full year after implementation were £21 million for the 1986 change and £37 million for the 1988 change. Due to the effect of behavioural changes arising from other amendments to unemployment benefit legislation and other economic factors it is not possible to specify savings in later years.

Income Support

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will indicate the savings to the Exchequer from the reduced income support entitlements of 16 to 18-year-olds and of 18 to 25-year-olds; and if he will specify these figures separately and for each year since the changes were introduced and the projected savings 1991.

Mr. Scott: There are no such savings. The estimated expenditure for the first year of income support was based on the previous year's supplementary benefit expenditure. Since 1988 the personal allowances for 16 to 17-year-olds and for 18 to 24-year-olds have been uprated annually and will be increased again from April 1991.

Child Benefit

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost during the financial year 1991-92 of restoring child benefit for all children to its April 1987 value, assuming (a) no corresponding increase in means-tested family benefits and (b) a corresponding increase in allowances for children under income support, family credit housing benefit and community charge benefit.

Mr. Scott [holding answer 21 January 1991]: The estimated cost of restoring child benefit to its April 1987 value assuming no corresponding increase in income-related benefits would be around £775 million. The estimated cost of restoring child benefit to its April 1987 value assuming a corresponding increase in income-related benefit allowances for children would be in excess of £1 billion at 1991-92 prices.

Pensioners' Costs

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has of the average costs incurred weekly by pensioners in the United Kingdom as a whole, and in each of the Scottish and English regions, Wales and Northern Ireland, for (a) heating, (b) lighting and (c) travel; what are the estimated costs for pensioners in these areas over the winter months; and if he will give the figures for each of the last five years.

Mr. Scott [holding answer 19 February 1991]: Information in respect of (a) and (b) is given in the table. Data on travel expenditure and fuel costs for 1986 could be calculated in the manner requested only at disproportionate cost. However, national data on the annual expenditure on travel by retired people is in the family expenditure survey, copies of which are available in the Library.

Notes:

1. The tables are based on data from the Family Expenditure Survey over the last five available years. The values shown are therefore estimates for the population as a whole.
2. Pensioner households are those occupied by one pensioner tax unit, the head of the tax unit is over pensionable age.
3. The regions shown are the standard breakdown, any further disaggregation could not be supported by sample sizes.
4. Information on heating and lighting can not be produced separately.
5. Winter has been defined as the period when the higher fuel bills might have to be paid; the five months from January to May.
6. On some occasions less than 25 households have provided survey information for Northern Ireland, in these cases the values have been omitted.
7. Figures will be affected by the receipt of rebates relating to earlier periods.
8. Figures are in current prices in each year with no adjustment for inflation.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Cosmetology

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the work done to date by the European Community Scientific Committee on Cosmetology.

Mr. Leigh: I am satisfied that the work done to date by the Scientific Committee on Cosmetology has ensured that there is no doubt that ingredients used in cosmetics are safe for use by the public.

Child Care

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the number of workplaces for civil servants in his Department; what proportion of the total number have an on-site nursery facility; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide a holiday play scheme; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide after-school child care facilities; what charges are made for use of any facility; what the net cost has been for the provision of these facilities; and what estimate he can make of any future expenditure.

Mr. Leigh: The Department's staff work at 155 locations which are based mainly within 12 towns and cities in the United Kingdom. None yet has on-site nursery or after-school child care facilities.

This year the Department's staff will have access to jointly organised holiday playschemes in four areas. The details are:

1991

	Expected charge per child per day £	Expected net cost £
Birmingham	[1] 14·00 [2] 23·00	500
Bristol	5·00	100
Cardiff	4·00	Nil
London (Westminster)	5·00	2,000

[1] For first child.
[2] For other children.

Future expenditure will depend upon reviews which are being conducted in a number of locations. New child care facilities will be supported where they can be continued within running cost provisions, and where they offer good value for money. We expect, for example, to provide a DTI-only holiday playscheme in London.

The Department fully recognises the importance of its working mothers, and the need to offer appropriate working conditions. Within a programme of action to increase equality of opportunity for women at all levels we have, for example, introduced flexible working patterns, and a career break scheme which incorporates a right of return to work for up to five years.

Balance of Trade

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the deficit or surplus in manufactured trade between the United States of America and (a) Britain, (b) France and (c) West Germany in each year since 1979.

Mr. Sainsbury: The information is in the table. Figures for 1990 are not available for Germany's and France's trade with the United States of America.

Northern Region

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much has been spent by his Department in supporting regional promotion in the Northern region in each year since 1983.

Mr. Leigh: Grant payments to regional development organisations in the Northern region are shown in the table. Additionally, the DTI has a national promotion and publicity budget from which the region benefits and regional promotion is encouraged through support to various outside bodies and agencies. It is not possible to provide figures for this expenditure on a regional basis.

1986-87	1,068
1987-88	1,108
1988-89	1,135
1989-90	981

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much regional aid has been spent on the Northern region since June 1983; and how many jobs have been created or safeguarded.

Mr. Leigh: Since the beginning of the financial year 1983-84 to end March 1990, £844·1 million was spent by my Department on regional aid in the Northern region. The schemes that contributed to that expenditure were: original and revised regional development grants; regional selective assistance; capital spend by the English Industrial Estates Corporation and, from 1988-89, expenditure under regional enterprise grants.

Over the same period in the Northern region, in gross terms, some 68,000 jobs were created or safeguarded by projects for which offers of regional selective assistance were made and a further 13,000 jobs were created in projects for which payments were made under the revised regional development grants scheme.

In addition, the Government have directly assisted job creation and safeguarding through their inner-city task forces and urban programmes in the region and through the employment measures of the Department of Employment.

Exports

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will set out in the form of a table a list of the value of visible and invisible exports as a percentage of gross national product for each of the member states of the European Community and for Japan and the United States of America; and if he will also show the total value of such exports and the value of exports per head of population.

Mr. Sainsbury: The table shows invisible credits as a percentage of gross national product for each of the member states of the European Community, Japan and the United States of America for 1989.

Information on the value of visible exports, gross national product and population is available in the IMF's "International Financial Statistics", which is held in the House of Commons Library.

British Satellite Broadcasting

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what will be the effect of the proposed multiplexed analogue components directive upon standards developed for British satellite broadcasting, if adopted; what is Her Majesty's Government's attitude to such a directive; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 12 March 1991]: The European Commission is currently consulting interested parties on how to follow up directive 86/529/EEC which imposes the MAC family of standards on high-power direct-to-home satellite broadcasts. This directive expires at the end of 1991. The Government will take a position when the Commission proposals become known. The Government believe in general that any follow-up directive should preserve freedom of choice for present broadcasters and viewers to invest in new technology when the time is right for them. The Government are not in favour of extending an exclusive standard to all satellite transmission.

Export Credits Guarantee Department

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the level of Export Credits Guarantee Department funding of trade between Iraq and the United Kingdom that has been underwritten per year since 1979 and the amount paid by his Department due to default of payment by Iraq; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 12 March 1991]: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave him on 17 October 1990, Official Report, column 837. With regard to the amount paid by ECGD due to payment default by Iraq, it has not been the policy of this or previous Administrations to reveal the level of ECGD claims payments on individual countries.

No Smoking Day

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to support smokers in his Department to give up smoking on the eighth No Smoking Day on 13 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 11 March 1991]: The Department is happy to see a decline in smoking among its staff, and staff may wish to participate in this year's No Smoking Day. We intend to use No Smoking Day in 1992 as part of a rolling programme of health education.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Visitors Taxes

4. Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many states impose either entry or exit taxes on visiting United Kingdom citizens; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I understand that more than 100 states impose taxes, charges or fees on arriving or departing travellers.

South Africa

18. Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what talks he proposes to hold on the question of developments in South Africa.

Mrs. Chalker: The British Government are in frequent touch with the South African Government and all the major parties in South Africa.

We shall continue to encourage a speedy end to apartheid and a peaceful transition to a democratic, non-racial and prosperous South Africa.

25. Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of reform in South Africa.

Mrs. Chalker: The international community is increasingly recognising that the continued application of sanctions will not help the peaceful abolition of apartheid. South Africa's political transformation needs urgently to be underpinned by economic growth. With the political process now irreversible, a point reinforced by the tabling of legislation yesterday, economic sanctions should be lifted as soon as possible.

Middle East

19. Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he intends to hold with the Foreign Minister of Israel regarding a peace settlement in the middle east.

Mr. Hurd: I had constructive and useful talks with the Israeli Foreign Minister on 5 March. We agreed that the reversal of the Iraqi aggression offered some new opportunities to bring peace to the middle east region as a whole.

21. Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the latest situation in the middle east.

Mr. Hurd: Coalition forces suspended hostilities against Iraq on 28 February. Security Council resolution 686 sets out the conditions which Iraq must fulfil for a definitive end to hostilities. We and our coalition partners will continue our efforts to achieve this and to restore peace and security to the area.

Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Government of Israel about the convening of a middle east peace conference to discuss the question of a Palestinian state; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had useful talks about the middle east with the Israeli Foreign Minister on 5 March. We have long supported the idea of a peace conference. But a conference is a mechanism, not an end in itself. It needs to be called at the right moment.

Germany

22. Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the Anglo-German summit on 11 March.

Mr. Garel-Jones: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had excellent talks in Bonn with Chancellor Kohl on 11 March. He and my right hon. Friends, the Secretary of State for Defence, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Minister for Overseas Development also had talks with their opposite numbers. The subjects discussed included the Gulf, the Soviet Union and eastern Europe, and European Community and alliance issues.

Kuwait

26. Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to visit Kuwait.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State hopes to visit Kuwait again before long.

Iraq

27. Mr. Galloway: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current state of diplomatic relations between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Iraq.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Diplomatic relations were broken off by Iraq with effect from 6 February.

33. Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the latest developments in Iraq.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: There are clear indications of serious and widespread popular discontent with the Iraqi regime. It remains to be seen whether those opposed to Saddam Hussein will succeed in their efforts to remove him from power.

Somalia

28. Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the latest information available to him on the situation in Somalia; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: There is no established nationwide authority and insecurity continues. Various clan-based groups control different parts of the country. A meeting to discuss national reconciliation has been called by the self-appointed interim government in Mogadishu for 14 March.

Climate Change

30. Sir Trevor Skeet: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his policy on securing an international convention on climate change.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Negotiations began at the first meeting of the intergovernmental negotiating committee for a framework convention on climate change in Washington last month. The United Kingdom is playing an active role. We hope that the negotiations will lead to agreement by the time of the United Nations conference on environment and development in June 1992 on an effective framework convention containing appropriate commitments, and on related legal instruments.

EC Foreign Policies

31. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next proposes to have discussions with his European Community partners concerning the development of common European foreign policies.

Mr. Garel-Jones: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will attend a special informal meeting of EC Foreign Ministers in Luxembourg on 26 March which will discuss the development of common foreign and security policy.

EC Subsidiarity

32. Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether it is currently proposed that member states or the European Commission should be the arbiter of the principle of subsidiarity.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Views differ on how the principle of subsidiarity should be enshrined in the treaty of Rome. Member states will decide on its definition and enforcement in the context of the political union IGC.

Hong Kong

34. Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next plans to visit Hong Kong.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs hopes to be able to pay a visit to Hong Kong in the near future.

India

35. Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he intends to make to the Indian Government relating to human rights violations in Jammu and Kashmir.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: As I told the House on 14 February, we have urged the Government of India to exercise the greatest restraint in dealing with the terrorist violence in Kashmir and we have regularly made clear our concern that human rights must be respected.

Yugoslavia

36. Mr. Hague: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last visited Yugoslavia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has not yet visited Yugoslavia. My hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs visited Belgrade and Zagreb on 25-28 February. He made clear to federal and republican leaders that we supported the unity and integrity of Yugoslavia. He also called upon the federal and republican Governments to settle their differences by negotiation and reiterated that we would deplore the use or threat of force against democratically elected Governments.

Sri Lanka

37. Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the situation in Sri Lanka.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We deeply regret the continuing violence in Sri Lanka which stems from a decision by the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam to abandon long-running negotiations with the Sri Lankan Government in June 1990 and resume terrorism. We support the Sri Lankan Government in their efforts to overcome the terrorist challenge they face, but at the same time have made clear our concerns that human rights should be fully respected.

Baltic States

38. Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Foreign Ministers of the European Community on the collective response of the Community towards the democratic aspirations of the peoples of the Baltic states.

Mr. Garel-Jones: My right hon. Friend discussed the situation in the Soviet Union at the 4 March Foreign Affairs Council. Community Foreign Ministers called for an early opening of a serious and constructive dialogue between the elected Baltic authorities and the central Government of the Soviet Union. The violence in Latvia and Lithuania in January caused the EC to suspend consideration of technical assistance to the USSR. The Council asked that preparations be resumed. The necessary decisions on the Commission proposal will be taken if the political and economic conditions allow.

Human Rights

Mr. Simon Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's human rights policy in respect of foreign countries.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We continue to develop an active and comprehensive human rights policy. It would not be possible to do it justice in a single document. We have however recently made public as a foreign policy document the guidelines issued to our posts abroad and FCO Departments at the end of last year. I am arranging to place a copy of the document, under the title "Human Rights in Foreign Policy", in the Library of the House.

British Hostages, Beirut

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress towards the release of British hostages in Beirut.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The plight of our citizens held hostage in Lebanon is of constant concern to us. We are determined to secure their freedom. Iran has undertaken publicly to use its humanitarian influence to obtain the release of western hostages in Lebanon. We believe that Iran's influence could be decisive and we have made clear to the Iranian authorities that the prospects for further advances in our bilateral relations depend on the release of the hostages. We are also encouraging Syria to maintain its efforts in this regard.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what response he has received from the Zimbabwean authorities to his request that a copy of the Zimbabwean police report, given to the high commissioner on the murder in Harare of Mr. Brian Angel, a United Kingdom citizen, may be placed in the Library.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have not yet received a reply from the Zimbabwean authorities and are not likely to do so until the judicial process has been completed following the inquest into the death of Mr. Brian Angel on 1 March 1991 in Harare.

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the public inquiry which was held in Zimbabwe on 1 March into the murder of Mr. Brian Angel, a United Kingdom citizen, and place in the Library a transcript of proceedings or any official report or other relevant papers.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: On 1 March 1991 a representative from the British high commission in Harare attended the inquest into the death of Mr. Brian Angel, as an observer.

I am arranging for his account of the proceedings to be placed in the Library of the House.

Jordan

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further reports he has received from the Jordanian Government about damage to Jordanian transport on the Iraq-Jordan highway during the Gulf war.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have received no further reports since my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs answered the hon. Member's earlier question on this subject on 11 February at column 302.

Kurds

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) of 5 February, Official Report, column 82, when Ministers last met representatives of the Kurdish nation.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: My hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs met representatives from a number of Iraqi opposition groups, including a Kurdish representative, on 7 March.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Capital Debt (Write-off)

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing the individual capital debt write-off of industries and undertakings in each of the past 15 years.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is set out in the table. This information relates to national loan fund (NLF) write-offs and consolidated fund (CF) write-offs for nationalised industries and some other public authorities.

Aid (Less Developed Countries)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the size of the British Government debt outstanding with each of the less developed countries of Asia, Africa and South America as at 31 March 1983 and the most recent available date; what are the rates of interest being applied to such debt; what is the interest income from such debt; what this is expressed as a proportion of ODA aid to such countries in the most recent financial year; and what steps the Government have taken or propose to take to write off such debt.

Mr. Maples: The amounts of principal outstanding on British Government ODA-managed loans to developing countries were as follows:

	£ million
	31 March 1983	1 August 1990
Asia, Mediterranean, Pacific	185	144
Africa	186	116
Central and South America, Atlantic and Caribbean	106	170

These figures exclude repayments due from India, for which we have agreed to provide an equivalent amount of local cost aid under our policy or retrospective terms adjustment (RTA). Rates of interest applied to loans have varied; but current policy is to charge 0 per cent. or 1·75 per cent. on new loans.

Total receipts of interest on aid loans in the 1989-1990 financial year were £5·981 million. This represented 2·6 per cent. of United Kingdom bilateral aid to countries with ODA loans outstanding in the same financial year.

The Government have cancelled through their RTA policy the aid debts of 22 of the poorest countries at a total value of around £1 billion, including India; and is ready to consider further such cancellations in appropriate cases.

Employee Share Ownership

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many companies have set up employee share ownership plans on a case law basis; what was the comparable figure for two years ago; and what are the values attributable to both sets of figures.

Mr. Maude: I regret that the information is not available centrally.

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many companies have taken advantage of the Finance Act 1989 to set up qualifying employee share ownership trusts.

Mr. Maude: The Inland Revenue may not learn of the establishment of employee share ownership trusts of the kind defined in the Finance Act 1989 until claims for the tax relief provided by that legislation are received. Such claims may be made up to two years after the end of the period of account in which the relevant company contributions are made. None has yet been cleared.

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to promote employee share ownership and employee share ownership trusts.

Mr. Maude: The Government are committed to promoting employee share ownership, as our record of legislation in 11 out of the last 12 Budgets testifies. We shall continue to examine sympathetically the various proposals made for improvements in this area, to see how far they are capable of building on the impressive progress already achieved.

Mortgage Tax Relief

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the latest information on mortgage tax relief in the same format as his answer of 19 February 1990, Official Report, column 519.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 25 February 1991]: Estimates for 1990-91 are as follows:

Single people and married couples receiving mortgage interest relief by range of total income in 1990-91

Range of total income	Numbers receiving mortgage interest relief (thousands)	Average value of relief per mortgage (£)	Total cost of relief (£ million)
Up to £5,000	500	470	230
£5,001-£6,000	90	400	30
£6,001-£7,000	130	540	70
£7,001-£8,000	230	570	130
£8,001-£9,000	290	700	200
£9,001-£10,000	310	620	190
£10,001-£12,000	730	720	520
£12,001-£15,000	1,340	770	1,030
£15,001-£20,000	2,110	820	1,720
£20,001-£25,000	1,530	820	1,250
£25,001-£30,000	850	900	770
Over £30,000	1,310	1,260	1,650
Total	9,400	830	7,800

Estimates are based on projected information from the 1988-89 survey of personal incomes and the 1988 family expenditure survey and are provisional.

Income Tax

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the annual reduction in income tax for a person on an annual income of (a) £10,000, (b) £20,000, (c) £30,000, (d) £40,000, (e) £70,000 and (f) £150,000 as a result of income tax changes since the 1987 Budget.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 12 March 1991]: The information is in the following table, which compares the income tax liability in 1990-91 with liability under 1987-88 rates of tax allowances and thresholds indexed to 1990-91 levels by reference to the statutory formula. The calculations are for a single, non-aged person with no reliefs or allowances apart from the personal allowance.

Annual income £	Reduction in tax liability £
10,000	169·60
20,000	369·60
30,000	502·25
40,000	1,337·50
70,000	6,583·00
150,000	22,583·00

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average individual cumulative gain (a) in current prices and (b) in 1990-91 prices to those earning £5,000, £10,000, £15,000, £20,000, £25,000, £30,000, £40,000, £50,000, £60,000 and £70,000 a year as a result of changes in income tax since 1988.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 12 March 1991]: Latest estimates of the annual change in income tax liability resulting from the changes in tax rates, allowances, and thresholds are in the table. The 1988-89 income tax regime has been indexed to 1990-91 levels by reference to the statutory formula, and allowing for independent taxation.

Average increase in income tax per individual in 1990-91 compared with 1988-89 indexed regime

Community Charge

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the increase in the rate of value added tax which would be necessary to yield the same revenue as his estimate of the yield of the community charge in 1990-91 and 1991-92.

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what increase in the rate of value added tax would be required in order to yield the same amount of revenue as the community charge.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 12 March 1991]: Estimates of the net yield of the community charge in 1990-91 and 1991-92 were given in reply to the right hon. Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) on 15 February, column 624. To produce the same net yield in 1990-91 from additional VAT would have required about seven more percentage points on the VAT rate in that year. To produce the same net yield as the charge in 1991-92 would require an increase in 1991-92 of around six points, assuming that no change has been made to the VAT rate in 1990-91. These calculations are consistent with ready reckoner published in table 4.7 of the autumn statement 1990.

Balance of Trade

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects the United Kingdom balance of trade to be in surplus.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 13 March 1991]: As domestic demand pressures have eased, the visible trade deficit has fallen sharply. In the three months to January 1991 the deficit was £3·1 billion compared with a peak of £6·6 billion in the second quarter of 1989. A revised forecast will be presented on Budget day.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) whether he will estimate the number of new jobs created in the constituencies of Tynemouth, Langbaurgh, Darlington and Stockton, South (a) since February 1981 and (b) since June 1987;

(2) whether he will give the number of people at work in the constituencies of Tynemouth, Langbaurgh, Darlington and Stockton, South in February 1981, June 1983, June 1987 and February 1991.

Mr. Jackson: The available information for the constituencies is from the censuses of employment held in 1981, 1984 and 1987 and is given in the table. The figures relate only to employees in employment; they exclude the self-employed and members of Her Majesty's forces.

Employees in employment; September of each year

Langbaurgh	15·3	13·6	16·4	+1·1
Darlington	36·5	33·3	34·1	−2·4
Stockton, South	26·5	24·3	27·0	+0·5

Tourism

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what dialogue he has had with representatives of the tourist industry since the outbreak of hostilities in the Gulf; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what estimate his Department has of the trend in incoming visitors visiting Britain in 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: The most recently available estimates of the numbers of overseas visitors to the United Kingdom are for December 1990. These show a 2 per cent. increase in 1990 compared with 1989. It is too early to assess what impact the Gulf crisis will have on visitor levels this year.

As I told the House in reply to questions on 26 and 28 February, both I and my noble Friend, the Viscount Ullswater, the Minister for Tourism, have been in close contact with the tourism industry about the effects of the crisis. My noble Friend recently announced the launch of a campaign this month to promote holidays at home in the United Kingdom. My Department is also making available an additional £800,000 to the British Tourist Authority to mount a recovery campaign in overseas markets.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list for the financial years 1987-88 to 1991-92, all moneys given by central Government to tourism and the tourist industry under its different headings, including grant assistance to the tourist boards and section 4 grants.

Mr. Forth: The Government's financial support for the statutory tourist boards is as follows:

	1986-87 £ million	1987-88 £ million	1988-89 £ million	1989-90 £ million	1990-91 £ million	1991-92 £ million
British Tourist Authority	20·4	22·0	23·7	25·6	27·5	29·5
English Tourist Board (grant in aid)	10·3	11·3	12·6	13·4	14·8	14·7
Section 4 (ETB)	9·5	12·0	13·2	8·4	2·3	1·1
Scottish Tourist Board	6·1	6·1	6·8	7·9	8·6	9·1
Section 4 (STB)	3·0	3·0	3·1	3·3	3·6	3·5
Wales Tourist Board	5·4	5·5	5·9	6·5	7·25	7·7
Section 4 (WTB)	2·5	3·1	3·3	3·4	3·2	3·6
Northern Ireland	2·64	3·05	3·37	3·69	4·72	—[2]
Section 4 (NI)[1]	3·03	1·93	2·04	2·01	2·15	—[2]

[1] The Development of Tourism Act does not extend to Northern Ireland. The figures shown are for grants made to develop the Northern Ireland tourism industry.
[2] These figures are not yet available.

The Government's support for other tourism-related activity in 1988-89, the last year for which figures are available, is estimated to be about £380 million (excluding expenditure by local authorities).

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of the British Tourist Authority's expenditure in the financial years 1987 to 1991-92 has been provided directly by the Government as grant in aid.

Mr. Forth: The proportions are as follows:

	Per cent.
1987-88	59
1988-89	63
1989-90	65
1990-91	69
1991-92	68

The figures for 1990-92 are estimates by the British Tourist Authority.

Northern Region

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will estimate the number of new jobs created in the Northern region (a) since February 1981 and (b) since June 1987.

Mr. Jackson: Changes in the civilian work force in employment in the Northern region are shown in the table.

Civilian workforce in employment in Northern Region

	Net change	Unadjusted percentage change
March 1981 to September 1990	65,000	5·3
June 1987 to September 1990	88,000	7·3

Self-employed

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people were self-employed in the constituencies of Tynemouth, Langbaurgh, Darlington and Stockton, South in February 1981, June 1987 and February 1991.

Mr. Jackson: Information on the number of self-employed for constituencies is available only for April 1981 from the census of population. The available information is as follows:

Self-employed in Tynemouth, Langbaurgh, Darlington, and Stockton, South constituencies

	April 1981
Tynemouth	2,190
Langbaurgh	2,190
Darlington	1,960
Stockton, South	2,100

Training

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list for employment training in each of the years 1990-91, 1991-92, 1992-93 and 1993-94 (a) the total estimated planned expenditure in both cash and real terms and (b) the total number of planned places, for Great Britain and each standard region; and what is the estimated outturn expenditure for 1990-91 employment training in 1990-91 for Great Britain and each standard region.

Mr. Jackson [pursuant to his reply, 7 March 1991]: I regret that the information given in my reply of 7 March at column 289 was incorrect due to a typographical error. The correct information is as follows:

Total planned expenditure on employment training in cash and constant prices in 1990-91 to 1993-94 is shown in the table. Information on the total number of planned places is not available. Estimated outturn expenditure in Great Britain for employment training in 1990-91 is £1,062 million. Regional expenditure forecasts are for internal management purposes only.

£ million

	Cash	Constant
1990-91	1,074	995
1991-92	877	766
1992-93	792	661
1993-94	811	654

Notes:
1. Cash figures for 1991-92 to 1993-94 are taken from the Departmental Report (Cm. 1501 to 1519) and adjusted to take account of recent additions to planned expenditure in 1991-92.
2. Cash figure for 1990-91 is the Spring Supplementary Estimate published in February 1991.

HEALTH

Product Licences

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps are taken to ensure that Product Licence (Parallel Imports) products are recognised in national health service formularies.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We encourage the use of local formularies as a way of promoting more rational and cost-effective prescribing. The construction of formularies and the products they contain is a matter for the clinicians concerned.

Waiting Lists

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the change in the Bloomsbury in-patient waiting lists in the period from April 1989 to December 1990.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: In the 12 months to March 1990, the latest date for which information is available, the number waiting for in-patient treatment in Bloomsbury fell by 21 per cent. More importantly, the number waiting over one year for in-patient treatment fell by 34 per cent.

Drugs

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what cost benefit would accrue to the national health service from a 1 per cent. increase in the prescribing of generic pharmaceuticals by general practitioners in place of branded drugs.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It is not possible to estimate such a saving. The saving which could be achieved would depend on which drugs GPs chose to prescribe generically and whether there was a generic equivalent of these branded products available on the market.

Food Safety

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will list those organisations that will be invited to launch publicly the future draft codes of practice in respect of food hygiene training;

(2) when he proposes (a) to issue a draft code of practice in relation to food hygiene training and (b) to launch publicly his initiative to industry.

Mr. Dorrell: Codes of practice for enforcement authorities issued under the Food Safety Act 1990 are issued by Ministers after receiving advice from the Implementation Advisory Committee (IAC). The IAC has not yet begun discussions on a code of practice relating to food hygiene training, and is unlikely to do so until policy with regard to training requirements has been determined.

The Food Safety Act 1990 does not contain statutory provisions for the Government to issue codes of practice to industry. Food industry organisations may, of course, choose to produce guidance for the benefit of their own members if they so wish.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what guidance he proposes to give to industry lead bodies in respect of food hygiene training about conflict of interest between income generation from selling training services and their accreditation role in relation to performance-based testing by employers in the workplace;

(2) what advice he has offered food hygiene examination bodies in respect of (a) the content, length and mode of study, (b) testing and recertification and instructor qualifications, experience, refresher courses and recertification in relation to courses under the Food Safety Act 1990;

(3) what is his policy on ensuring reciprocity between United Kingdom-based hygiene training certificating bodies and other EC-based testing bodies;

(4) what is his policy towards the achievement of a generic national vocational qualification for the whole food chain or parts thereof, in respect of (a) manager, (b) supervisor and (c) operative levels of certification;

(5) what consultations he has had with hygiene training examination bodies about when they will be in a position to revise their syllabuses and regulations to be consistent with standards specified by regulations arising from the Food Safety Act 1990;

(6) what guidance he has given hygiene training certification bodies in respect of generic competences and performance criteria required for (a) operatives (b) supervisory grades and (c) managers for each sector in respect of the Food Safety Act 1990;

(7) how he intends to monitor and evaluate the work of examination bodies providing mandatory hygiene training certification in relation to the Food Safety Act 1990;

(8) which examination bodies he has consulted in respect of food hygiene certification in relation to the Food Safety Act 1990.

Mr. Dorrell: At present, there is no requirement for food handlers to achieve specified certificates in food hygiene or for training courses to be approved by certain bodies. The Department of Health's consultation document on the training of food handlers invited comments from interested parties on a number of issues including standards and accreditation. We will be determining our policy in the light of the comments received.

Paediatrics

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many consultant paediatricians there are in each of the regions of England; and how many of these specialise in neonatal care.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Data on the number of consultant paediatricians in each of the English regions are given in the table. Information on the numbers who specialise in neonatal care is not held centrally.

2 Figures do not include consultants in the specialties of Paediatric Neurology nor Paediatric Surgery.

North West RHA

Ms. Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many consultants were employed in hospitals in the North West regional health authority in (a) 1979, (b) 1986 and (c) 1990;

(2) how many paramedical staff were employed by the North West regional health authority in (a) 1979, (b) 1986 and (c) 1990;

(3) how many nursing staff were employed in the North West regional health authority in (a) 1979, (b) 1986 and (c) 1990;

(4) how many ancillary staff were employed by the North West regional health authority in (a) 1979, (b) 1986 and (c) 1990.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information requested is given in the table.

NHS staff at 30 September each year
North Western Regional Health Authority

	Whole-time equivalents[1]
Staff groups	1979	1986	1989
Consultants[2] (medical and dental)	950	1,187	1,264

[1] All figures are independently rounded to the nearest ten (10) whole-time equivalents.
[2] Figures include permanent paid and honorary staff only.
[3] Includes qualified chiropodists, dieticians, occupational therapists, orthoptists, physiotherapists, radiographers.
[4] Not adjusted for the reduction in nurses working hours during 1980-81 (from 40 hours to 37·5 hours per week).

The information for 1990 is not yet available centrally. The hon. Member may wish to write to Mr. B. Martin, the chairman of North Western regional health authority, for current details.

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many beds in district health authority hospitals existed in the North West regional health authority in (a) 1979, (b) 1986 and (c) 1990.

Mr. Dorrell: There were 30,811, 28,406 and 25,204 beds in North Western region in 1979, 1986 and 1989-90, the latest date for which information is available, respectively. More importantly, the number of patients treated since 1979 has increased by over 27 per cent. in the North Western region as a whole.

Birth Statistics

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he collects figures relating to the percentage of births (a) artificially induced, (b) accelerated and (c) delivered by caesarean section, by regions and districts.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The method of maternity data collection was changed in April 1987 with the introduction of the hospital episodes statistics system (HES). Data are now collected under the following categories:

Method of delivery
Normal Spontaneous
Normal Spontaneous-Vertex
Spontaneous-other cephalic
Low Forceps
Other Forceps
Ventouse vacuum extraction
Breech
Breech Extraction
Elective Caesarian Section
Other Unspecified (emergency) caesarian section
Other Unspecified including unknown

Method of onset of labour
Spontaneous
Elective caesarian
Surgical inductions
Oxytocic drugs
Combinations of surgical induction/oxytocic drugs
Not known

The most recent information available is for 1988-89, the first year for which additional delivery details were collected, I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) on 8 March at columns 322-23. Approximate national estimates of these percentages can be made for that year, but it has not been possible to make reliable regional and district estimates. Steps have been taken to improve quality and completeness of data which should reduce the level of approximation in later years and enable more detailed breakdowns to be made.

Pregnancy

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether the Health Education Authority has any programme of work with trade unions for disseminating knowledge about pregnancy-related matters among working women.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The authority provides a range of information on pregnancy to women on an individual basis and through health care professionals. The authority's "Health at Work" programme provides a range of services for employers and their employees in areas such as coronary heart disease, cancer, women's health, AIDS/HIV and alcohol misuse. This programme has the support of both the CBI and the TUC. It is open to employers to approach the authority about workplace initiatives on pregnancy-related matters.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the cost to the national health service of a pregnancy test.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not collected centrally.

Crown Immunity

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the categories of hospital and the aspects of their work that enjoy Crown immunity.

Mr. Dorrell: Currently national health service hospitals enjoy Crown immunity except in respect of food hygiene and health and safety legislation. From 1 April this year hospitals will cease to enjoy Crown immunity with the exception only of certain provisions in the Employers' Liability (Compulsory Insurance) Act 1969, the Vehicles (Excise) Act 1971, the Road Traffic Act 1988, and the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988.

Value for Money

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures of performance are employed by his Department to ensure value for money.

Mr. Dorrell: The Department has a well-developed management accounting system which is designed to help managers at all levels to set clear objectives consistent with departmental aims and objectives; to monitor progress against these objectives, and to reassess them as conditions change. Achievement of plans set out in the management accounts is reviewed regularly and is linked to the annual assessment of personal performance through a stewardship exercise.

In addition, the delivery of VFM improvements for the NHS has focused on the cost improvement programme since 1984 with over £1 billion of cash-releasing cost improvements achieved. Performance monitoring is through the annual review process and particular attention is being drawn to value for money in 1991-92 with each region being asked to develop a strategy to include the change to purchaser and provider roles.

Infant Food

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the Government's position on the European Commission's draft directive on the marketing and composition of infant formulae and follow-up foods.

Mr. Dorrell: During the negotiations on this important draft directive, which are now nearing completion, the Government have unequivocally supported the adoption of strict compositional standards for these products so as to secure the health and safety of bottle-fed infants. In addition, we have been pressing, and will continue to press, for amendments to the text of the draft directive to align it more closely with the World Health Organisation's international code of marketing of breastmilk substitutes. The Government remain committed to promoting and protecting breastfeeding as the best means of nurturing infants.

Residential Homes

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether he will list those health authorities which provide incontinence aids free of charge to elderly people in residential homes.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will issue a circular to health authorities advising them to use their discretion to provide incontinence aids for elderly people in residential homes who are either on income support or who otherwise have difficulty in paying for these aids.

Mr. Dorrell: On 18 February 1991, the NHS management executive issued an executive letter to health authorities (EL(91)28), which reminded them that good practice in continence services includes provision for regular and adequate supplies of incontinence aids. A copy of this letter is available in the Library. Officials will shortly be beginning a departmental review of continence services and incontinence aids.

Long-stay Beds

Mrs. Heal: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy for at least 10 per cent. of national health service beds for the elderly to be provided and staffed for long-stay patients who choose to remain in national health service care.

Mr. Dorrell: Health authorities are expected to provide an integrated pattern of services for elderly people, including long-term care. It is for each health authority to decide the level of this service, or any other service, to be provided, taking into account the local circumstances.

Basingstoke District Hospital

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many in-patients and how many day cases were treated at Basingstoke district hospital in 1978-79 and in 1990-91, or the most recent year for which statistics are available.

Mr. Dorrell: Over the period from 1979 to 1989-90 in-patient and day case treatment at the Basingstoke district hospital has increased as follows:

	1979	1989-90
In-patient Cases	13,958	21,303
Day Cases	2,887	6,365

The figures for 1979 are derived from discharge and deaths; those for 1989-90 are derived from finished consultant episodes.

NHS Neglect

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what sums were paid out in compensation for neglect by the NHS in each of the last three years for which figures are available in (a) the Yorkshire regional health authority area and (b) in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Dorrell: The annual accounts of health authorities in England identify all compensation payments (made under legal obligation) in total only and separate information for cases of neglect is not collected centrally. Such information as is held by the Department for the Yorkshire region and England as a whole is shown in the table.

Questions concerning the national health service in the other countries within the United Kingdom are matters for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland, for Wales and for Northern Ireland.

Computers

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many doctors' practices have been given a grant for the installation of a computer under the computer grant scheme; and what has been the total cost of this scheme.

Mr. Dorrell: No figures are held centrally in respect of the number of grants made by family health services authorities (FHSAs). From 1 April 1990 to 31 January 1991, £11,120,801 was reimbursed by FHSAs to GPs under the scheme.

London Ambulance Service

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will refer to the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service the current dispute between the officers of the London ambulance service and the London ambulance board.

Mr. Dorrell: No. This is a local matter for resolution by the London ambulance service board, which is responsible for the management of the London ambulance service.

Day Centres

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many local authorities levy charges for attendance at day centres for the elderly, disabled, mentally ill and mentally handicapped, other than for meals; and what is the average charge in each category.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 8 March 1991]: We expect local social services authorities to develop effective costing and charging procedures for day and domiciliary care, since this can be valuable in achieving the best use of resources across the range of personal social services. But ability to pay should not in any way influence decisions on services to be provided.

The latest information available centrally on income for such charges is from the 1988-89 revenue outturn forms from the 109 English social services departments. Information on the average charge is not available centrally.

Smoking

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current annual number of deaths from cancer in (a) England, (b) Wales, (c) Scotland and (d) Northern Ireland attributed to smoking; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what is the current annual number of deaths from heart disease in (a) England, (b) Wales, (c) Scotland and (d) Northern Ireland attributed to smoking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 11 March 1991]: The table shows the number of deaths attributed to those forms of cancer and heart disease usually associated with smoking. It is estimated that at least 90 per cent. of deaths from lung cancer and pulmonary heart disease are attributable to smoking. In addition cancers of the mouth, larynx and oesophagus have all been associated with smoking.

In 1983 the Royal College of Physicians in its report "Health or Smoking" estimated that perhaps 20 per cent. of deaths due to obstruction of the arteries of the heart were related to smoking; an extract is available in the Library. The medical term for this condition is "ischaemic heart disease", but it is often referred to as "coronary heart disease". The total number of deaths from this condition is shown in the table, but the proportion directly attributable to smoking is less certain as this is only one of a number of causes that give rise to obstruction of the arteries of the heart.

Death Statistics

Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current annual number of deaths in the United Kingdom attributed to (a) smoking, (b) alcohol and (c) illegal drug use; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 11 March 1991]: The available data are shown in the tables.

Table 1 shows the number of deaths registered in 1989 in the United Kingdom with an underlying cause of death stated as drug dependence or non-dependent abuse of drugs.

It is not possible from death registrations reliably to identify which of these deaths were due to the use of illegal drugs.

Table 1. Deaths from drug dependence and non-dependent abuse of drugs.

Cause of death	ICD code[1]	Number of deaths
Drug dependence	304	191
Non-dependent abuse of drugs (excluding alcohol and tobacco)	305·2-305·9	54

Table 2 shows the number of deaths registered in 1989 in the United Kingdom assigned to underlying causes of death due to diseases associated with alcohol consumption.

Table 2. Number of deaths associated with alcohol consumption

Main diagnosis	ICD code[1]	Number of deaths
Alcoholic psychoses	291	13
Alcoholic dependence syndrome	303	273
Non-dependent abuse of alcohol	305·0	215
Alcoholic cardiomyopathy	425·5	112
Chronic liver disease and cirrhosis, alcohol reported as a cause	571·0-571·3	1,573

excludes Scotland—data not available.

In addition, statistics collated by the Department of Transport indicate that in 1988 in Great Britain, there were 840 deaths and 5,650 serious injuries in road accidents involving illegal alcohol levels.

For smoking it is not possible to be precise. Most deaths associated with cigarette smoking arise from three diseases: lung cancer, chronic bronchitis and "heart attacks" due to obstructions of the arteries of the heart. However, the proportion of deaths attributable to smoking from each of these diseases varies. Furthermore, smoking is also implicated in certain other conditions where no estimate of the numbers of the deaths caused by smoking is available—for example, obstruction of the arteries of the lower limbs, and strokes.

It is estimated that at least 90 per cent. of deaths from lung cancer, and 90 per cent. of deaths from chronic bronchitis, obstructive lung disease, chronic pulmonary heart disease and aortic aneurysm are attributable to smoking. In addition cancers of the mouth, larynx and oesophagus have all been shown to be associated with smoking. The total number of deaths from these conditions involved is given in table 3.

Table 3. Number of deaths associated with smoking tobacco, 1989

In 1983, the Royal College of Physicians in its report "Health or Smoking" estimated that perhaps 20 per cent. of deaths due to obstruction of the arteries of the heart were related to smoking; an extract is available in the Library. The medical term for this condition is "ischaemic heart disease", but it is commonly referred to as "coronary heart disease". The total number of deaths from this condition for the United Kingdom in 1989 is as follows:

Electoral Registration

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the total number on the electoral roll per London constituency for 1987-88, 1988-89, 1989-90, 1990-91 and for 1991-92.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 12 March 1991]: Numbers of parliamentary electors on the 1987, 1988, 1989 and 1990 registers are given for each London constituency in the table. Information about the 1991 registers is still being collected centrally from local electoral registration officers. The OPCS expects to place the 1991 figures in the Library by 10 May.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Bananas

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proportion of Britain's bananas are imported from the Windward islands; and what calculations he has done on the difference in prices between Windward island bananas and those from other sources and of any extra cost falling on the British consumer of Windward island bananas.

Mr. Curry: Windward island bananas accounted for about 52 per cent. of total United Kingdom banana imports in 1990.

The table compares the United Kingdom retail price with the retail price for bananas in four other European countries—France, Germany, Denmark and Italy—during the most recently available period. These are the only countries for which retail price data (i.e. the cost to consumers) are available, but the five countries considered do account for 73 per cent of EC imports of bananas, and include virtually all sources which supply the EC market. Each country imports bananas from a different mix of sources: France is supplied mostly by her own growers in the Caribbean and the African Caribbean and Pacific (ACP) countries, but also takes some from Latin America (the "dollar" area); Germany and Denmark are supplied entirely by dollar producers; Italy is mostly dollar but with some ACP.

Retail price (pence/pound)[1] September 1989—August 1990.

	pence
United Kingdom	50·8
France	53·7
Germany[2]	42·5
Denmark	55·2
Italy[3]	59·1

[1] Converted from national currencies at average market exchange rates valid for each month in question.

[2] Germany is exempted from a 20 per cent. tariff which applies to all other EC imports of dollar bananas.

[3] Adjusted to exclude a consumption tax levied then but now abolished.

Maryport Harbour

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will consider funding under the Fisheries Act 1955 urgent applications for assistance from representatives of the fishing industry or the Maryport harbour authorities to meet health and safety requirements in Maryport harbour.

Mr. Curry: I can assure the fishing community and the harbour authorities at Maryport that if they submit an application for grant under the Fisheries Act 1955 for safety works to the harbour it will be considered urgently and sympathetically by this Department.

National Rivers Authority

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has about the National Rivers Authority's consideration of water levels on the Somerset levels.

Mr. Curry: We are aware that a sub-committee of the Somerset local flood defence committee of the National Rivers Authority is reviewing the authority's policy and practice as regards water level management on the Somerset levels and moors. We shall be interested in the outcome which will no doubt take account of Government policy.

Badgers

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what advice he has given to landowers or occupiers concerning the need to protect active badger setts during agricultural or related activities.

Mr. Curry: The Ministry's agricultural development and advisory service (ADAS) provides advice on request to landowners and occupiers where it is necessary to resolve problems caused by badger activities. This is done in strict adherence to legislation and the welfare of badgers and often is in co-operation with other interested organisations such as the Nature Conservancy Council.

All advice is subject to the statutory need to balance environmental and wildlife interests with those of agriculture and related activities.

Opportunities are taken to promote the protection of badgers to landowners and occupiers often in association with other organisations.

Exports

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish a list of the tonnages of food and gallons of wine exported with subsidy support to (a) central and east Europe and the Soviet Union and (b) the rest of the world, respectively, in the most recent year for which figures are available; and what are the comparable figures for the previous two years.

Mr. Curry: The information requested is contained in the tables.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the number of confirmed cases of BSE by county in England and Wales in the month to 17 February.

Mr. Gummer: The information for England and Wales is as follows:

County	Confirmed cases
Avon	28
Bedfordshire	5
Berkshire	8
Buckinghamshire	12
Cambridge	6
Cheshire	52
Cleveland	3
Clwyd	14

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will list the location of the incinerators used for the disposal of BSE cows on a county basis in England; if he will list those counties where there are no such facilities; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will list on a county basis in England the number of BSE confirmed cows which were (a) incinerated and (b) buried in 1990 and the most recent figures for 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The movement of carcases of suspect BSE cattle for incineration or burial is carried out on an England and Wales basis and is not restricted by county boundaries. Currently there are 10 incinerators in England used to handle BSE carcases. These are located in Avon, Hertfordshire, Northumberland, North Yorkshire, Nottinghamshire, Somerset, South Yorkshire and West Yorkshire. in 1990 11,824 carcases were incinerated and 2,707 buried in England. The figures for the first quarter of 1991 are not yet available.

Fishing Engines

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many commercial fishing engines operate in freshwater lakes and rivers in England and Wales which have as target species (a) salmon, (b) sea trout, (c) wild brown trout and (d) coarse fish by species; and what quantities of each such species were taken by such engines in (i) 1990, (ii) 1985, (iii) 1980 and (iv) 1970.

Mr. Curry: I understand that there are five rivers in England and Wales—the Avon, Lyn, Conwy, Eden and Derwent—in which commercial fixed engines in freshwater have been licensed for catching salmon or sea trout. (There are no such licensed fixed engines in lakes, nor fixed engines whose target species are wild brown trout or coarse fish). The available data on the numbers of fish caught by these methods for the Rivers Avon, Lyn and Conwy are as follows:

	River Avon		River Lyn		River Conwy
	Salmon	Sea trout	Salmon	Sea trout	Salmon	Sea trout
1970	103	0	33	80	58	11
1980	22	33	17	1	8	6
1985	87	73	0	0	37	0

[1] 1990 data not yet available.

Separate data are not available for the fixed engine catches on the Eden and Derwent. Further information about salmon and freshwater fisheries catches over the period 1983-88 appears in the "Fisheries Research Data Report Series" published by the fisheries laboratory, Lowestoft.

Agriculture Budget (EC)

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action has been taken by the EC to ensure that its budget for agricultural spending does not exceed £24 billion; if such action is subject to the approval of the Council of Ministers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: The Commission currently estimate that, if no further corrective action is taken, expenditure on market support in 1991 could reach 32,991 mecu (£22,990 million). This would be 1,475 mecu (£1,028 million) over the budget for market support and 480 mecu (£334 million) over the guideline. In addition, the depreciation of the dollar against the rate used in the preparation of the budget will lead to extra expenditure, 400 mecu (£279 million) of which will be financed from the guarantee section of the EAGGF; expenditure over this amount will be financed from the monetary reserve. The Commission is proposing to introduce a supplementary budget up to the level of the guideline. The Commission's 1991 price fixing proposals comply with Council decision 88/377 on budgetary discipline and envisage savings of 540 mecu (£376 million) in 1991 and 2,057 mecu (£1,433 million) in 1992. Both a supplementary budget and the price proposals will require approval by the Council of Ministers. The Commission also intends to obtain savings of 400 mecu (£279 million) through management action.

Other EC agricultural expenditure is expected to remain within current budget provisions.

Child Care

Dr. Marek: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the number of workplaces for civil servants in his Ministry; what proportion of the total number have an on-site nursery facility; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide a holiday play scheme; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide after-school child care facilities; what charges are made for use of any facility; what the net cost has been for the provision of these facilities; and what estimate he can make of any future expenditure.

Mr. Curry: This Department has some 160 offices and laboratories of which about 40 have over 50 staff. Child care facilities are available for the children of staff working in about one fifth of the latter. The first workplace nursery opens on 2 April at Guildford. Holiday play scheme facilities are available in eight locations—namely, Exeter, Guildford, Leeds, Nottingham, Westminster, Weybridge, Wolverhampton, and Worcester and a further scheme starts in Bristol this Easter. Currently there are no facilities available for after-school child care.

Charges for play schemes range around about £5 per child per day; the Guildford nursery plans to charge between £40 to £50 per child per week. In respect of costs, it is estimated that the Guildford nursery will show a positive return in 1994, setting fees and savings derived from the anticipated reduction in staff turnover against management and running costs of about £200,000 per year. As for play schemes, most are run in conjunction with other Government Departments or organisations. Net cost figures are not readily available, but start-up costs can range up to about £3,000.

I cannot estimate overall future expenditure but I am planning for more provision for nursery places in central London and Bristol.

Brown Trout

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has considered a ban on the sale of wild brown trout in England and Wales.

Mr. Curry: No such ban has been considered.

Purchasing and Distribution

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the full annual cost, including overheads, of his Ministry's purchasing activity.

Mr. Curry: Information is not retained in a suitable format to enable the full annual cost, including overheads, of the Ministry's purchasing activity to be calculated without disproportionate costs. However the Ministry's administration cost for purchasing was £1·68 million, as reported to the central unit on purchasing for the 1989-90 report to the Prime Minister. This cost was for administering a spend of £114·8 million on goods, £200 million on services and £120·7 million on research and development services.

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many people in his Ministry are wholly or substantially involved in purchasing stores and distribution activities.

Mr. Curry: The total number of people in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food involved in purchasing stores and distribution activities is 250 of which 104 are wholly involved and 146 substantially involved.

Tributyltin

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will bring forward proposals to ban the use of tributyltin on commercial and naval vessels.

Mr. Curry: The use, sale, supply, advertisement or storage of tributyltin paint for use on vessels under 25m was made an offence under the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985 as from 1 July 1987. This ban covers more than 98 per cent. of the United Kingdom fishing fleet. The United Kingdom is playing a leading role in international discussions of the need for further controls on the use of antifouling paints containing tributyltin on larger vessels.

Slaughterhouses

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will now set a minimum permissible delay between stunning and slaughtering of animals in abattoirs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: It is not proposed to prescribe by law minimum periods between the stunning and sticking of animals. The law requires that when animals are stunned they must be instantaneously rendered insensible to pain until death occurs and that there must be no delay between stunning and sticking. Advice on stunning and sticking procedures will be included in planned codes of practice.

Seafood

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he is taking in respect of his Department's aquatic environment monitoring report No. 23 insofar as this relates to the increase in the level of and exposure to radiation in 1989 by members of the public as a result of eating seafood; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: The report referred to by the hon. Member shows that, in 1989, the highest dose received by consumers of large quantities of locally-gathered shellfish in the Sellafield area was 0·19 mSv. This is one quarter of the equivalent dose rate of four years earlier. This substantial reduction in the exposure to radiation as a result of eating seafood is a demonstration of the effectiveness of the Government's controls on nuclear discharges.

The minor fluctuations in dose rate over the most recent years are due to natural variations. The downward trend is expected to be resumed from 1993 when new treatment plant now being constructed at Sellafield is commissioned. Meanwhile the dose of 0·19 mSv is only one fifth of the internationally recognised limit of 1 mSv.

Value for Money

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures of performance are employed by his Ministry to ensure value for money.

Mr. Curry: The Ministry's activities are sub-divided into some 70 programmes, each of which has its own output measures and performance indicators. Progress against these measures and indicators is reviewed annually by Ministers and senior management in their assessment of the value for money which is being achieved.

Foxes

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will provide a table of moneys allocated to fox destruction societies in England since 1979.

Mr. Curry: No moneys have been allocated to fox destruction societies since the cessation of payment of grant aid to such societies in 1979.

Wheat

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the prices of wheat for export, free on board, in the United Kingdom, France, the United States of America (Gulf of Mexico), Canada (St. Lawrence), Australia and Argentina.

Mr. Curry: Wheat export prices quoted in the bulletin of the Home-Grown Cereals Authority for 7 March are as follows:

	Price £/tonne	Basis
United Kingdom	48·65	FOB East coast
France	48·55	FOB Rouen
United States of America (Soft Red Winter)	59·10	FOB Gulf of Mexico excluding any Export Enhancement Programme bonus
Canada (Premium Milling)	72·10	In store St. Lawrence
Australia (Standard White)	66·85	FOB Eastern States
Argentina	43·73	FOB Bahia Blanca

Import Levies

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the current import levies for the main foods covered by the common agriculture policy; and if he will publish a table showing these figures and the comparable figures on the same date in each of the previous five years.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I have been asked to reply.

Information covering import levies on a selection of main foodstuffs covered by the common agricultural policy is as follows. The levies quoted were those in force on 8 March and on the same date in the previous five years:

Description	1986	1987	1988	1989	1990	1991
Unit of charge
Durum Wheat £/tonne	133·30	167·99	166·69	124·15	129·94	157·02
Beef forequarters £/100kg	244·68	249·87	265·76	245·01	257·60	281·47
Chicken £/100kg	17·90	25·09	26·12	20·93	21·21	25·01
Pigmeat fore-ends £/100kg	42·20	60·21	62·47	44·64	48·22	60·93
Cheese £/100kg	135·56	161·03	191·01	173·72	163·72	178·86

A more detailed breakdown would be available only at disproportionate cost, although if my hon. Friend is interested in the rates of charge for particular commodities, Her Majesty's Customs and Excise would be pleased to supply these.

DEFENCE

The Gulf

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are his plans for weapons parks in the Gulf region.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Options for future United Kingdom contributions to security in the Gulf region are under consideration.

Birmingham Arms Fair

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what criteria were used to determine which Governments were invited to the forthcoming Birmingham arms fair.

Mr. Alan Clark: This exhibition is not being organised by the Government.

Trident

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of (a) the percentage effect on the unit cost of Trident D5 missiles and (b) the effect on the overall cost of the Trident programme to the United Kingdom, as a result of the decision by the United States Department of Defense to cut back the projected number of Trident submarines.

Mr. Alan Clark: It is not our practice to publish unit production costs for equipment purchased by the Ministry of Defence. As regards the overall cost of the Trident programme, I have nothing to add to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 12 February at column 383.

SCOTLAND

Badgers

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has concerning the number of badgers and the current number of active badger setts in Scotland; how many such setts have been destroyed during the last three years; and for what reasons.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Information on Scotland's badger population is given in the Nature Conservancy Council's publication "The history, distribution, status and habitat requirements of the badger in Britain", a copy of which is in the Library.

No information is available about the number of setts destroyed during the last three years.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he has taken during the last five years to ensure the protection of the badger population and active badger setts from damaging forestry operations.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Badger setts are not on the whole vulnerable to damage from forestry operations, since they are characteristically large, subterranean and in well-drained soils. The Forestry Commission nevertheless endeavours to locate all the badger setts on its land so that they can be protected from any possible damage. It has also published forest nature conservation guidelines, for use by its own forest managers and those in the private sector, which emphasise the importance of good management in protecting animal populations.

Nature Conservancy Council

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the cost of refurbishing the Nature Conservancy Council headquarters at Hope terrace, Edinburgh; and if he will outline his Department's assessment of the future use of this building.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Nature Conservancy Council's Scottish headquarters were refurbished between September 1988 and April 1989 at a cost in the region of £600,000.

It will be for Scottish Natural Heritage to consider the future use of the building.

Legal System

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will list the average length in days of trials (a) on indictment and (b) in county courts in Scotland over the last five years.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Comprehensive information is not collected centrally in the form requested, but it is estimated that the average length of trials on indictment is between three and four days in the High Court of Justiciary and about two days in the sheriff courts. The average length of summary criminal trials in the sheriff courts is estimated to be about two hours. Such information is not held centrally on the district courts.

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will list the average payment from legal aid funds to (a) solicitors and (b) barristers in Scotland over the last five years.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is as follows:

	Solicitors £	Advocates £
1985-86	211·32	200·02
1986-87	209·38	263·28
1987-88	207·54	406·07
1988-89	188·03	655·25
1989-90	213·12	746·04

The annual average payments from legal aid funds to solicitors reflect the varying amounts of different types of legal aid work, including advice and assistance, undertaken in each year. The figures for payment to advocates reflect changes in the law on divorce and in court practice.

Child Care

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of workplaces for civil servants in the Scottish Office; what proportion of the total number have an on-site nursery facility; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide a holiday play scheme; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide after-school child care facilities; what charges are made for use of any facility; what the net cost has been for the provision of these facilities; and what estimate he can make of any future expenditure.

Mr. Ian Lang: Within the Scottish Office there are 183 workplaces, none of which have on-site nursery or holiday play scheme facilities or provide after-school care. Staff in my Department do have the opportunity during school holidays to use the facilities provided for children of civil servants by the Central Edinburgh holiday play scheme. These facilities are available on a full repayment basis.

There is no planned future expenditure. My Department does not currently satisfy the value-for-money criteria which would justify the provision of financial support for child care schemes.

M8

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects work to begin on the upgrading of the M8 from Baillieston to Newhouse; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: We have emphasised that a top priority is to complete the central Scotland motorway network. At the west end of the M8 motorway extensions are planned from Baillieston to Shawhead and from Shawhead to Newhouse.

We have been carefully reviewing and scheduling the release of the large motorways schemes in central and southern Scotland to ensure that both the best value for money is obtained from these expensive projects and that the industry can digest them. A record number of motorway schemes are now under construction and as a consequence expenditure is at an all-time high. There are currently five motorway schemes being built and we expect this number to increase shortly.

As regards the Baillieston to Shawhead scheme, we are currently re-examining with British Rail the options for an alternative design and construction method for the Bargeddie railway bridge advance works which, if acceptable, could provide sufficient cost savings on previous tenders. Once this review and all the necessary statutory procedures have been completed, a date for commencing construction of the scheme can be considered.

Preparation work on the Shawhead to Newhouse section is continuing and this is likely to be completed by 1994.

Housing

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the capital debt of each Scottish housing authority at the end of each financial year for each of the past 15 years.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The following table shows for each local housing authority at 31 March of each year since 1980 the outstanding capital debt associated with houses, buildings and land to which the housing revenue account applies. Details for earlier years could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Capital Debt as at 31 March (£ Million)

[1] Provisional.

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the loss of housing stock in rural areas through the rent-to-mortgage scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Sales through the rent-to-mortgage scheme do not result in a loss of housing stock in rural or other areas but in a change of housing tenure. I consider that public sector tenants in rural areas should have the same opportunity to purchase their homes as their urban counterparts. Significant interest has been shown by around 10,000 local authority tenants throughout Scotland who will be eligible to participate in the rent to mortgage scheme from 1 April 1991. Wider issues relating to housing in rural areas are being addressed by Scottish Homes through its rural strategy.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the loan charges balance of each Scottish housing authority for each of the past 15 years, the source of loans and the rates of interest.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the loan charge proportion of each £ of rent charged by the four cities' housing authorities in Scotland, respectively, in the last available financial year.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Local authority rented income is not allocated to meet any particular item or items of expenditure debited to housing revenue accounts. The following table expresses the total loan charges debited to the 1989-90 housing revenue accounts of the local housing authorities concerned as a percentage of the standard rental income credited to those accounts:

	Per cent.
City of Aberdeen District Council	69·9
City of Edinburgh District Council	46·9
City of Glasgow District Council	75·1
City of Dundee District Council	66·9

An Comunn Gaidhealach

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals his Department has to make available to An Comunn Gaidhealach additional funding for the pursuit of its objectives in 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Scottish Office Education Department's grant to An Comunn Gaidhealach for the financial year 1991-92 will amount to £37,000, an increase of £2,000 over the currently financial year.

Nurses

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action the Greater Glasgow health board is taking to expedite its backlog of regrading appeals by nurses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I understand that by the end of March 1991, the great majority of appeals lodged with Greater Glasgow health board will have been heard and that the board intends to deal with the remainder as quickly as possible.

Higher Education

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the average public expenditure per student in Scottish higher education in each year since 1975.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The average public expenditure through recurrent grant and tuition fees per student in the Scottish grant-aided colleges since 1980-81 is given in the following table.

Financial year	£
1980-81	3,028
1981-82	3,099
1982-83	3,179
1983-84	3,242
1984-85	3,422
1985-86	3,695
[1]1986-87	3,600
1987-88	3,793
1988-89	4,025
1989-90	4,106
[2]1990-91	4,225

[1] Napier Polytechnic of Edinburgh and Glasgow Polytechnic became central institutions on 1 September 1985, and are included from financial year 1986-87 onwards.
[2] Estimate.

Figures for earlier years could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Information relating to the universities in Scotland has not been included since the funding of universities is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science. Information about expenditure relating to higher education courses at further education colleges is not held centrally.

Recycling

Mr. McAllion To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how he intends to fund innovative recycling projects in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: All recycling projects put forward by local authorities when they submit their financial plans will be carefully considered for capital consent. Indeed, those authorities who have already identified such projects in their plans have received priority when consent allocations have been determined.

We also look to industry to invest in the necessary technology to meet consumer demand for recycled products. There is a wide range of research and development support schemes available to assist industry with innovative projects including recycling initiatives. Assistance is also available to voluntary bodies, in particular under the special grants (environmental) programme and the UK 2000 (Scotland) programme.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether there are schemes available to Scottish local authorities equivalent to the reserve fund for innovative recycling projects, and the supplementary credit approval scheme which are available to local authorities in England and Wales for funding recycling projects; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas Hamilton: There is no reserve fund for innovative recycling projects but assistance may be given under the environmental technology innovation scheme which was launched in December last year and covers Scotland as well as England and Wales. In Scotland assistance may also be available through the special grant (environmental) programme which is equivalent to the environmental grant fund in England. However, neither of these sources of funding are appropriate for local authorities. The supplementary credit approval arrangements for controlling local authority capital expenditure do not apply in Scotland. We have an established procedure within which local authorities can seek capital expenditure allocations to cover recycling projects. A summary of the procedure is given in my reply of 24 January 1991 to my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) at columns 306-07.

Infertility

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if the Home and Health Department has completed its response to the report of the National Medical Advisory Committee of the Scottish Health Advisory Council on the provision of infertility treatment for childless couples; when it is proposed to publish its recommendations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The National Medical Advisory Committee's report on infertility services in Scotland is being considered by a Scottish Office Home and Health Department project team with the remit of developing the issues it raises, particularly in relation to how an assisted reproduction service for Scotland might be introduced, structured, organised and funded. The report will be published when these issues have been fully considered.

Health Services

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which hospital boards will have an underspend on salaries at the end of the current financial year.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This information is not held centrally.

Local Government Finance

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland at what point after their Gulf posting local authorities are able to exempt (a) married and (b) single service personnel from the poll tax.

Mr. Allan Stewart: There is no provision for exempting service personnel from the personal community charge. However, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment announced on 19 February, the Government have concluded that service personnel and associated civilians posted to the Gulf should not have to bear the cost of the community charge during the period of their posting. The details of how this will be achieved are at present being finalised.

Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the average domestic rate bill in each local authority in Scotland which would be necessary to yield the same revenue as his estimate of the yield of the community charge in 1990-91 and 1991-92.

Mr. Allan Stewart [holding answer 12 March 1991]: In the absence of up-to-date information on the number of domestic rateable subjects it is not possible to answer this question precisely. The table is based on provisional outturn information from local authorities on the yield of the community charge in 1990-91 and the budgeted yield in 1991-92, together with details of the number of domestic subjects at 1 April 1988.

	Average rates yield per domestic subject to give same income as community charge in:

Scottish Homes

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of Scottish Homes grant-in-aid allocations has been spent in Greenock and Port Glasgow in 1989-90 and 1990-91 in percentage terms and as cash.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information sought is not held by the Scottish Office Environment Department. Allocations to particular areas are a matter for Scottish Homes.

Public Appointments

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the full-time and part-time public appointments for which he was responsible for each of the past eight years, together with the salary and the date when each appointment is due for renewal.

Mr. Lang: Table 1 shows the information requested as at 1 July 1990. Table 2 provides information in respect of these appointments for which I am jointly responsible with other Ministers. New appointments have been made in respect of most of the appointments which have expired since the annual updating of the list in July, but that information and similar lists for previous years could be produced only at disproportionate cost. The Cabinet Office publication "Public Bodies", however, published each year since 1982 and available in the Library, lists the public bodies to which appointments are made, including numbers of appointments and the remuneration paid.

I have made appointments to four major new bodies since July. Scottish Enterprise (which from April will take over the functions of the Scottish Development Agency and the Training Agency in lowland Scotland) has a part-time chairman (salary £43,000, appointed to 31 December 1993) and 10 members (salary £6,000, appointed to 30 September 1993). Highlands and Islands Enterprise (which from April will take over the functions of the Highlands and Islands Development Board and the Training Agency in the Highlands and Islands) has a full-time chairman (salary £57,105, appointed to 31 August 1992), one full-time member (salary £52,650, appointed to 30 April 1993) and eight part-time members (salary £6,000, one appointed to 31 October 1992 and seven to 30 August 1993). The Health Education Board for Scotland (which from April will replace the Scottish Health Education Group) has a part-time chairman (salary £13,500, appointed to 31 March 1995) and 10 members (salary £2,000, five appointed to 31 March 1993 and five to 31 March 1995). The Nature Conservancy Council for Scotland (which from April will take over the duties of the NCC in Scotland) has a part-time chairman (salary £20,000, appointed to 31 March 1992), 11 members (four with a salary of £8,616 and seven paid £5,385, all appointed to 31 March 1992). In addition the chief executives of the first three bodies are members ex-officio.

Ambulance Service

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what calculations his Department has made of the cost of replacing single-manned ambulances in Caithness and Sutherland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: A total of £2 million has been allocated to the Scottish ambulance service in the coming year to reduce the level of single-manning. The general manager is responsible for decisions on how the money will be spent in each ambulance area.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list on a regional basis in Scotland the location of incinerators used for the disposal of BSE cows; if he will list those counties where there are no such facilities; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will list on a regional basis in Scotland the number of BSE confirmed animals which were (a) incinerated and (b) buried in 1990 and the most recent figures for 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The movement of carcases of suspect BSE cattle for incineration or burial is not restricted by regional boundaries. Currently there are five incinerators in Scotland used to handle BSE carcases. These are located in Borders, Grampian, Lothian, Strathclyde and Tayside. In 1990, 593 carcases were incinerated and 10 were buried in Scotland. The figures for the first quarter of 1991 are not yet available.

Landfill Sites

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on planning policy for developments carried out near landfill sites.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 11 March 1991]: Planning authorities should exercise due caution in granting planning permission for development or redevelopment on or near landfill sites. The Scottish Office proposes to issue advice on planning policy in relation to development near landfill sites as part of wider guidance reflecting the changes to waste disposal legislation which are included in part II of the Environmental Protection Act 1990.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will introduce legislation to require planning authorities formally to consult waste disposal authorities on developments within 250 m of a landfill site.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 11 March 1991]: Our recent consultation paper on the review of the General Development Order included a proposal that planning authorities should have to consult the relevant waste disposal authority when considering a planning application for a proposed development within 250 m of land which is used, or has been used, for the deposit of waste. This requirement will be included in the Town and Country Planning (General Development Procedure) (Scotland) Order which we expect to lay before Parliament after the Easter recess.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make regulations to prescribe regular tests to be carried out by local authorities on open and on completed landfill sites regarding (a) methane production, (b) possible methane migration, (c) toxic infill materials and (d) the stability of the fill.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 11 March 1991]: We have no plans to make regulations on these particular issues. Authoritative guidance covering these aspects of waste management has been issued already by the Government in the form of a series of waste management papers. It is for the regulatory authorities to ensure that such matters are taken into account when exercising their functions in relation to active and completed landfill sites.

When the relevant sections of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 are implemented, waste regulation authorities will have a duty to have regard to such guidance.

Waste Disposal Authorities

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many waste disposal authorities are also planning authorities.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 11 March 1991]: Waste disposal authorities are the district and islands councils, 40 of which are also planning authorities.

Waste Disposal Departments

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will issue a circular to local authorities to ensure better co-ordination between planning and waste disposal departments.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 11 March 1991]: We shall shortly be issuing a circular to local authorities on the changes being made to the General Development Order, including the new requirement for the planning authorities to consult the relevant waste disposal authority about development within 250 m of a landfill site. Planning advice note 33 already urges local authorities to consult waste disposal authorities about proposed development on land which may be contaminated.

Homelessness

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish statistics listing the number of homeless applicants and the number of people housed under the homeless persons legislation by each local authority in Scotland in each of the last five years for which statistics are available.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 11 March 1991]: Returns submitted by local authorities to the Scottish Office indicate that the numbers of households applying for help under the homelessness legislation, and the numbers of those households for whom each authority secured permanent accommodation in the years 1985-86 to 1989-90, were as set out in the following table. The figures for 1989-90 are provisional, since returns may still be received from some authorities. In most years, some authorities failed to submit complete returns; the increase in the provisional figures for 1989-90 is in part the result of more comprehensive returns being received from some authorities.

In comparing the figures it should be noted that not all applicant households are found to be homeless. For example in 1989-90, provisional figures for Scotland indicate that 39 per cent. of applicant households were assessed to be homeless; another 23 per cent. were potentially homeless.

The figures given for those found accommodation exclude households for whom authorities secured short-stay accommodation.

Fords

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on provisions relating to warning signs at fords in the light of the incident at Knowes farm, East Linton, on 5 March; and if he will take steps to ensure that depth gauges are provided in association with such warnings where there is a possibility of dangerous flood conditions.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 12 March 1991]: The tragic loss of a young life as a result of the incident at Knowes farm, East Linton on 5 March, involving a car drifting down the River Tyne while crossing the ford, is very much to be regretted.

There is already a prescribed road sign to warn people of the existence of a ford. Roads authorities are at liberty to instal such signs without seeking the Secretary of State's consent. A prescribed gauge for indicating water depth at a ford is also available for use by roads authorities without the need for consent. Where it is felt that in particular circumstances further information should be provided in signs for road users the roads authority may seek the Secretary of State's authorisation for departures from the prescribed sign. The Scottish Office will respond as promptly as possible to any application for authorisation.

I would expect authorities to consider carefully whether depth gauges would be needed for fords in their areas.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Accommodation

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Lord President of the Council, pursuant to his answer of 25 February, Official Report, column 372, about consideration of the possible leasing of 7 Millbank, London SW1, how many rooms are available; when will the offices be available; what length of lease will be sought; and whether any office furniture will be included in any deal.

Mr. MacGregor: The agents' details indicate that No. 7 Millbank, which provides some 130,000 sq ft of accommodation, will become available at various dates later this year.

The other matters are primarily for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment who, I understand, still has a number of properties under consideration to meet the House's needs for accommodation.

Mr. Harris: To ask the Lord President of the Council what action is being taken to seek the views of hon. Members on the accommodation to be provided in the next phase of the new parliamentary building.

Mr. MacGregor: The chairman of the New Building Sub-Committee, the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell), wrote to all right hon. and hon. Members on 12 December 1990 seeking their views. The letter is repeated hereto for the convenience of Members who might wish to comment now. The views of the 1922 Committee, parliamentary Labour party and other political parties represented in the House were also sought.

On the basis of the views received so far, together with papers from Departments of the House and others, the Parliamentary Works Office has prepared for discussion purposes a draft brief and a diagometric layout of the new building. These will be on display in Committee Room 7 on Thursday, 21 March from 11 am to 5 pm to provide hon. Members with the opportunity to comment on the emerging proposals.

The Services Committee hopes to report its decisions to the House shortly after the Easter recess.

Dear Colleague,

The New Building Sub-Committee of the Services Committee is drawing up a design brief for Phase 2 of the new parliamentary building. Phase 2 will involve redeveloping the site currently occupied by Palace Chambers, Nos. 1 and 2 Bridge Street, and St. Stephen's House.

The Sub-Committee is anxious to consult as widely as possible within the House before drawing up its recommendations.

My colleagues and I are very much aware of the demand for improved standards of office accommodation for Members. Our top priority is to implement the recommendation of the Services Committee in 1987, that by the time the new building as a whole is complete, "every Member who wants a room of his or her own should have one".

When Phase 1 of the project is complete next year a considerable amount of extra accommodation will become available. This will include 60 Members' offices, 100 office spaces for Members' staff, new catering facilities, a small shop, a parliamentary bookshop and increased Library accommodation. Offices will also become available within the Palace as staff of the House are moved into Phase 1.

The opening of Phase 1 will improve the number and quality of Members' offices available but it will certainly not solve all the existing problems. It is realistic to suppose that a considerable part of Phase 2 will need to consist of Members' offices also. This in turn will reduce the amount of space in Phase 2 that can be used to provide other facilities.

The decisions the Services Committee will need to take will therefore be difficult ones. Hence our wish to sound the opinions of as many colleagues within the House as possible.

It would be helpful to the Sub-Committee if you could send any written evidence you wish to submit to the Clerk of the Sub-Committee in the Private Bill Office not later than Friday 1st February.

Yours sincerely

12th December 1990. RAY POWELL

Chairman.

Written Answers to Questions

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Repossessions

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Attorney-General how many possession orders on the grounds of mortgage arrears have been made in the Lambeth and Wandsworth county courts in the last year for which figures are readily available.

The Attorney-General: In 1990 Lambeth county court made 505 mortgage possession orders and Wandsworth county court made 497.

Trials (Statistics)

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Attorney-General whether he will list the average length in days of trials (a) on indictment and (b) in county courts in (i) England, (ii) Wales and (iii) Northern Ireland over the last five years.

The Attorney-General: Crown court hearing times are recorded in hours rather than days. The relevant information for Crown courts is given in the tables.

Crown Court committal for trial cases: Hearing times in hours

	England			Wales			Northern Ireland
	Trials	Guilty pleas	All cases	Trials	Guilty pleas	All cases	Trials	Guilty pleas	All cases
1986	7·5	0·6	3·1	8·0	0·7	3·4	13·9	0·9	3·1
1987	7·3	0·6	2·8	7·2	0·8	3·0	12·6	1·2	3·5
1988	7·4	0·7	2·6	8·0	0·8	2·8	15·1	0·9	4·6
1989	7·2	0·7	2·6	7·7	1·0	2·9	12·2	1·2	4·1
1990	7·1	0·7	2·6	7·5	1·0	3·0	13·2	1·3	4·7

Between 1987 and 1989 the information on county court hearing times was collected only on a sample basis, in terms of days, hours and minutes, for two months of each year. It is not possible to calculate an average hearing time from these data, unless an assumption is made about the average length of a day. However, the information for 1990 is available as follows.

	1990
County court trials: England	3·1
Hearing time in hours Wales	3·1

No information is collected on hearing times of county court trials heard in Northern Ireland.

Legal Aid Payments

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Attorney-General whether he will list the total payments from legal aid funds and the payments per head of the population in (i) England, (ii) Wales and (iii) Northern Ireland over the last five years.

The Attorney-General: The table sets out the total payments from legal aid funds and the payments per head of the population for England and Wales and for Northern Ireland. It is not possible to break down the information between England and Wales. These figures do not include administration costs.

Year	England and Wales		Northern Ireland
	Total payment £ thousands	Per head £	Total payment £ thousands	Per head £
1985-86	466,081	9·34	11,300	7·25

1989-90	726,678	14·37	17,300	10·93

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Attorney-General whether he will list the average payment from legal aid funds to (a) solicitors and (b) barristers in (i) England, (ii) Wales and (iii) Northern Ireland over the last five years.

The Attorney-General: Separate information is not available for England and Wales. The table sets out the average payment to (a) solicitors and (b) barristers from all forms of legal aid but excludes disbursements.

Year	Solicitors £	Barristers £
1985-86	161·39	218·78
1986-87	175·19	247·54
1987-88	188·08	274·82
1988-89	195·58	320·59
1989-90	216·85	365·41

Information on the number of payments made to solicitors and barristers in Northern Ireland is not available and therefore information on average payments cannot be provided.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

National Curriculum

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many additional administrative staff local education authorities have been required to employ as a result of the national curriculum; and how many in fact have been employed.

Mr. Eggar: Data are not available on the number of administrative staff employed by LEAs in connection with the national curriculum. The extent to which individual LEAs and schools think it appropriate to employ additional staff will depend on their circumstances, including the scope for redeploying existing staff to new tasks.

Higher Education

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is, for each year since 1975, and in 1990 moneys, the average public expenditure per student in higher education in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The available data on higher education unit public funding are shown in table 11.13 of the Department's report on "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1991-92 to 1993-94", Cm 1511, a copy of which is in the Library.

Architecture Courses

Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his answer of 6 February to the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs), Official Report, column 145-46, if he has yet reached a decision about the length of architecture courses; what representations he has received about the likely effects of a reduction in their length; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend is still considering this matter in the light of the responses received from RIBA, ARCUK and other bodies to which the Department's consultation paper on the length and structure of architecture courses was sent last August, the advice of the Universities and Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Councils on the outcome of their parallel consultations with institutions in their respective sectors, and the representations received from a number of other bodies and individuals. He is not yet in a position to announce his conclusions.

Institute of Food Research

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science, further to his answer to the hon. Member for South Shields of 11 March, Official Report, column 342, whether there have been or are planned to be any alterations to the parapet wall during the construction of the new building of the Institute of Food Research at the Reading university campus; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Howarth: A number of options were considered at the design stage concerning the parapet wall; the chosen option incorporated a safety handrail. There were no alterations to the parapet wall during the construction phase of the project; nor are any planned.

Special Schools

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what was the number of pupils with statements of special educational need in non-maintained special schools and independent schools under the arrangements of each local authority in January 1989 and 1990;

(2) how many pupils belonging to each local education authority attended non-maintained special schools and independent schools for the purposes of special education treatment in January 1989 and 1990.

Mr. Fallon [pursuant to the reply, 17 December 1990, c. 35-38]: The information provided in the original reply was incomplete. The table lists as at January 1989 the numbers of pupils belonging to each local education authority who are receiving special education treatment in non-maintained special schools and independent schools.

Number of pupils as at January 1989 for whom LEAs are paying tuition fees and who are attending: (a) non-maintained special schools; and (b) independent schools for the purpose of receiving special educational treatment

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Whisky Stocks

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make inquiries into the exclusion of whisky stocks from Lonrho's most recent published accounts in the light of their former inclusion.

Mr. Redwood: I see no reason to do so. The chief executive's statement included in the annual report for 1990 explains that the sale of bulk whisky stocks in 1989 was a one-off event. In future, for public companies with financial years starting after 23 December 1989, any questions about the accounts will be a matter for the Financial Reporting Review Panel.

Kuwait

Mr. Rathbone: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how accurately his Department's sector groups match the responsibility areas of individual Kuwait Ministries; and what arrangements he is making to ensure the closest liasion between the two.

Mr. Salisbury: The sector groups were originally set up to match areas of responsibility in the Kuwait emergency recovery programme, which broadly correspond to those of Kuwaiti Ministries. Some changes have since been made in the light of developments, but it is not considered feasible for their responsibilities to match those of Kuwaiti Ministries on every point.

Inner Cities Task Force

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish the results of the recent external evaluation of the inner cities task force initiative.

Mr. Leigh: The evaluation of task forces in Birmingham Handsworth, Doncaster and Rochdale was completed at the end of last year by PA Cambridge Economic Consultants. Their report is published today. A copy has been placed in the Library of the House.

Exporters

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has any new plans to help British exporters.

Mr. Salisbury: My right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and for Trade and Industry have agreed that a new unit, reporting to Ministers in both Departments, should be established on 2 April 1991. The unit—to be called the joint directorate—will be responsible for the development of export promotion policy.

Its aims will be to: deploy staff effectively in the United Kingdom and overseas, in line with the priorities for export promotion; ensure that all staff engaged in export promotion are trained to consistent standards; provide a fully integrated service both at home and overseas; and improve the ability to respond swiftly and effectively to the changing needs of United Kingdom businesses.

Earlier today, the British Overseas Trade Board published the second edition of its forward plan. The plan, which has the full support of Ministers, sets out the priorities which will guide the way in which the substantial resources available for export promotion will be used in 1991-92.

Information about the joint directorate and copies of the forward plan have been placed in the Library.

Iraq

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement giving details of the assistance which is being provided by his Department to those United Kingdom companies which face delayed time of completion penalty clauses in contracts with Iraq.

Mr. Salisbury [holding answer 11 March 1991]: My Department is giving urgent consideration to what further measures might be taken to ensure that, as far as is possible, companies do not find themselves liable to penalties as a result of being unable to fulfil contracts because of sanctions. The Export Credits Guarantee Department will consider, and is considering, claims from its customers in accordance with the terms of the policies they hold.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Purchasing and Distribution

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the full annual cost, including overheads, of his Department's purchasing activity.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: In 1989-90 the annual cost, including overheads, of the purchasing and supply activity of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office was £2,294,423. For the current financial year, the cost is likely to be £2,300,000. With adjustment for inflation, this would represent a decrease in real terms of 5 per cent.

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many people in his Department are wholly or substantially involved in purchasing stores and distribution activities.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: In the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, 54 staff are engaged full-time on the purchasing and supply activity. A further 17 officers spend over 50 per cent. of their time on purchasing work.

Value for Money

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures of performance are employed by his Department to ensure value for money.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office diplomatic wing uses a variety of performance measures, which vary according to the function or activity involved, to ensure value for money. Specific value for money targets for the last two financial years have been notified to Parliament in evidence on the annual public expenditure White Paper. Some of the most significant of these measures will continue to be published annually in the departmental report, which replaced the public expenditure White Paper.

In the aid programme, value for money is ensured through the application of the Overseas Development Administration's aid effectiveness procedures which are set out in the annual departmental report.

Hostages

Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what new steps he is taking to speed up the release of British hostages held in Beirut; and if he will make a statement on his latest approach to the Governments of Syria and Lebanon in this connection.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) on 13 March, at column 549. The Syrian Foreign Minister confirmed to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on 6 February his Government's intention to continue their efforts to obtain the release of western, including British, hostages in Lebanon. My hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs is visiting Damascus this week. Her Majesty's ambassador in Beirut maintains close and regular contacts with all those in Lebanon who might be able to influence the hostages' release.

Kuwait

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what statements Her Majesty's ambassador to Kuwait has made about the treatment of Palestinian nationals in Kuwait.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: In an interview with BBC Radio 4 last weekend Mr. Weston, the British ambassador in Kuwait, spoke of the reasons why the authorities in Kuwait were detaining and screening Palestinians. He made it clear that he did not believe the Kuwaiti authorities were carrying out reprisals. In answer to a question, Mr. Weston agreed that not all the Palestinian former residents of Kuwait could be assured of future residence and employment in Kuwait.

Weapons

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the Attorney-General's answer of 11 March, Official Report, column 364, for what reasons Her Majesty's Government have decided not yet to ratify the specific conventional weapons convention or to accept the protocol on prohibitions or restrictions on the use of incendiary weapons; and whether he has any plans to ratify them.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We are still considering ratification of the United Nations weaponry convention, and in particular whether to accept the optional protocol No. III, which restricts the use of incendiary weapons in certain circumstances. We hope to be able to come to a decision on ratification when this review is complete.

The Gulf (Belgian Contribution)

Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a further statement about the Belgian financial contribution to the United Kingdom's role in the Gulf crisis.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am sorry that my reply to my hon. Friend's oral question of 13 March, at column 934, was inadvertently inaccurate in one respect. On 27 February the Belgian Government announced a contribution of £15 million towards British military expenditure in the Gulf. We welcomed this concrete expression of international solidarity.

ENERGY

Sizewell B

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what consultations he has had with the nuclear installations inspectorate concerning the Westinghouse digital protection system governing the computerised safety monitoring system for the Sizewell B nuclear power station.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate—NII—is assessing the computerised protection systems for Sizewell B as part of the continuing licensing process. It is also assessing the secondary protection system, which is fitted to Sizewell B in addition to the digital system, and which employs established United Kingdom technology. The nuclear installations inspectorate will not permit fuel to be loaded into the reactor until it has assessed Nuclear Electric's safety case for the station and found it to be adequate.

Trawsfynydd Nuclear Power Station

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will request a report from the nuclear installations inspectorate on the shutdown in February of the Trawsfynydd nuclear power station.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I am aware of the shutdown, but I have no plans to ask the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate for a specific report on the matter. The decision to shut down the Trawsfynydd reactors was taken by the operators, Nuclear Electric plc, and was to enable adjustments to be made in order to allow operation at reduced pressure. The reactors will not be permitted to return to power until the NII is satisfied with the operator's safety case for such action.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next expects to meet the chairman of Nuclear Electric to discuss pressure vessel integrity in the reactors at the Magnox nuclear power station at Trawsfynydd.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My right hon. Friend has no plans to hold such discussions. The matter is an operational one for Nuclear Electric, which is keeping the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate informed.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will be proposing any alteration in the level of the non-fossil fuel obligation following the cut in output at the Trawsfynydd nuclear power station.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The nuclear non-fossil fuel obligation—SI 1990/263—was fully complied with by the regional electricity companies through the arrangements they submitted to the Director General of Electricity Supply by 1 April 1990. However, in the event of any contracted capacity ceasing to be available for a cause other than an act or omission on the part of a regional electricity company, the order provides that the level of the obligation shall be deemed to reduce accordingly.

Gas-fired Power Stations

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will make it his policy to consider the availability of gas for other customers when considering licence applications for gas-fired electricity power stations.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Applications for electricity generation licences are a matter for the Director General of Electricity Supply.

Petroleum Production

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what are the Government's latest forecasts of levels of United Kingdom petroleum production.

Mr. Wakeham: The latest forecasts for United Kingdom petroleum production in the years 1991 to 1995 are as follows:

	Million tonnes
1991	80-100
1992	80-105
1993	80-115
1994	90-125
1995	90-125

As in previous years, the forecasts are presented in the form of a range of outcomes for each year. These take into account the many uncertainties involved. The figures include stabilised crude oil, natural gas liquids—NGLs—and condensates. NGL and condensate production is expected to contribute between 4 million and 10 million tonnes annually.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Company Cars

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the amount of additional revenue raised if the capital and running costs of company-owned cars were included in the calculation of taxable income for income tax and national insurance purposes on the basis of actual costs incurred.

Mr. Maude: Employees who have cars made available to them for private use are charged to tax on the basis of scale charges for broad bands of types of car and depending on the current business mileage. The actual costs incurred by employers in providing cars are not known. However, in considering the appropriate level for the scale charges, a full range of appropriate capital and running costs is taken into account. The value of employer-provided cars is not subject to the national insurance charge.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which of his Ministers has been given responsibility for energy use by his Department; and what is his or her brief regarding energy efficiency.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I am responsible for energy use in HM Treasury. My brief is to reduce energy consumption within the Treasury and to support cost-effective measures to obtain benefits from the more efficient use of energy in all Departments.

Employee Share Ownership

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the latest calculation on the numbers of employees who benefit from schemes set up under (i) FA1978, (ii) FA1980 and (iii) FA1984 for employee share or share option arrangements; what were the comparable figures for a year ago; and what are the values attributable to each of these figures.

Mr. Francis Maude [holding answer 13 March 1991]: Estimates for the two most recent years for which figures are available are as follows:

	FA1978 schemes		FA1980 schemes		FA1984 schemes
	Number of participants receiving share allocations in year	Initial market value of shares appropriated	Number of employees to whom options granted during year	Initial value of shares over which options granted	Number of employees to whom option granted during year	Initial value of shares over which options granted

1989-90	850	380	440	990	100	1,700

Profit-related Pay

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the average percentage of pay in profit-related pay schemes in each year; and what is their distribution.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 25 February 1991]: The information is as follows:

Live schemes with profit periods ending in	Profit related pay as a percentage of total pay. All schemes.
1988-89	6·5
1989-90	7·3

Live schemes with profit periods ending in	Range of profit related pay as a percentage of total pay

1989-89	16	48	17	19	100
1989-90	24	46	21	9	100

Personal Pensions

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the tax relief on the employer's share of the personal pensions rebate paid by the Inland Revenue to the Department of Social Security for each of the years for which figures are available; and what is his estimate of the costs for each of the future years for which estimates are available.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 8 March 1991]: There is no additional tax relief on the employer's share of national insurance contribution rebates for personal pensions. Payments made to the Department of Social Security by the Inland Revenue as tax relief on the employees' share are as follows:

Year	£ million
1988-89	37

[1]Estimated.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the cost of tax relief on the future income of the funds invested to provide personal pensions, using the technical assumption that the rate of return which will build up in personal pension schemes would otherwise have been subject to tax in the hands of individuals and institutions.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 8 March 1991]: Such an estimate would depend on future levels of investment, rates of return and tax rates.

TRANSPORT

Rail Services

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much has been spent on (a) improvements to the east coast main line and (b) support for provincial railway services in the Northern region in each year since 1987.

Mr. McLoughlin: Figures are not available for BR investment and Government support in particular geographical regions.

Hungary (Negotiations)

Mr. Grist: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, if he will announce the outcome of recent negotiations on road transport between his Department and the Hungarian Ministry of Transport.

Mr. Chope: These negotiations resulted in agreement to abolish with immediate effect the quota on the number of lorry journeys permitted annually between the UK and Hungary. From 1 January 1992, the need to carry a permit will also be abolished. This welcome extension of liberalisation means that British hauliers will no longer be prevented from carrying out business by a lack of Hungarian permits.

Seat Belts

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will announce the outcome of the consultation exercise about the proposal to introduce mandatory seat belt wearing for adults in the rear seats of cars and taxis.

Mr. Rifkind: The consultation period ran from 16 November 1990 to 31 January 1991. Some 1,100 copies of the consultation document were issued and to date 81 responses have been received. My Department has also received a number of letters on this subject in response to press reports, rather than to the consultation document itself.

There was overwhelming support for the proposal, including those from the Parliamentary Advisory Council for Transport Safety, the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents, the police, the motoring organisations and all 36 local authorities which responded.

I am today sending to all those who responded draft regulations, on which comments are invited by 12 April. I have placed copies in the Library. The intention is to lay the regulations before the House after Easter with a view to implementation on 1 July this year.

Channel Tunnel

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will list those locations being considered by his Department as possible freight terminals offering trunk rail services from Scotland to the channel tunnel;

(2) what provision he is making for relevant bodies, such as regional or district councils in Scotland, to consult his Department on possible freight terminals offering trunk rail services from Scotland to the channel tunnel.

Mr. Freeman: The siting of regional terminals for channel tunnel freight traffic is a commercial matter for British Rail. British Rail is currently discussing possible locations in Strathclyde with local authorities and private sector developers.

North Sea Standby Vessels

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will list those North sea standby vessels which do not meet the requirements of recommendation 89 of the Cullen report;

(2) if he will list those North sea standby vessels which meet the requirements of recommendation 89 of the Cullen report.

Mr. McLoughlin: The information is not available from the survey records kept by the Department, but, since September 1990, most ships converting for standby vessel duties have been meeting those requirements of the Cullen report which the Department had anticipated it might contain. The full requirements of recommendation 89 have now been incorporated into the Department's latest standard for standby vessels.

Cam Spirit

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the name of the Silver Pit was changed to the Cam Spirit.

Mr. McLoughlin: The change of name was recorded in the register of ships on 4 September 1990.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether the current refit of the Silver Pit/Cam Spirit will result in that vessel meeting all the requirements of recommendation 89 of the Cullen report on Piper Alpha.

Mr. McLoughlin: The refit is not complete, but the present intention of the owner is that the vessel will meet the relevant recommendations of the Cullen report.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all official inspections and surveys of the Silver Pit/Cam Spirit carried out since the Piper Alpha disaster.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Silver Pit was inspected by marine surveyors of the Department in July 1988 shortly after the Piper Alpha disaster. Further surveys were carried out in December 1988, January 1989 and December 1989. She was also inspected by authorities in the Netherlands in July 1990 for operation in their sector of the North sea.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the periods when the Silver Pit/Cam Spirit has been on duty in the North sea since the Piper Alpha disaster; and the nature of her duties in each case.

Mr. McLoughlin: After the Piper Alpha disaster the Silver Pit continued to operate at various locations in the North sea, but separate operational records of standby vessels are not maintained by the Department. This information will be contained in the ship's log books, but could be extracted only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all modifications made to the Silver Pit/Cam Spirit between the Piper Alpha disaster and the current refit.

Mr. McLoughlin: During this period no modifications were made to the structure of the vessel. But the fast rescue craft and the Department of Trade and Industry DOTI boat were renewed, the bow thruster unit replaced, the lubricating oil piping repaired, the generator engine re-aligned, and a number of other deficiencies made good.

Accident (M4)

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if his Department will hold an inquiry into the causes of the multiple road accident on the M4 in Berkshire, between junctions 14 and 15, on Wednesday 13 March, including the significance of motorists ignoring the weather conditions; if he will indicate the weather conditions at the time and whether the fog/speed warning lights were switched on; and what consideration he is giving to whether the fire which followed the collision suggests a need for manufacturers to look again at fire hazards on heavy goods vehicles and cars.

Mr. Chope: I offer my condolences to those who were injured and to the relatives of those who were killed in this tragic accident.

The police are still carrying out investigations and are not able to give a definite opinion on the causes of the accident. I have asked to see the report of the investigation as soon as it is available and shall consider urgently what lessons may be learnt including, as my hon. Friend suggests, lessons about driver behaviour.

There was blanket fog in the area and preliminary indications are that drivers were driving too fast for these conditions. I also understand that the warning lights in the area were not switched on before the accident. This was a decision by the police, which was in accordance with advice given to all police forces by the Association of Chief Police Officers, that they should be used only for hazards which are not readily apparent to drivers, and not for general adverse weather conditions. I have already spoken to the chief constables of Thames Valley and Wiltshire constabularies. We are arranging to meet to discuss this policy.

My Department continually seeks to reduce the risk of fires in vehicles and liaises both with manufacturers and with fire services on research into better design for this purpose.

HEALTH

Food Safety

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the recommendations of the World Health Organisation's 1989 consultation report on health surveillance and management procedures for food handling personnel in relation to food service operations.

Mr. Dorrell: This is an interesting report which is consistent with the Government's view that food handlers should receive training in food hygiene. We will consider its recommendations carefully before determining our overall policy on training of food handlers.

Neonatal Care

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many neonatal intensive care cots there are in England.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Neonatal intensive care cots in maternity units are not separately identified in returns submitted to the Department. Of those not in maternity units, 3,496 intensive care cots were in use during 1989-90, of which 865 were in regionally designated intensive care units.

General Medical Services

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give the total annual expenditure, in cash and adjusted for changes in input unit costs, on general medical services for each family health authority in each year since 1985.

Mr. Dorrell: The total annual expenditure on general medical services—GMS—in cash and adjusted by the GMS service inflation factor has been placed in the Library. Details are provided for each family health services authority and aggregated at regional health authority and national level.

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give, for each family health services authority, the cost per patient of general medical services.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is in the table.

Mentally Handicapped Children

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the level of provision of care available to children with severe learning difficulties, extreme challenging behaviour and autism and on the provision of care available to them after they are of school age.

Mr. Dorrell: It is for local statutory authorities to determine the form and extent of services to be provided locally in the light of their knowledge of local needs and resources. We would expect the relevant education, social services and health authorities to work together with parents to identify what arrangements are appropriate for a young person leaving full-time education. Detailed statistics on the range of services provided are not held centrally, but in 1989 there were 2,032 places in local authority, voluntary and private homes and hostels for mentally handicapped children.

Dentists

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many dentists in each FHSA have withdrawn from the NHS since 1 October 1990.

Mr. Dorrell: Between 1 October 1990 and 28 February 1991, 509 dentists withdrew from Family Health Services Authority—FHSA—dental lists in England, and 394 dentists were added to those lists. This represents a net decrease of 115, less than 0·7 per cent. of the total. The details for each FHSA in England are set out in the table.

These figures are derived from information on the number of registered dentists on an FHSA list as notified by FHSAs to the Dental Practice Board. Since some dentists practise in more than one FHSA, the total number of different dentists for England is less than the sum of the dentists for individual FHSAs.

Hearing Aids

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether his Department has any plans to introduce charges for replacement batteries for national health service hearing aids.

Mr. Dorrell: No.

Children at Risk

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many children who are or may be at significant risk have not been allocated to a qualified social worker; and what action is being taken to remedy the position.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information collected centrally about children who are or may be at risk relates to children on the child protection register.

A child's name is normally placed on the child protection register following discussion at a case conference, convened by the social services department or by the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, when abuse or potential abuse is confirmed and an inter-agency agreement is made to work co-operatively to protect the child. When a registered child moves, the child should be registered at once pending the first case conference in the new area.

The most up-to-date information about numbers on child protection registers relates to 31 March 1990. This information is collected from all local authorities in England and is published in the provisional feedback "Children and Young Persons on Child Protection Registers, year ending 31 March 1990, England". Copies are available in the Library.

The latest information about the number of children on the registers in London boroughs who are not allocated to a social worker is published in "Child Protection Services in London, Aspects of Management Arrangements in Social Services Departments, 31 December 1989", together with numbers on the registers at the time at which the survey took place. Copies are available in the Library. Similar information is not available centrally for the rest of England.

It is for individual local authorities to make arrangements to carry out the child protection plans for children in their area on the child protection register. The social services inspectorate offers positive support to local authorities in their efforts to maintain and develop the child protection services which they have a duty to provide.

London Ambulance Service

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list (a) for each of the last six months and (b) for each division of the London ambulance service (i) the total number of non-emergency ambulance journeys and (ii) the number of cancelled patient journeys by category.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not held centrally. The management of the London ambulance service is the reponsibility of the London ambulance service board. The hon. Member may wish to write to Mr. James Harris, the chairman of the board, for details.

Immunisation and Cervical Screening

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of general practitioners in each family health services authority received target payments for childhood immunisation and cervical screening in the first six months of 1990-91.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [pursuant to her reply, 11 February 1991, c. 351-56]: I regret that the table published contained errors in respect of Suffolk and Wakefield family health services authorities. The correct figures are as follows:—

FHSA	Higher payment	Lower payment	Total
Childhood Immunisation percentage qualifying
Suffolk	93	7	99
Wakefield	44	43	87
Pre-School booster percentage qualifying
Suffolk	89	11	99
Wakefield	32	34	66
Cervical Cytology percentage qualifying
Suffolk	89	12	100
Wakefield	90	9	99

NB. Figures for higher and lower payments may not add to total because of rounding error.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Justices of the Peace

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the number of justices of the peace in Stockport and Tameside by ward; and what steps have been taken over the last three years to increase the proportion of young JPs, women JPs, JPs from ethnic minorities and JPs from under-represented wards.

Mr. Chris Patten: My advisory committees in the area of Stockport and Tameside have done their best to improve the balance in appointment of magistrates as suggested; they have been partially successful and I shall be sending the hon. Gentleman the figures separately in due course.

WALES

Homelessness

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) pursuant to his answer to the right hon. Member for Swansea, West of 20 February, Official Report, column 151, how much of the support for Swansea Accommodation for the Single Homeless for 1990-91 is for staff costs; and if he will list the projects for which support for staff costs is provided;

(2) if he will give details of all proposed support from his Department to Swansea Accommodation for the Single Homeless for 1991-92; how much of this is to meet staff costs; and if he will list the projects for which support for staff costs is to be provided.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The information requested is as follows:

Source of Welsh Office funding	Amount £	Staff costs[1] £	Project
1990-91
1. Section 73 of the Housing Act 1985	71,150	45,650	Resettlement and housing provision
2. Urban programme	33,600	25,200	Day centre
3. Grant under Section 28(a) of the National Health Service Act 1977	19,000	13,100	Life skills support
1991-92
1. Section 73 of the Housing Act 1985	Application currently being considered
2. Urban Programme	33,600	25,200	Day centre
3. Grant under Section 28(a) of the National Health Service Act 1977	17,000	11,700	Life skills support

[1] Staff costs only include salaries and National Insurance costs.

Health Service

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many operating theatres in Wales are closed (a) because of a shortage of staff and (b) by other measures.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: This information is not available centrally.

Health Boards (Appointments)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his policy on appointments to health boards in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The Welsh chapter of the White Paper "Working for Patients" announced that in making non-executive appointments to district health authorities there would be a strong emphasis on leadership and top-level management qualities. That remains the position. Persons are appointed on the strength of the skills and experience they can bring to the work of an authority and not because they represent particular organisations or interests.

Executive members of authorities are members either by virtue of the post they hold or because, in accordance with the relevant legislation, they have been appointed by the chairman, non-executive members and the general manager acting jointly.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many long-term unemployed there are in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: In January 1991 there were 24,020 long-term unemployed claimants in Wales—that is, those claiming benefit for 12 months or more.

Primary Schools (Testing)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he plans to meet (a) the teacher organisations and (b) the parent-teacher associations concerning primary school testing.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Although I have no immediate plans to meet representatives from teacher organisations and parent-teacher associations, they are being fully consulted about the development of the statutory arrangements for the assessment of primary school pupils.

North-south Roads

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what progress he has made concerning improvements to north-south roads in Wales.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The Welsh Office has spent £165 million on 35 improvement schemes to the A470 and A483 since 1979. The A470 Llanidloes bypass was opened on 25 February; the A483 Chirk bypass is on course for completion in the spring. Information on further plans for improving north-south links is contained in the 1991 supplement to "Roads in Wales", published on 25 February.

Council Housing

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he proposes to meet the Association of District Councils in Wales to discuss council house building; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: I shall be meeting the Welsh Housing Consultative Committee next month, and representatives of local authorities may well raise this subject then.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he proposes to enable the district councils in the valleys of Wales to build more council houses.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Within the context of their enabling role, local authorities in the valleys, as elsewhere, work in close partnership with housing associations to make the most effective use of public resources in the provision of new social housing.

Pwllpeirian Hill Experimental Farm

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he is now in a position to announce what plans he has for Pwllpeirian Hill experimental farm, Cwmystwyth; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave him on 16 January 1991, at column 517.

A44

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what progress is being made in upgrading the A44 trunk road from Aberystwyth to Llangurig; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The Blaeng'euffordd footway and Llangurig junction improvements were completed last year. Tenders have been invited for the Capel Bangor footway improvement scheme and draft statutory orders for the Penllwyn crossroads improvement are expected to be published by early summer.

School Facilities

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what extra resources he will make available to make good deficiencies in the schools library service, as instanced by Her Majesty's inspectorate for Wales's annual report; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he proposes to make extra resources available to re-equip school laboratories and workshops; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The responsibility for the allocation of resources for school libraries, laboratories and workshops lies with local education authorities which must decide such matters in line with their assessment of priorities within the education service.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will take steps to ensure that there are sufficient numbers of staff in the local education authorities of Wales to ensure that school libraries are opened and supervised during school hours; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Decisions on staffing levels for services such as school libraries are for local education authorities and individual schools to take in the light of local needs and circumstances.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what average amount per pupil has been spent on library books in each of the local education authorities in Wales for each year since 1980.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The information is not held centrally.

Technology and Design

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he proposes to make extra resources available to meet the requirements of the national curriculum in technology and design.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Additional funding has been provided and existing resources redirected under the specific grants for education support and training schemes to help local education authorities with the progressive implementation of all subjects within the national curriculum, including technology. It is not possible to identify support given for a particular subject, but approved expenditure related to the national curriculum under these specific grant programmes rose from almost £7 million in 1989-90 to just under £10 million in the current financial year. This will rise again to over £14·5 million in 1991-92 and we intend to continue support in future years.

Local education authorities are being asked to target expenditure on the needs of pupils directly affected by the phased introduction of the core and foundation subjects of the national curriculum. Technology commenced implementation into schools from August 1990.

Specialist Teachers

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the ratio of the number of specialist advisers to the number of teachers in each subject in each education authority in Wales.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Local Government Finance

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of local authority income was provided or will be provided for each year from 1979-80 to 1991-92 by (a) rate or revenue support grant, (b) domestic rates or poll tax and (c) non-domestic rates or receipts from the non-domestic rate pool for (a) Cynon Valley, (b) Mid Glamorgan and (c) Wales as a whole.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The figures requested are shown in the following table; 1979-80 and 1980-81 are not available on a consistent basis.

The community charge system uses a different method for sharing out the various elements making up the total income, so the two parts of the table are not comparable.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing for (a) each local authority, (b) each class of authority and (c) Wales as a whole, the capital receipts accumulated by 31 March and his estimates of the amount set aside as provision for credit liabilities in 1990-91 from (i) housing capital receipts, (ii) non-housing capital receipts and (iii) all capital receipts.

Mr. David Hunt: The table shows total cash-backed accumulated receipts at 31 March 1990. The amount each authority has set aside as provision for credit liabilities in 1990-91 is not available centrally.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the cost to his Department of (a) implementing and (b) monitoring the community charge or poll tax in Wales in the financial years (i) 1989-90 and (ii) 1990-91; and what is his estimate of the cost for 1991-92.

Mr. David Hunt: Staff and related costs for implementation of the new local government finance systems, including the introduction of the community charge, were £305,000 in 1989-90. Expenditure in that year on publicity amounted to £450,000. For 1990-91, staff and related costs for administration of the systems will be £330,000. I anticipate staff and related costs for 1991-92 of £375,000.

River Taff

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has to fund the Keep Wales Tidy campaign and National Rivers Authority proposal for a consortium to undertake a two-stage clean-up of the River Taff and its banks.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: I understand that the Keep Wales Tidy campaign expects to fund phase 1 of the project—the study phase—from contributions by the Welsh Development Agency, the National Rivers Authority, the Cardiff Bay development corporation and local authorities in the Taff valley.

When phase 1 has been completed the local authorities concerned will be able to apply for funding for the next phase—the project proper—from the urban programme and such applications would be considered alongside other competing priorities for urban programme support. The next opportunity to submit such bids will be at the end of July this year for projects commencing in 1992-93.

Minor Operations

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the cost of minor operations carried out by general practitioners and the cost of equivalent treatment through the hospital service.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: The new contract for GPs, which came into force on 1 April 1990, introduced a new payment to GPs who personally provide minor surgery services and who are on the minor surgery list of their local family health services authority. In Wales payments made to GPs since the introduction of the scheme amount to £513,187. Information regarding the cost of equivalent treatment through the hospital service is not held centrally.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Drake Hall (Absconding Prisoners)

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prisoners absconded from Drake Hall open prison in 1989;

(2) how many prisoners absconded from Drake Hall open prison in 1990;

(3) how many prisoners absconded from Drake Hall open prison in 1988.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The number of prisoners who absconded in each of the three years referred to is as follows:

	Number
1988	48
1989	81
1990	57

These figures include prisoners who absented themselves from the prison and those prisoners who failed to return having been temporarily released for such purposes as home leave.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prisoners who absconded from Drake Hall open prison in 1900 were recaptured;

(2) how many prisoners who absconded from Drake Hall open prison in 1988 were recaptured;

(3) how many prisoners who absconded from Drake Hall open prison in 1989 were recaptured.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: In 1988 a total of 38 prisoners unlawfully at large from Drake Hall open prison were recaptured.

During 1989 a total of 64 prisoners unlawfully at large from Drake Hall open prison were recaptured. Of these, three had absconded during 1988.

During 1990 a total of 53 prisoners unlawfully at large from Drake Hall open prison were recaptured. Of these, two had absconded during 1989.

During 1991, two prisoners who had absconded during 1990 have been recaptured.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prisoners who absconded from Drake Hall open prison in 1989 and have not been recaptured were serving sentences for drug-related offences;

(2) how many prisoners who absconded from Drake Hall open prison in 1990 and have not been recaptured were serving sentences for drug-related offences;

(3) how many prisoners who absconded from Drake Hall open prison in 1988 and have not been recaptured were serving sentences for drug-related offences.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Of those prisoners who absconded during 1988 and remain unlawfully at large, a total of four were in custody for drug-related offences.

Of those prisoners who absconded during 1989 and remain unlawfully at large, a total of 12 were in custody for drug-related offences.

Of those prisoners who absconded during 1990 and remain unlawfully at large, a total of three were in custody for drug-related offences.

Video Films (Rental to Children)

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has yet received the report of the investigation undertaken by the Federation Against Copyright Theft at the request of the Video Standards Council into the background circumstances of two surveys undertaken by the Birmingham Sunday Mercury into age-restricted videos being rented to children below the specified age.

Mr. John Patten: The Video Standards Council—a trade body—sent us a copy of this report last August. The report urged video dealers to be more careful to comply with the law and supported tougher enforcement against those who do not. It did not call for any immediate action by the Government.

Broadcasting (Independent Productions)

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to lay an order under section 16(5) of the Broadcasting Act 1990 in relation to independent productions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Section 16(2)(h) of the Broadcasting Act requires regional Channel 3 licensees to ensure that in each year not less than 25 per cent. of the total amount of time allocated to the broadcasting of qualifying programmes in their service is allocated to the broadcasting of a range and diversity of independent productions. Under section 16(5) of the Act, I am empowered to specify, by order, the definition of "qualifying programmes" and "independent productions". I hope to lay the draft of such an order before the House later this month.

In drawing up the draft order, I shall have regard to the current voluntary independent production initiative, in which the independent television companies and the BBC are participants, the details of which my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton) announced on 28 April 1988. I am, however, minded to make one important change to the current arrangements. Under the voluntary initiative, an independent producer is defined as one in which no broadcaster has any shareholding. Although I accept the need to limit the scope for undue influence which may arise through cross-shareholdings of this kind, I believe that the present requirement is too restrictive and is not in the best interests of the independent sector itself. I therefore propose to permit a broadcaster to have up to a 15 per cent. shareholding in an independent producer, and to apply a similar limit on investment by an independent producer in a broadcaster.

I have placed a more detailed set of proposals in the Library.

Metropolitan Police

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the Metropolitan police establishment for 1991-92; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have agreed with the Commissioner some important changes to the way in which the Metropolitan police establishment is presented.

Up to now, the Metropolitan police establishment has been presented as a single figure. No distinction is made between those posts available for operational policing across the Metropolitan police district; posts funded nationally or by other organisations, for example, at Heathrow airport, and which are therefore tied to the particular purpose for which those funds are given; and posts in support both locally and at headquarters.

I have agreed therefore a more detailed way of presenting the figures which will enable the public to see more clearly how the resources available to the force are being deployed.

We have also made some changes in the way the establishment is formed. First, we are bringing the Metropolitan police into line with provincial forces in the way in which their officers who are assigned to central or common police service posts are shown on the establishment. In the case of provincial forces, such officers are already treated as supernumerary to the establishment of the force. In future, the Metropolitan police will likewise no longer carry such officers within their establishment and, accordingly, it will be reduced by the extent of the current commitment to central and common police services.

Secondly, I have agreed an important value for money initiative put forward by the Commissioner. This enables the moneys used at present to fund certain police posts which require neither the powers nor the skills of a police officer to be used instead to fund civilian posts. The extra funds released in this way will enable further much-needed civilian support to be funded or officers to be redeployed on operational duties. The total establishment figure will naturally reduce as such police posts are "cashed in" in this way. One hundred posts have been cashed in this year, the effect of which has been to allow the Commissioner to provide more support staff while preserving the present strength of operational police officers. I am confident this change will enable the Commissioner to manage his manpower resources better and deliver an improved service.

The effects of these and other changes, including the increase of 100 posts I announced on 20 December 1990 to take effect from the end of 1991-92, is that the Metropolitan police establishment for 1991-92 will be 28,486, of which 709 are reimbursable posts, 4,609 are support and specialist posts and 23,168 will be available for operational policing in the Metropolitan police district.

European Court

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he proposes to make arrangements for the reviewing of life sentences following the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights on 25 October 1990.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The Government are carefully considering the implications of the court's judgment to see what changes are necessary to the existing arrangements for reviewing the cases of discretionary life sentence prisoners in order to meet the requirements of the European convention on human rights.

Passport Office

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what parties have been organised to coincide with the new agency status for the Passport Office; what is the cost to the Exchequer; how many people have been invited; and where these entertainments are being held.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: It is proposed to mark the launch of the United Kingdom Passport Agency as an executive agency of the Home Office on 2 April 1991 with events at the six regional passport offices in Belfast, Glasgow, Liverpool, London, Newport and Peterborough, at the passport records unit at Hayes, Middlesex, and at the Queen Elizabeth II conference centre in London.

The events will be attended by the staff of the agency, and invitations will also be extended to representations of foreign governments, the travel trade, Government Departments and others with whom the agency will have a business relationship.

These gatherings will provide an opportunity to outline the agency's plans for obtaining the maximum benefit from the change to executive agency status under the Government's "next steps" initiative in terms of value for money and a continuing emphasis on high levels of service to the public. They will also be used to publicise ways of making the best use of the passport service, for example by sending non-urgent applications by post rather than applying in person at a passport office. About 1,900 staff and business contacts of the Passport Agency are expected to attend the eight events at an overall average cost in the region of £10 per person.

Voluntary Organisations

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the main funding headings which are used in providing grants to voluntary organisations and the changes that have taken place over the last five years.

Mr. John Patten: On 4 April last year my right hon. and noble Friend, the then Home Secretary, announced the publication of the report of the efficiency scrutiny of Government funding of the voluntary sector. Annex D of that report, a copy of which is in the Library, contains a list of grant schemes through which voluntary organisations were funded in 1987-88 and 1988-89. Details of changes which have taken place over the last five years are not available centrally.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in a table under the relevant headings all funding given to voluntary organisations in the most recent year for which figures are available and for the previous four years.

Mr. John Patten: Details of the total funding given to voluntary organisations by Government Departments are announced each year by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. Details for 1988-89 were announced on 11 May last year at columns 254-55. Similar announcements covering total grants made in 1987-88, 1986-87 and 1985-86 were made on 16 May 1989 at columns 120-21, 14 April 1988 at columns 217-19 and 2 March 1987 at columns 464-65. An announcement in respect of total funding in 1989-90 is expected to be made shortly.

A list of all voluntary organisations funded by Government Departments was placed in the Library when details of grants made in 1988-89 were announced last May.

Police Records

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the availability to hon. Members of information about the names, dates of conviction, offences of conviction and length of sentences of convicted persons.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: In general, police records are regarded as confidential and information is not disclosed from them unless there are important considerations of public interest. Exceptions to the general rule of confidentiality are usually only made for the protection of vulnerable members of society; to ensure probity in the administration of the law; and national security.

Immigration

Mr. Gorst: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the statutory provisions that govern whether an individual whose application for entry into the United Kingdom as the spouse of a British citizen has been rejected by an entry clearance office in the Indian sub-continent, and who has appealed to an adjudicator against that decision, may be allowed to be present in person when that appeal is heard; and if he will list the circumstances in which that person can be permitted to attend a hearing of their case, or be in the United Kingdom at the time when it is heard.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: There is no provision in the Immigration Rules—HC 251—for someone who has been refused entry clearance to be granted leave to enter the United Kingdom for the specific purpose of attending an appeal hearing. In order to qualify for a visit visa, such an applicant would need to satisfy the entry clearance officer that he meets the requirements set out in paragraph 22 of the rules. A copy of the rules is in the Library.

Political Asylum

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for political asylum were received in January and February; from which countries the applicants came; and how many had entered the United Kingdom prior to 31 December 1990.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 12 March 1991]: Reliable estimates of the number of applications for asylum in the United Kingdom in January and February 1991 by nationality and date of arrival are not yet available. However, provisional indications are of a total of more than 3,000 principal applications, excluding associated dependants, in each month. This figure does not include applications for upgrading to refugee status by those previously granted exceptional leave.

Iraqi Nationals

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the entry of Iraqi nationals to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 12 March 1991]: Under the "Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules" laid before Parliament on 18 January—HC 160—an application for entry falls to be refused if the applicant is an Iraqi national. However, discretion is exercised in compassionate circumstances where we are satisfied that no threat to national security is involved.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Dyslexia

10. Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many dyslexic children attend Northern Ireland schools.

Dr. Mawhinney: Dyslexia can describe a variety of specific learning difficulties experienced by children and the education and library boards are aware of some 600 such children attending schools.

Anglo-Irish Agreement

11. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what further discussions he has had regarding the Anglo-Irish Agreement; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: Matters arising under the Anglo-Irish Agreement continue to be discussed within the framework of the regular meetings of the intergovernmental conference. The last conference meeting was on 31 January. Subjects discussed included political development, security matters, extradition and environmental issues. A joint statement has been placed in the Library and the Vote Office.

18. Mr. Duffy: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on his discussions with the Irish Government about the future of the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

Mr. Brooke: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave earlier today to the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor).

Extradition

12. Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he has had any recent discussions with the Government of the Republic of Ireland concerning extradition.

Mr. Brooke: Extradition was discussed at the last meeting of the Anglo-Irish Inter-Governmental Conference on 31 January. A copy of the joint statement has been placed in the Library.

Tourism

13. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on tourism in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: Implementation of the Government's strategy for tourism in Northern Ireland is now well advanced and I am confident that its targets for sustained growth in tourism numbers will be achieved.

Ministerial Meeting

14. Mr. Bell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on his most recent meeting with the Foreign Minister of the Republic of Ireland.

Mr. Brooke: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave earlier today to the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor).

Unemployment

15. Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what action he plans to take to deal with unemployment.

Mr. Needham: The Government's economic development strategy for Northern Ireland aims to improve the competitiveness of the Northern Ireland economy and thereby bring about increased profitability and employment.

17. Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the current level of unemployment in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: At 7 February 1991, the latest date for which figures are available, there were 97,817 unemployment claimants in the Province. This represents a fall of 451 over the last month and 1,122 over the last year.

Unadopted Entries

16. Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the policy of his Department for upgrading unadopted entries in towns.

Mr. Needham: The Department of Environment for Northern Ireland has no plans to upgrade unadopted entries in towns. Responsibility for such entries lies with the frontagers or landowners concerned.

Prison Service

20. Mr. McKelvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on his priorities for the Northern Ireland prison service.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Northern Ireland prison service will continue to discharge its responsibilities to hold in secure and humane confinement those committed by the courts and to reduce the risk of re-offending by encouraging prisoners to take full advantage of the opportunities offered during their confinement.

Education Expenditure

21. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement upon trends in expenditure upon education in Northern Ireland since 1978-79.

Dr. Mawhinney: In 1978-79 spending on education in Northern Ireland was £332 million. In 1989-90 it was £898 million. This cash increase of £566 million over the period represents a real increase of 15½ per cent. This year I expect expenditure on education to be around £1 billion.

Rathlin Island

22. Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when Rathlin island will have a mains electricity distribution system.

Mr. Needham: The board of Northern Ireland Electricity gave its approval to a scheme to provide mains electricity on the island. Some details have still to be worked out, but it is hoped that work on the scheme will begin this summer.

New Hospital

23. Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received on the proposed new hospital in Northern health board area.

Mr. Hanley: I have received several representations from the Coleraine/Ballymoney area in support of the proposal for a new hospital in that area. These include a petition of approximately 20,000 signatures together with more than 15,000 signed letters.

Environmental Protection Agency

24. Mr. Kilfedder: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will establish an independent environmental protection agency.

Mr. Needham: The establishment of an independent environmental protection agency was one of the recommendations in the recent report by the Environment Committee of this House in relation to environmental issues in Northern Ireland. The report is currently being studied. A command paper giving the Government's response to the Committee will be presented to the House. I would not wish to anticipate that response.

Community Relations

25. Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on his plans for industry to encourage better community relations.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Government believe that the business sector can play an important role in encouraging community relations in Northern Ireland, although they do not wish to be prescriptive or directive. Therefore, as a first step, I intend having early meetings with business people to explore with them how they could contribute to promoting greater harmony within the work force and the wider community.

Future Government

26. Mr. Andrew MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on his discussions with the political parties in the province about the future government of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Brooke: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer that I gave earlier today to the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor).

Arts Funding

27. Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the per capita arts funding in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: The answer is £3·14 in 1990-91.

Hospital Beds

28. Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many beds will be available in Northern Ireland hospitals by the end of the current year.

Mr. Hanley: The information requested is not available. However, the average number of available beds in Northern Ireland hospitals has decreased in each of the last five years from 16,595 in 1985 to 14,154 in 1989-90. These reductions are consistent with targets set in my Department's regional strategy (1987 to 1992) and I expect the downward trend to continue this year. Over the same period as above the number of patients treated increased from 290,109 to 315,962 as a result of the more intensive use of beds and greater concentration on day cases.

Public Expenditure

29. Mr. Bowis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the public expenditure plans and priorities for Northern Ireland for 1991-92 and 1993-94.

Dr. Mawhinney: The recently published report on the Government's expenditure plans and priorities gives further information about the resource allocations announced last November by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State are being utilised for the benefit of Northern Ireland. The report shows the very substantial programme of work in which all Departments are engaged, covering the full spectrum of economic, social and environmental provision.

Child Care

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the number of workplaces for civil servants in his Office and in the Northern Ireland Departments; what proportion of the total number have an on-site nursery facility; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide a holiday play scheme; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide after-school child care facilities; what charges are made for use of any facility; what the net cost has been for the provision of these facilities; and what estimate he can make of any future expenditure.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Northern Ireland civil service and the Northern Ireland Office have staff based in 341 buildings throughout the Province and in London.

There are no on-site nurseries or after-school child care facilities provided. However, the feasibility of establishing a nursery in Northern Ireland is currently being investigated and nursery facilities for London-based staff are being sought with larger Government Departments and private companies.

Three holiday play schemes have been established in Northern Ireland. They are not located in Government buildings but they serve staff working or living in the Ballymena, Londonderry and Stormont areas. Additional schemes will be set up in the future in areas where the demand for them exists. The small home civil service part of the Northern Ireland Office in London can link into schemes already set up by larger Departments and hopes to be able to take advantage of any new schemes.

The charges to parents using holiday play schemes range from £3 to £4 per child per day. The Northern Ireland civil service made grants of approximately £8,000 to fund the three holiday play schemes in 1990-91. Future expenditure on these schemes is expected to continue at the same level; if additional schemes are set up grants will be paid to them on a similar basis.

River Dun (Breakwater)

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what effects have been observed as a result of the breakwater erected at the mouth of the River Dun in respect of (a) deposition or removal of sand, (b) on commercial fisheries and (c) on the freedom of movement of migratory fish.

Mr. Hanley: The answer is:

(a) No effect on the deposition or removal of sand can be attributed with certainty to the breakwater.

(b) There has been an increase in the commercial salmon catch in the vicinity of the breakwater since its erection.

(c) Fish migrating from the River Dun should not be affected by the breakwater but those returning to the River, while not obstructed by the structure itself, may be impeded to an extent during periods when the adjacent fixed draft net is also in the fishing mode. To facilitate the passage of fish the owner of the net has made application to change the site and characteristics of the net and following a recent public inquiry the matter is awaiting decision.

Fishing

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) whether the use of nylon monofilament nets are permitted in the freshwater commercial fisheries of Northern Ireland;

(2) whether he has considered a ban on the sale of wild brown trout in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: No.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the minimum size of each species of coarse fish which can be taken by commercial fishing engines from the freshwater lakes and rivers of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: The coarse fish species for which a minimum takeable size has been prescribed are:

(a) Pollen: 19.5 cm (7½in).

(b) Pike: 60 cm (24in) only applicable in Lough Erne.

(e) Eels: 40 cm in all waters controlled by the Fisheries Conservancy Board except Lough Neagh where the mimimum size is 30 cms.

There is no mimimum size for eels in the waters controlled by the Foyle Fisheries Commission.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what number of (a) salmon and (b) sea trout have been taken by nets in the River Dun in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Hanley: Commercial fishing for salmon and sea trout is not permitted in the River Dun.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information he has as to at what age and what size brown trout in Lough Neagh reach maturity.

Mr. Hanley: Lough Neagh brown trout mature between their third and sixth years, with most maturing by their fifth year. Within this range there are differences between the sexes (females tend to mature later than males) and between different sub-populations of trout. The size at maturity ranges from approximately 20 to 50 cms.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) salmon and (b) sea trout redds have been counted in the River Dun in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Hanley: The counting of redds is by visual observation and numbers observed can be distorted by water and weather conditions. Figures for the years concerned were:

	Salmon redds	Sea trout redds
1981	Nil	Nil
1982	Nil	Nil
1983	4	N/c
1984	N/c	N/c
1985	Nil	Nil
1986	Nil	Nil
1987	N/c	N/c
1988	N/c	N/c
1989	6	Nil
1990	16	Nil

N/c = No count undertaken.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the minimum size of brown trout which can be taken by commercial fishing engines from the freshwater lakes and rivers of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: There is no minimum size of brown trout which can be taken by commercial fishing engines, but commercial fishermen cannot have in their possession for sale any trout of less than 30 cm (12 inches).

Housing

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for South Antrim of 5 March, Official Report, c. 127, if he will list by name the four Housing Executive and 40 private developments concerned.

Mr. Needham: The developments concerned are as follows:

Development	Borough Council area
NIHE sites
Station Park, Tome	Antrim
Ardeen Gardens, Rathcoole	Newtownabbey

Development	Borough Council area

Social Security

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many social security claimants have been (a) prosecuted and (b) found guilty of claiming benefit while working and receiving wages during each year from 1985-86 to 1989-90.

Mr. Hanley: During the period 1985 to 1989 the number of social security claimants prosecuted and the number of convictions was:

	Total prosecuted	Total convictions
1985	940	759
1986	1,079	1,024
1987	1,079	1,015
1988	1,184	1,151
1989	1,075	1,033

Figures in respect of 1990 will not be available until mid 1991.

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many workers in the construction industry have been (a) prosecuted and (b) found guilty of claiming social security benefit while receiving wages during each year from 1985-86 to 1989-90.

Mr. Hanley: During the period 1985 to 1989 the number of workers, including employers in the construction industry, who have been prosecuted for social security fraud was:

	Number prosecuted
1985	412
1986	416
1987	408
1988	476
1989	373

Details concerning actual convictions in individual sectors of industry could be obtained only at a disproportionate cost. Figures in respect of 1990 will not be available until mid-1991.

Agriculture

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table in the Official Report to show for each of the months of September, October and November in the years 1975, 1980, 1985, 1988, 1989 and 1990 the price received for suckled calves in the principal markets for such cattle, sums to be shown in cash and real terms, taking for real terms 1975 as the base year, or as much of such information as is available to him.

Mr. Hanley: Estimates of prices received for suckled calves in the principal markets in Northern Ireland for the months of September, October and November in the years 1975, 1980, 1985, 1988, 1989 and 1990 are given below in current prices and in real terms.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table in the Official Report to show for each of the months of June, July, August, September and October the average price received for fat lambs in the principal markets of Northern Ireland in the years 1975, 1980, 1985, 1988, 1989 and 1990, showing also the average final price received by the farmer taking into account sums which arise from market support payments, all prices to be shown in cash and real terms taking 1975 as the base year, or as much of such information as is available to him.

Mr. Hanley: Estimates of prices received for finished lambs in the principal markets in Northern Ireland for the months of June, July, August, September and October in the years 1975, 1980, 1985, 1988, 1989 and 1990 are given in the following tables in current prices and in real terms. Since 1982, market support for sheep has not been based on payments on lambs marketed but is paid, on a per ewe basis, to those keeping eligible breeding ewes. Therefore lamb prices which include market support payments are not available.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Homeless Claimants

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will place in the Library a copy of the review of the future arrangements for homeless claimants in London being undertaken by the district manager of the New Southwark district.

Miss Widdecombe: It is not our intention to publish this report.

Child Care

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the number of workplaces for civil servants in his Department; what proportion of the total number have an on-site nursery facility; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide a holiday play scheme; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide after-school child care facilities; what charges are made for use of any facility; what the net cost has been for the provision of these facilities; and what estimate he can make of any future expenditure.

Miss Widdecombe: The Department has just under 500 workplaces. One workplace has an on-site nursery, but staff in other workplaces have access to another 23 nursery schemes provided by other Government Departments or private organisations.

Sixty-five workplaces have access to places to holiday play schemes, and three have access to after-school child care.

Child care charges vary by scheme and location—the main criterion is the provision of good value for money. The charge to staff for nurseries ranges from £20 to £55 per week; for holiday play schemes from £1·50 to £7 per day; and for after-school child care from £1·00 to £1·30 an hour.

In 1990-91 £1·6 million was allocated for expenditure on child care. Specific allocations for later years are not made centrally.

Departmental Accounts

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action he has taken to rectify those mistakes and miscalculations identified by the Comptroller and Auditor-General in refusing to approve his Department's accounts for (a) 1989-90 and (b) 1990-91; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: Three of the Department's accounts for 1989-90 were qualified by the Comptroller and Auditor-General. As a result the Department has taken steps to improve its computer systems, provided additional training and guidance to staff and has corrected errors in individual payments. The 1990-91 accounts have not yet been prepared and will be presented for audit in September 1991.

Cold Weather Payments

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received to index the level of the cold weather payment to rises in fuel prices since 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: We are not aware of any recent representations on this subject.

Mr. Orme: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much has been paid out in cold weather payments by region since 1 February.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is not yet available, but it will placed in the Library as soon as possible.

Mr. Orme: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what have been the staffing costs, by region, of administering the cold weather payments since 1 February.

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is not yet available, but I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Purchasing and Distribution

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the full annual cost, including overheads, of his Department's purchasing activity.

Miss. Widdecombe: The full annual cost, including overheads, of those staff wholly or substantially engaged in purchasing in the DSS is £4 million, including the cost of staff engaged in stores activities. This figure excludes warehousing costs, those storage and distribution activities which are contracted out and staff who spend only a small proportion of their time in purchasing and supply. This cost amounts to 0·5 per cent. of the total purchasing spend of £812 million.

Family Credit

Dame Jill Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in what proportion of cases family credit is payable to the mother.

Miss Widdecombe: In two-parent families family credit is payable to the mother in almost every case. Legislation provides that in such families the claim has to be made by the woman, which means that she becomes the payee. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State may accept a claim by the man where he is satisfied that this would be reasonable, but this provision is used only in exceptional circumstances.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many families in (a) the parliamentary constituency of Greenock and Port Glasgow, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland are in receipt of family credit; and what estimated proportion these families represent of those judged to be entitled to this benefit.

Miss Widdecombe: Information about the total number of families eligible for family credit can be obtained only for Great Britain as a whole, and only retrospectively, from family expenditure survey data.

The latest available information for families receiving family credit is as follows:

	Families
(a) Greenock and Port Glasgow	1,010[1]
(b) Strathclyde	16,200[1]
Scotland	39,000[2]

[1] Number of awards actually in payment on 8 February 1991 i.e. excludes awards on claims made before that date but not decided at that stage.

[2] True case load at the end of July 1990, i.e. including backdated awards. Information on this more comprehensive basis is only available for Scotland as a whole.

Family Credit

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether information about family credit, similar to that supplied to parents whose child benefit is paid by order book, has been sent to those receiving it by credit transfer.

Miss Widdecombe: The same personalised message, telling the family that they may be able to get family credit if their income is less than the figure quoted in the message, now appears on the child benefit award notices, change of rate notices and statements of entitlement sent to those people whose payment is made by credit transfer.

Purchasing and Distribution

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people in his Department are wholly or substantially involved in purchasing stores and distribution activities.

Miss Widdecombe: The number of people wholly or substantially involved in purchasing, stores and distribution at the Department of Social Security is 217. This includes 69 people engaged in related stores activities.

Criminal Injuries (Compensation)

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if his Department will review its rules with regard to the treatment of awards from the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board as savings for the purpose of benefit entitlement assessment; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The vast majority of payments from the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board have no effect whatsoever on social security benefits.

The rules for the income-related benefits were changed in October 1990 so that compensation payments arising from a personal injury which are placed on trust are completely disregarded when deciding entitlement to benefit. The normal rules apply to payments made by the trustees.

Cold Weather Payments

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will consider the determination of a higher trigger point for the cold weather payment in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: As I announced in the House on 11 February, we will shortly undertake a review of the scheme.

Value for Money

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what measures of performance are employed by his Department to ensure value for money.

Miss Widdecombe: The Department uses a wide range of indicators to measure its performance and the quality of service it provides. These are set out in the 1991 departmental report (Cm 1514) a copy of which is available in the Library. To ensure value for money in administrative expenditure, the Department has an ongoing target to increase efficiency and uses mechanisms such as efficiency scrutinies, internal consultancy, market testing of in-house activities and the monitoring of purchasing improvements.

Income Support Deductions

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list his Department's offices in Glasgow and show against each how many income support arrestments and statutory reductions have been made at the request of Strathclyde regional council.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is as follows:

Glasgow local office	Number of deductions in place
Anniesland	667
Bridgeton	794
City	257
Craigton	1,002
Cranstonhill	1
Laurieston	704
Maryhill	678
Partick	273
Provan	787
Rutherglen	1,181
Shettleston	841
Southside	850
Springburn	1,063

The information is not routinely published. It derives from the Department's management information system and is obtained from a quarterly count of deductions in action completed on 28 February 1991. The data are provisional and subject to amendment.

Pensioners (Heating)

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the annual costs for heating faced by pensioners.

Miss Widdecombe: The Department receives annual information on the patterns of pensioner expenditure, including the amounts spent on household fuel, from the family expenditure survey.

Income Support

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many income support claims in the parliamentary constituency of Greenock and Port Glasgow are from (a) elderly citizens, (b) families, (c) single parents and (d) people with disabilities as a total figure and as a percentage of all claims.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is not available in the form requested. However, it is possible to identify the number of current claims from pensioners and from lone parents aged less than 60 in the two local offices serving the Greenock and Port Glasgow area. This information is as follows:

	Pensioners	Single parents
Total number of claims	5,164	2,539
Percentage of claims in Greenock/Port Glasgow area	32·4	16·0

Note:
Data derived from 30 November 1990 count of cases in action, which include a number of cases where payment has ceased but other action is continuing. Data are provisional and subject to amendment.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which offices of his Department have received additional social fund allocations since 1 January; on what dates; and of what amounts.

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell) on 13 March 1991.

Nuclear Test Veterans

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether polycythaemia has been accepted as attributable to service by nuclear test veterans in addition to leukaemia and multiple myeloma.

Mr. Scott: Expert medical authorities now accept that polycythemia rubra vera may be looked upon as a disease similar to certain types of leukaemia. If the condition occurs in a British nuclear test participant, it will be certified as attributable to service for war pension purposes.

National Insurance Fund

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total cost to the National Insurance Fund to date of the 2 per cent. of banded earnings offered as an incentive to opt out of SERPs expressed (a) as a cash amount and (b) as an amount per head of those who remain in SERPs.

Miss Widdecombe: Revenue forgone by the National Insurance Fund in respect of the 2 per cent. incentive is to date just under £1,400 million. Because individuals move in and out of employment and also move between contracted in and contracted out employment or take out a personal pension during the course of a contribution year, it is not possible to determine accurately the number of individuals remaining in SERPs.

ENVIRONMENT

Uniform Business Rate

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what would be the cost of lowering the maximum permissible annual increase in uniform business rate bills in (a) nominal and (b) real terms (i) for small businesses, from 15 per cent. to 10 per cent. and (ii) for larger businesses, from 20 per cent. to 15 per cent., for the financial years 1990-91, 1991-92 and 1992-93.

Mr. Key: The estimated costs in England, to the nearest £5 million, are as follows:

	Nominal (cash) terms
	1990-91	1991-92
Small properties	25	40
Large properties	135	205

	Real terms (1990 prices)
	1990-91	1991-92	1992-93
Small properties	25	35	45
Large properties	135	185	185

No allowance has been made for changes to the rating lists since 1 April 1990 in making these estimates. Estimates for cash terms increases for 1992-93 have not been made because any increase in the cost in cash terms will be the result of an increase in the value of the multiplier for 1992-93, which will be determined in relation to the annual increase in the retail prices index in September 1991.

The maximum increase for small composite hereditaments, most commonly where the owner lives "over the shop", has already been changed. From 1 April 1991, the limit will be 10 per cent. for these properties. The cost of this change is estimated to be £5 million in each of 1991-92 and 1992-93.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what would be the cost of increasing the threshold at which businesses are eligible for the small business category of uniform business rate transitional relief from a rateable value of £10,000 to £15,000 outside London and from a rateable value of £15,000 to £25,000 within London, for the financial years 1990-91, 1991-92 and 1992-93.

Mr. Key: The cost in England, in 1990 prices, is estimated to be £25 million in 1990-91 and £35 million in each of 1991-92 and 1992-93. These estimates take no account of changes to the rating lists since 1 April 1990.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimates he has for the cost of allowing businesses to remain eligible for transitional relief from the uniform business rate although they move premises for the financial years 1990-91, 1991-92 and 1992-93.

Mr. Key: The estimated cost in England of allowing businesses to remain eligible for transitional protection when moving premises is, in 1990 prices, £60 million in 1990-91, and £75 million in each of 1991-92 and 1992-93. These estimates take no account of changes to the rating lists since 1 April 1990.

Green Labelling

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in agreeing a system of green labelling with the other EC member countries; and what proposals Her Majesty's Government have with regard to (a) the proportion of low-grade paper waste to be included in a green-labelled toilet roll, (b) the specifications for soap powder or detergent, (c) the specification for batteries, in particular the problems with mercury and cadmium, (d) aerosol spray, (e) liquid containers and (f) standards for shopping carrier bags.

Mr. Baldry: The European Commission issued its proposed regulation for a Community award scheme for an eco-label on 11 February. The proposal will be discussed at the Environment Council on 18 March.

No proposals have yet been made for the criteria against which specific product groups would be assessed for the award of an eco-label under the scheme. Under the proposed regulation, criteria would be determined on the basis of an assessment of the impact of a product on the environment over the whole of its life-cycle, and would aim for high standards of environmental protection.

Greenwich

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what would be the effect on the SSA for Greenwich if at the time of the last census Thamesmead tenants had already left the public sector and if the present numbers of children with lone parents had been present then.

Mr. Key: The information necessary to answer this question is not available.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the reasons why the spread of sports grounds and undeveloped land in the borough of Greenwich leads, through the ward weighted density calculation, to reduced social services provision for the frail elderly and children at risk.

Mr. Key: Ward-weighted density is not an indicator used in the standard spending assessment for personal social services for the elderly or for children. The level of provision of social services in Greenwich is, in any case, a matter of discretion for the borough.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what the borough of Greenwich might be expected to spend on (a) social services and (b) other services if the assessment per head for Lewisham and for Wandsworth were used.

Mr. Key: It is for the borough of Greenwich to decide how much to spend on each service. SSAs are calculated to reflect the social and demographic characteristics of the individual authority concerned. Thus Lewisham's SSA would not be appropriate for Greenwich. The following table shows what the 1991-92 personal social services and all other services SSA elements for Greenwich would be if its SSA per adult for each service was the same as that of Lewisham and Wandsworth.

SSA element for Greenwich 1991-92

	Personal social services £ million	All other services £ million
Greenwich's actual position	32·165	33·031
With same per adult sum as for Lewisham	41·191	41·054
With same per adult sum as for Wandsworth	43·559	52·095

Nitrogen Oxide (Monitoring)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has in respect of the number of nitrogen oxide monitoring stations in each of the OECD countries.

Mr. Baldry: No central records are kept of the numbers of nitrogen oxide monitoring stations in each of the OECD countries. Within Europe, nitrogen oxide monitoring data are compiled by the chemical co-ordinating centre of the UN ECE EMEP programme at the Norwegian Institute for Air Research. Of the 108 EMEP monitoring stations operated by the 28 European countries, 25 stations reported nitrogen oxide monitoring data in 1985.

Waste Disposal

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which regulations concerning waste disposal will be in operation after 1992.

Mr. Baldry: The present statutory controls on waste disposal, contained in part I of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 and the regulations made under that Act, will continue in force until repealed and replaced by part II of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. I hope to announce a timetable for the implementation of part II of the 1990 Act shortly.

Radioactive Discharge

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his present policy in respect of the use of as low as reasonably achievable and best practical means guidelines to determine acceptable radioactive discharge levels to the marine environment.

Mr. Baldry: The Government's policy is to keep radiation exposures as low as reasonably achievable (ALARA), taking account of economic and social factors. Operators discharging radioactivity to the marine environment are required not only to comply with any numerical limits laid down by the regulatory authorities, but are also placed under an obligation to use the best practicable means (BPM) to limit further the amount of radioactivity discharged.

Recycling

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the reserve fund for innovative recycling projects was established; how many projects were funded through it; where these projects were located; and what was the cost to the fund of each project.

Mr. Baldry: There is no such fund specifically related to recycling projects. However, under the environmental technology innovation scheme (ETIS), launched in October last year, and the environmental grant fund, launched in December last year, assistance can be given to suitable innovative recycling projects. At present no offers of grant have been made in relation to recycling projects under these schemes which, with some exceptions in the case of ETIS, are not open to public sector bodies.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what powers there are to penalise councillors who fail to pay their community charge.

Mr. Key: None.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will consider extending the grounds for exemption from the poll tax to include severe physical handicap.

Mr. Key: Our review of local government finance is considering all aspects of the community charge. Under the present arrangements people with disabilities may be helped by the community charge benefit disability and severe disability premiums.

Mr. Dixon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what would be the effect on the poll tax for 1991-92 in South Tyneside if Government grants were the same as in 1978-79 in real terms.

Mr. Key [holding answer 8 March 1991]: Since 1 April 1990, in contrast to previous arrangements, revenue support grant has been paid to the receiving authority for each area in support jointly of its own expenditure and that of the precepting authorities in the area. For this reason it is not possible to make direct comparisons at the individual authority level between the new grant system and previous systems. Also it is inappropriate to apply the national percentage rate of grant to individual authorities, since in both old and new systems grant is paid at different rates to different authorities, reflecting differences in their local needs and resources.

Mr. Lofthouse: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is the level of Government grants for 1990-91 per head of population in Wakefield metropolitan district council;

(2) what would be the effect on the poll tax for 1991-92 in Wakefield metropolitan district council if Government grants were the same as in 1978-79 in real terms;

(3) what grant per poll tax payer is received by Wakefield metropolitan district council.

Mr. Key [holding answer 11 March 1991]: Government grants, consisting of revenue support grant, special grants, specific grants in aggregate external finance, community charge benefit grant and transitional relief grant, were £208 per head of population and £271 per head of relevant population in Wakefield in 1990-91.

Since 1 April 1990, in contrast to previous arrangements, revenue support grant has been paid to the receiving authority for each area in support jointly of its own expenditure and that of the precepting authorities in the area. For this reason it is not possible to make direct comparisons at the individual authority level between the new grant system and previous systems. Also it is inappropriate to apply the national percentage rate of grant to individual authorities, since in both old and new systems grant is paid at different rates to different authorities, reflecting differences in their local needs and resources.

Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the average domestic rate bill in each local authority in England which would be necessary to yield the same revenue as his estimate of the yield of the community charge in 1990-91 and 1991-92.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 12 March 1991]: I am arranging for the information for 1990-91 to be placed in the Library of the House. Information for 1991-92 will not be available until authorities inform the Department of their budgets.

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what would be the effect on the poll tax for 1991-92 in (a) Salford, (b) Wigan and (c) Bolton if Government grants were the same as in 1978-79 in real terms.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what would be the effect on the poll tax for 1991-92 in Bradford if Government grants were the same as in 1978-79 in real terms; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key [holding answer 12 March 1991]: Since 1 April 1990, in contrast to previous arrangements, revenue support grant has been paid to the receiving authority for each area in support jointly of its own expenditure and that of the precepting authorities in the area. For this reason it is not possible to make direct comparisons at the individual authority level between the new grant system and previous systems. Also it is inappropriate to apply the national percentage rate of grant to individual authorities, since in both old and new systems grant is paid at different rates to different authorities, reflecting differences in their local needs and resources.

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what grant per poll tax payer is received by Maidstone and Faversham.

Mr. Key [holding answer 12 March 1991]: Government grants, consisting of revenue support grant, special grants, specific grants in aggregate external finance, community charge benefit grant and transitional relief grant are, per head of relevant population in 1990-91, £206 in Maidstone and £231 in Swale.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the percentage of total budgeted council expenditure which is paid for by poll tax in (a) Waltham Forest, (b) Wandsworth and (c) Westminster in 1991-92.

Mr. Key [holding answer 13 March 1991]: Income from community charges, together with revenue support grant and receipts from the non-domestic rates pool, finances the spending of each charging authority and the appropriate precepting authorities. It is not possible to attribute a proportion of an individual authority's spending to any particular source of income.

Ladies' Lavatories

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will issue a planning guidance circular concerning the standards to be met in the provision of ladies' lavatory facilities in buildings open to the public.

Mr. Yeo: My right hon. Friend has no plans to do so: this is not a concern of the land-use planning system. However, the Building Regulations 1985 and the technical guidance associated with them lay down requirements for the provision of sanitary conveniences and washing facilities in new buildings in England and Wales.

Dog Control

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the Government intend to bring into effect the new provisions on dog control contained in the Environmental Protection Act 1990.

Mr. Baldry: The dog control provisions in the Environmental Protection Act 1990 provide for new duties to be placed on district and London borough authorities to collect and detain stray dogs, and to enforce the existing requirement that dogs should wear a collar and identification tag in a public place. We propose to bring these new measures into effect on 1 April 1992. My Department will consult local authorities on a draft circular in the summer, and will publish draft regulations in the autumn.

My officials are holding discussions with the local authority associations and other interested bodies about the additional resource implications of implementing the new duties and powers. I have been most impressed by the initiatives and enthusiasm shown by the many authorities which already employ dog wardens. I would encourage others to follow their example by similarly exercising their existing powers to the full.

Cash Limits

Mr. Roger King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any changes to announce to his Department's cash limits for 1990-91.

Mr. Heseltine: Yes. I propose to make the following changes:

(i) The non-voted cash limit for DOE/OES will be increased by £2,110,000 from £58,705,000 to £60,815,000. This results from the provision of additional supplementary credit approvals to enable local authorities to raise finance to fulfil their obligations to contribute part of the cost of certain roads built by the Commission for the New Towns and new town development corporations in England. The increase will be wholly offset by counterbalancing new town receipts (see (iii) (b) below).

(ii) The non-voted cash limit DOE/LACAP will be increased by £500,000 from £2,785,170,000 to £2,785,670,000. This results from the provision of additional supplementary credit approvals to enable Peterborough DC to raise finance to purchase housing stock from the Commission for the New Towns. This increase is also wholly offset by counter-balancing new town receipts (see (iii) (b) below).

(iii) The non-voted cash limit for DOE/NT (New Towns) will be increased by £222,390,000 from minus £525,370,000 to minus £302,980,000. This net increase is the result of the following individual changes:

(a) an increase of £225,000,000, reflecting the effect on receipts of the present state of the property market;

(b) reductions of £2,110,000 and £500,000 respectively resulting from additional receipts from local authorities financed by the cash limit increases described in (i) and (ii) above.

(iv) The External Finance Limit for Letchworth Garden City Corporation will be increased by £4,120,000 from minus £4,000,000 to £120,000. This reflects changes in the Corporation's financing profile as a result of the downturn in the property market.

These changes are within the forecast outturn for the planning total published on 1 February in the statistical supplement to the 1990 autumn statement.

Community Charge (Gulf Postings)

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will ensure that service personnel and civilians posted to the Gulf are reimbursed in respect of any liability to the community charge during their absence.

Mr. Heseltine: I told the House on 19 February that the Government had concluded that service personnel and associated civilians posted to the Gulf should not have to bear the cost of the community charge during the period of their posting and that we would consider in the light of the case of Bradford MBC v. Anderton how this could be achieved.

The Government have decided to establish a compensation scheme, to be operated by the Ministry of Defence, under which service personnel and civilians posted to the Gulf will be reimbursed for any community charge liability incurred in the period of their absence. The scheme will apply to all uniformed service personnel, including reservists; to civilians employed by the Ministry of Defence, including the merchant seamen of the Royal Fleet Auxiliary; to merchant seamen on ships chartered by the Ministry of Defence; and to certain employees of defence contractors supporting the British armed forces in the Gulf. The scheme will be retrospective to the initial deployment in August 1990. Compensation will cease when an individual returns to Great Britain, except for personnel who are wounded where it will continue until they leave hospital or convalescent home.

I have already announced separate proposals to compensate local authorities which lose significant amounts of income in respect of those service personnel whose liability for the community charge ceases as a consequence of posting to the Gulf.

My Department will shortly be issuing to local authorities further guidance about the implications of the Anderton judgment for the community charge liability of service personnel.

Action for Cities

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what projects have been funded in inner cities under the action for cities initiative; and if he will list the factories and local businesses which have received funds under action for cities.

Mr. Key [holding answer 12 March 1991]: A wide range of projects have been supported under the action for cities initiative, with Government expenditure input totalling over £10 billion since 1988. More detailed information is available in Government publications such as "Action for Cities", "Progress on Cities" and "People in Cities", and in the annual reports recently published by each Government Department. Factories and businesses receive specific help through various programmes and bodies; the main ones are listed below:

Programmes
- Urban programme
- City grant
- Enterprise allowance scheme
- Enterprise initiative
- Loan guarantee scheme
- Regional enterprise grants
- Regional selective assistance

Bodies or agencies
- Urban development corporations
- English estates
- Small firms centres
- Task forces
- City action teams

If my hon. Friend requires any further information, perhaps he could write to me.

Direct Labour Organisations

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will commission a report into the accounting procedures adopted by local authority direct labour organisations.

Mr. Key [holding answer 13 March 1991]: The procedures which authorities are required to follow in accounting for their direct labour organisations are prescribed in section 10 of the Local Government Planning and Land Act 1980 and section 9 of the Local Government Act 1988. Under those Acts authorities are required to secure that the financial objectives prescribed by my right hon. Friend are met, and to submit copies of their annual reports to their auditor and to my right hon. Friend.

We have no plans at present to commission a study of accounting procedures under this legislation.

EMPLOYMENT

Child Care

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the number of workplaces for civil servants in his Department; what proportion of the total number have an on-site nursery facility; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide a holiday play scheme; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide after-school child care facilities; what charges are made for use of any facility; what the net cost has been for the provision of these facilities; and what estimate he can make of any future expenditure.

Mr. Jackson: The Employment Department Group has approximately 2,000 workplaces for civil servants, many of which are small local offices comprising 10 to 30 staff; at present we have one on-site nursery facility running in Bootle; 28 workplaces provide holiday play schemes; there are no after-school child care facilities provided at present. All parts of the group are actively pursuing initiatives to increase child care provision. The Department will continue to consider sympathetically proposals for child care facilities and, where possible, will provide practical help where there is evidence of sufficient demand to make it financially viable. Staff who wish to take advantage of play schemes and nurseries are required to contribute to running costs. Central records are not kept concerning individual costs involved and could not be obtained without incurring a disproportionate cost; any future estimate of expenditure again cannot be gathered without incurring disproportionate costs. The diversity of workplaces within the group and their relative size often means that workplace provision is not viable. In some locations the Department is working with other Government Departments and outside industry to take child care provision forward. At present there are about seven schemes under consideration in this category.

Apex Trust (Youth Project)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received about the threatened closure of the Apex Trust's youth project; what funding his Department provides to this project; how many people have been trained at the project since it was first established; how many people are currently being trained by the project; what alternative training places would be provided if the project was closed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: My Department has a national employment training (ET) contract with the Apex Trust which runs between 28 May 1990 and 31 March 1991, and is for 1,477 places at a unit cost of £52 for each trainee week delivered which gives Apex an earning capacity of £3·38 million.

The Apex Trust's training centre in York has been operating since 1985, initially offering community programme and since September 1988 delivering ET. Figures supplied by the Apex Trust show that since the launch of ET in September 1988 250 trainees have trained at the centre, and that there are currently 37 trainees in training. North Yorkshire TEC has offered the Apex Trust a rundown contract between 1 April and the end of November to enable existing trainees to complete their training.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Veterinary Laboratories

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the 28 veterinary laboratories that were operational in 1979 and in 1991, and those that will be operational in 1995.

Mr. Gummer: The changes in the structure of the veterinary investigation service since 1979 are the result of two very thorough and carefully considered reviews on the operation of the service. These reviews were designed to produce significant improvements in the quality, efficiency and cost-effectiveness of the service and to reflect changes in national requirements and methods of operation of the veterinary investigation service. Advances in diagnostic technology, automated analytical equipment, information technology and improvements in road transport systems mean that a larger proportion of services provided by the veterinary investigation service can now be carried out more efficiently in the reduced number of locations. It is important to have an efficient veterinary investigation service which is well equipped to meet our national needs over the years ahead.

The 28 veterinary laboratories within the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food that were operational in 1979 consisted of 25 veterinary investigation centres located at Aberystwyth, Bangor, Bristol, Cambridge, Cardiff, Carmarthen, Chester, Gloucester, Leeds, Lincoln, Liverpool, Newcastle, Northampton, Norwich, Penrith, Reading, Shrewsbury, Starcross, Sutton Bonington, Thirsk, Truro, Weybridge, Winchester, Worcester and Wye, and the three central laboratories comprising the central veterinary laboratories at Weybridge, Lasswade (Edinburgh) and the cattle breeding centre at Shinfield.

There are 21 veterinary laboratories operational in 1991 consisting of 19 veterinary investigation centres located at Aberystwyth, Bangor, Bristol, Cambridge, Carmarthen, Lincoln, Newcastle, Norwich, Penrith, Preston, Reading, Shrewsbury, Starcross, Sutton Bonington, Thirsk, Truro, Winchester, Worcester and Wye and the two central laboratories comprising the central veterinary laboratories at Weybridge and Lasswade (Edinburgh).

It is expected that there will be 15 veterinary laboratories operational in 1995 consisting of 13 veterinary investigation centres located at Aberystwyth, Bristol, Carmarthen, Newcastle, Penrith, Preston, Shrewsbury, Starcross, Sutton Bonington, Thirsk, Winchester and the two new veterinary investigation centres to be built, one at Bury St. Edmunds and the other in Warwickshire and the two central laboratories comprising the central veterinary laboratories at Weybridge and Lasswade (Edinburgh).

Irradiation Plants

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, further to his answer to the hon. Member for South Shields, 11 March, Official Report, column 400, how many inquiries he has received regarding the licensing of irradiation plants; if he will list the companies making the inquiries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: I do not believe it would be appropriate to list companies making inquiries about irradiation licences, some of which may have been purely exploratory. Details of each licence granted will be published in the London and Edinburgh Gazettes as required by the Food (Control of Irradiation) Regulations 1990.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, further to his answer to the hon. Member for South Shields, 11 March, Official Report, columns 400-1 whether he intends to set up a new committee to consider applications for licences for irradiation plants in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: I can see no case for a new committee. The committee of which full details were given in my answer to the hon. Member for South Shields on 11 March at column 400-01 has been in existence only since 1 January. Moreover, this group was specifically constituted so as to be able to give authoritative advice on all considerations relevant to the granting of a licence.

Agricultural Inspections

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list for each year since 1986 the number of holdings visited by agricultural wage inspectors as (i) test inspections and (ii) inspections arising from complaints; how many underpayments were discovered; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The number of holdings visited by the agricultural wages inspectors is as follows:

	1986	1987	1988	1989
(i) test-inspections	2,791	2,817	2,017	1,891
(ii) inspections arising from complaints	140	114	120	80
(iii) number of under-payments discovered	70	110	56	55

Note: Statistics for 1990 are not yet available.

Agricultural wages inspectors are located in all the Department's divisional offices to follow up complaints and enforce the relevant legislation.

Milk

Mrs. Heal: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the milk quota attaches to the land on which the milk is currently produced or to the land on which it was produced during the last five years.

Mr. Curry: Milk quota is allocated to a producer for use on his or her holding. European Community regulations prescribe that where an entire holding is transferred by sale, lease or inheritance all quota must pass to the transferee. Where part of a holding is transferred quota must be apportioned in accordance with areas used for milk production. The term "areas used for milk production" is not defined in EC regulations and in the case of a quota transfer it is for the parties concerned to agree on an apportionment. Where they fail to agree, the Dairy Produce Quotas Regulations 1989 provide for an independent arbitrator to be appointed to decide the matter. An arbitrator is required to base his award on the pattern of milk production in the preceding five years.

Mrs. Heal: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the definitions of a holding used by EC countries for the purpose of milk quotas.

Mr. Curry: The definition of "holding" prescribed in European Community Regulation 857/84 Article 12(d) is as follows:

"all the production units operated by the producer and located within the geographical territory of the Community".

This regulation is applicable throughout the Community. For the purposes of the regional allocation of wholesale quota a clarification of the term was necessary, so the Dairy Produce Quotas Regulations 1989 qualify the above definition as follows:

"holding has the meaning assigned to it by Article 12(d) of Council Regulation 857/84, but in relation to any region, it means the division of the holding in that region".

EC Surplus Food Scheme

Mr. Madden: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what reply has been sent to Anthony Clipsom, area organiser of the Bradford metropolitan council for voluntary service, to his letter, dated 1 March, sent to his Department in Reading, concerning the EC surplus food scheme 1991.

Mr. Curry: The closing date for the receipt of applications from organisations wishing to participate in the 1991 scheme is 22 March.

The detailed arrangements mentioned by the hon. Member can be finalised only after all the applications have been examined following the closing date. The intervention board will be replying to Mr. Clipsom shortly along those lines.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, with reference to the EC surplus food scheme 1991, under what criteria groups forming consortia will have their separate bids conflated; if smaller groups, involved in consortia, will be able to claim expenses for collecting and re-distributing food from central points; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: The closing date for the receipt of applications from organisations wishing to participate in the 1991 scheme is 22 March.

The detailed arrangements mentioned by the hon. Member can be finalised only after all the applications have been examined following the closing date.

Animal Waste

Mr. Meale: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his policy towards European Community directive 90/667/EEC and specifically to the exemption that allows high-risk animal waste material to be used by hunt kennels and maggot farms; and what assessment he has made of the impact of this provision on human or animal health.

Mr. Gummer: I welcome the fact that the directive includes provisions to permit the continuation of operations of this kind. It will be essential for such establishments to be subject to controls that safeguard human and animal health.

Slaughterhouses

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his policy on the recommendation of the report of the Committee on the Microbiological Safety of Food (part II) that the use of pithing rods in abattoirs should be banned; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: I refer the hon. Member to the Government's response to the Committee's recommendations, a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

Emergency Food Stocks

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 30 January, Official Report, column 545, if he will give the reasons for the high costs of losses to the emergency food stocks in 1989-90 when set against the average of the preceding years from 1979-80; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: Details of the stock losses for 1989-90 are published in the Appropriation Accounts 1989-90, volume 3. The higher incidence of losses resulted from a disposal in that year of an accumulation of downgraded stocks.

Tributyltin

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will make a statement on the presence of tributyltin in the North sea;

(2) what recent assessment he has made of the implications for the marine environment of the presence of tributyltin in the North sea.

Mr. Curry: The Department began a programme to measure tributyltin (TBT) levels in water, fish and shellfish in 1982. Since 1987 the Department, jointly with the Department of the Environment, has commissioned a more intensive research and monitoring programme to assess the efficacy of control measures introduced in 1986 and 1987. This work has been focused on certain estuaries where contamination was highest. The results show that TBT levels are declining generally and affected populations of marine species are recovering. Levels in the most severely contaminated areas have declined by between six and tenfold since 1986 as a direct result of the controls applied.

The levels of TBT in the mouths of estuaries away from pleasure craft activity have always been low, and concentrations in the open waters of the North sea are still lower. Levels are below both the quality standard required to protect marine species and the limit of detection of the most sensitive analytical techniques available.

Sewage Sludge

Mr. Simon Burns: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether a programme has been drawn up for termination of the sea disposal of sewage sludge.

Mr. Gummer: All bodies in the United Kingdom currently licensed to dispose of sewage sludge at sea have reported their plans to introduce alternative methods of disposal. Timetabling and the choice of appropriate method of disposal will depend on local circumstances. All licence holders have carefully considered whether beneficial use of sludge in their area would be practicable, and a number have plans for beneficial re-use of sludge. There are proposals for spreading sludge on agricultural land, for composting sludge for agricultural use and for the production of dry granules for production of fertilisers or peat substitutes.

For most of the sludge sewage undertakers are pursuing the option of incineration. Their judgment takes account of the priority which they must give to the guarantee of a disposal outlet, the present lack of assured markets for high volumes of sludge-derived products, the distance of major treatment works from land on which sludge can be used and the environmental disadvantages of transporting sludge through urban areas. While pursuing incineration at this stage a number of the undertakers intend to keep open the option of adopting beneficial uses of sludge in the future. A beneficial by-product of incineration in some cases will be the generation of power.

On current plans the Ministry will be terminating the first licences for sea disposal by the end of 1993, with further licences terminating in 1995. In the main these cases are those where re-use of sludge is planned. The introduction of incinerators will be subject to approval through the planning system and to appropriate timescales for construction; undertakers currently envisage the commissioning of most incinerators in the period 1997-98.

The success of this important initiative depends on public recognition of the need for alternative methods of disposal. Those who have sought an end to disposal at sea have a duty to support alternatives, and to accept that there may be increased costs. The costs to water consumers of the proposed programme of measures are for determination between the sewerage undertakers and, in England and Wales, the Office of Water Services, in Scotland the Scottish Office and in Northern Ireland the Department of the Environment (Northern Ireland).

Foodstuffs (Import Levies)

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will show in table form, for each year since 1965-66, the total import duties and levies on foodstuffs as a whole, imported into the United Kingdom, and separately for the following categories: (a) cereals, (b) meat including livestock destined for consumption, (c) dairy products and (d) other items.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I have been asked to reply.

I regret that the information is not available in the form requested and could not in any way be provided for the full period requested except at disproportionate costs.

The tables show the levy and duty for both foodstuffs and non-foodstuffs from the four most recent years in each case. Separate figures distinguishing between foodstuffs and non-foodstuffs are not available.

Agricultural levies

	Established in calendar years: 1987 £000	1988 £000	1989 £000	1990 £000
Cereals	84,310	62,601	47,392	74,838
Meat (beef, veal and pigmeat)	6,065	6,019	5,458	1,806
Dairy products	17,218	21,883	28,458	11,156
Other	107,360	88,047	54,174	39,362
TOTAL	214,953	178,550	135,482	127,162

Note: Amounts are made available to the Commission two months after the month in which they are established.

Import duties

	Financial years 1986-87 £000	1987-88 £000	1988-89 £000	1989-90 £000
[1]Cereals (Chapter 11—products of the milling industry)	222	256	302	232
Meat (Chapter 2—including edible offal but excluding livestock)	9,848	12,475	14,600	15,668
Dairy products (Chapter 4—including eggs, honey and other edible products of animal origin, not elsewhere specified)	2,991	3,011	2,898	2,668
TOTAL	13,061	15,742	17,800	18,568

[1] No import duty was collected on unprocessed cereal grains (Chapter 10) most of which are liable to levy only.

Notes: Figures for livestock and other items of foodstuff are not available.
These figures are not directly comparable with those for levy. Import duty is summarised by tariff chapters only and these include items not subject to levy and exclude related foodstuffs in other tariff chapters.

SCOTLAND

Health Service Pay

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when discussions will commence on the establishment of arrangements for local pay determination for health service employees in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The objective of introducing progressively greater flexibility in pay in order to relate pay to local labour markets and to reward individual performance is already being pursued in the Whitley councils.

Fish

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has considered a ban on the sale of wild brown trout in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: No. Purchase, sale or export of brown trout of less than 8 inches in length, or between 1 September and 31 March of brown trout of any size, is already prohibited by section 2 of the Trout (Scotland) Act 1933.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many commercial fishing engines operate in freshwater lakes and rivers in Scotland which have as target species (a) salmon, (b) sea trout, (c) wild brown trout and (d) coarse fish by species; and what quantities of each such species were taken by such engines in (i) 1990, (ii) 1985, (iii) 1980 and (iv) 1970.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: In Scotland the only methods of fishing for salmon and sea trout allowed in inland waters are net and coble or rod and line. There are appoximately 70 net and coble fisheries currently operating in Scotland. The total numbers of salmon and sea trout caught by this net and coble are shown in the table:

	Salmon and grilse	Sea trout
[1]1989	93,256	45,133
1985	82,033	50,547
1980	106,275	97,850
1970	187,480	102,170

[1] Figures for 1990 will not be available until later this year.

Figures for wild brown trout or coarse fresh water fish catches in Scotland are not obtained or held centrally.

Legal System

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will list the total payments from legal aid funds and payments per head of the population in Scotland over the last five years.

Year	Legal Aid expenditure £	Payment per head of population £
1985 86	41,479,000	8·07
1986-87	47,454,000	9·27
1987-88	47,723,000	9·33
1988-89	58,169,000	11·42
1989-90	58,959,000	11·58

Voluntary Organisations

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the main funding headings which are used in providing grants to voluntary organisations and the changes that have taken place over the last five years.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Annex D of the report of the Efficiency Scrutiny of Government Funding of the Voluntary Sector, a copy of which is in the Library, contains a list of Government grant schemes for voluntary organisations current in 1987-88 and 1988-89. Details of changes over the previous five years are not readily available.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in a table under the relevant headings all funding given to voluntary organisations in the most recent year for which figures are available and for the previous four years.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I refer to the answers given by my right hon. Friend the then Prime Minister, on 11 May 1990 at cols. 254-55, 16 May 1989 at cols. 120-21, 14 April 1988 at cols. 217-19 and 2 March 1987 at cols. 462-63. Details for 1989-90 will be announced shortly.

Health Service

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what reduction in income Greater Glasgow health board will face during 1991-92 because of share parity adjustment; and what further such parity adjustment reduction may be anticipated for 1991-93.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Greater Glasgow health board was allocated £536·073 million for revenue expenditure purposes in 1991-92, an increase in base allocation of 7·6 per cent. over the 1990-91 level. This is £13 million less than would have been allocated to them if the national average increase had been applied. The £13 million was redistributed among the other 14 health boards to achieve a more equitable distribution of resources.

No decisions have yet been taken on allocations for 1992-93.

Tourism

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the total value to the Scottish economy of tourism in each of the past 15 years.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Figures for 1990 are not yet available. Information for the period 1975-89 is set out in the table.

	£ million
1975	355
1976	367
1977	498

Note: Figures are compiled from the International Passenger Survey (for overseas visitors) and the British Tourism Survey, the National Survey of Tourism in Scotland and the United Kingdom Tourism Survey (for domestic visitors for the years 1975-83, 1984-88 and 1989 respectively). Because of differences in the domestic surveys, figures for the period 1975-83 are not directly comparable with those for 1984-89.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when his Department last undertook a survey either directly or in conjunction with the Scottish tourist board of the impact of tourism on the Scottish economy.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The Scottish tourist board, as the agency with statutory responsibility for promoting and developing the Scottish tourism industry, undertakes annual surveys into the volume and value of tourism in Scotland.

GP Funding

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress is being made towards the establishment of general practitioner funding in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I am much encouraged by the level of interest in fundholding expressed by GPs in Scotland. I fully expect four fundholders to come into being on 1 April 1991, with a further five candidates later this year.

There are clear signs that many more GPs are interested in what fundholding can offer them. In particular I am aware that a number of practices with less than the minimum patient list size (currently 9,000) would welcome the opportunity to participate in the scheme. I therefore intend to establish a limited number of pilot sites, involving individual practices, to assess the potential for such a development. I shall also be considering the scope for other developments, such as extending the range of services covered by a fund.

Smokies

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cases of food poisoning have been attributed to the consumption of smokies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 15 February 1991]: There have been no recorded cases of food poisoning attributed to the consumption of smoked haddock. Fish hygiene proposals are under discussion in the EC, and we have made every effort to ensure that the final measure will be practical and realistic: there is no reason to believe that the proposed measure threatens in any way the future of the fish smoking industry.

Forestry Commission

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all land currently owned by the Forestry Commission which it is planning to sell; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 7 March 1991]: The Forestry Commission's disposals programme will continue until the end of the century, and the selection of properties for sale will accordingly be staged over that period. Advance notification of areas being considered for disposal is given in the Estates Gazette in respect of all woodlands of more than 5 hectares, together with any other land having a known conservation, recreation or amenity interest. Copies of the Estates Gazette are to be found in the Library.

The following forest areas are at present being offered for sale on the open market:

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will place in the Library a list of all land which was owned by the Forestry Commission and which has been sold since 1980 giving (a) the area of land sold, (b) to whom it was sold, (c) the year it was sold, (d) how much money the Forestry Commission received over the sale and (e) the type of woodland or other type of countryside.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 7 March 1991]: The Forestry Commission is preparing a list of the areas of forest land which it has sold since 1980. This will incorporate information provided in answer to previous questions. I shall arrange for a copy to be placed in the Library as soon as possible.

Details of sales of land other than forest land are not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

DEFENCE

Child Care

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the number of workplaces for civil servants in his Department; what proportion of the total number have an on-site nursery facility; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide a holiday play scheme; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide after-school child care facilities; what charges are made for use of any facility; what the net cost has been for the provision of these facilities; and what estimate he can make of any future expenditure.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: There are some 750 locations throughout the United Kingdom employing MOD civil servants, most of which have less than 200 members of staff. The Department has full-time nurseries in central London and in Farnborough. A number of holiday play schemes have been set up in several different locations.

The charges for parents for places in the London nursery are either £45 or £55 per week according to the grade of the parent. The charge at Farnborough is £40 per week. Further child care projects are under consideration. The funding of these projects will depend upon their assessed cost-effectiveness when seen against other demands on resources.

The Gulf

Sir Antony Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish an appraisal of the role of helicopters in the recent action in the Gulf with relation to support of the 1st Armoured Division in particular and of alliance forces in general.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We are considering the outcome of the campaign and the conclusions to be drawn from it, but it is too early to say how the results of this work might be made public.

Mr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many United Kingdom registered merchant ships were used by Her Majesty's Government in connection with the Gulf conflict; and how many were chartered from overseas fleets.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: To date, five British and 107 foreign flagged vessels have been chartered in support of the Gulf conflict. A number of these vessels have undertaken more than one voyage.

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what have been the costs so far to public funds of the chartering of vessels to convey stores and equipment to the Gulf; what has been the cost to the Government of their freight agent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The cost to date of chartering vessels to carry stores and equipment to the Gulf is £74 million. It would not be appropriate to disclose details of the Government freight agent's remuneration: it is fixed by contract and is not affected by the cost of vessels taken up by the Ministry of Defence.

"Options for Change"

Mr. A. Cecil Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the implications of "Options For Change" for the security policy for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: On 8 November 1990, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland published a statement on the Government's security policy in Northern Ireland. The statement makes it clear that the armed forces will continue to support the RUC, with all the resources necessary, to ensure the defeat of terrorism; "Options for Change" will not alter this policy.

Aircraft Noise

Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the further studies on aircraft noise mentioned in his answer to the hon. Member for Ryedale of 17 May 1990, Official Report, column 518, are now complete; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: I have now received reports on noise levels generated by aircraft operating at low level and on the review of available information on any possible relationship between aircraft noise and hearing loss. Copies of these reports have been placed in the Library of the House.

The report of the review of available information on the possible relationship between aircraft noise and hearing loss indicates that the risk of hearing loss as a result of exposure to overflight noise is small, even after daily occurrences over as long a period as 40 years, while the risk of hearing loss due to a single overflight can be regarded as infinitesimal. The report also concludes that occasional brief exposure to noise levels as high as 125 dB(A) should produce no lasting effect on hearing and that there is a small margin of safety at that level.

The report on noise levels generated by aircraft operating at low level has established that, at the speeds flown in the United Kingdom low-flying system, none of the RAF aircraft from which measurements were taken produced noise levels in excess of 125 dB(A).

The report of the study of noise sources within and around aircraft is expected shortly. My Department's low-flying noise panel continues to co-ordinate work in this field and ensures that the findings of research are taken into account in the management of low flying and in the design of future aircraft.

Written Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT

Child Care

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the number of workplaces for civil servants in his Department; what proportion of the total number have an on-site nursery facility; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide a holiday play scheme; how many and what proportion of workplaces provide after-school child care facilities; what charges are made for use of any facility; what the net cost has been for the provision of these facilities; and what estimate he can make of any future expenditure.

Mr. Heseltine: There are five headquarters offices and 17 other offices in central London. In addition, my Department has nine main regional offices, most of which are shared with other Government Departments, as well as over 50 offices throughout the country, including property holdings and my Department's three agencies, but excluding PSA Services.

None of these offices has an on-site nursery or provides after school child care facilities. A number of interdepartmental holiday playschemes are in operation in Westminster, Birmingham, Bedford, Bristol, Nottingham, Newcastle and Manchester. These are all open to the Department's staff and parents have been charged up to £5 per day per child for the use of the facilities. The Department will also be participating in a proposed interdepartmental nursery scheme in Westminster.

Expenditure in 1990-91 is estimated at £10,000. Future expenditure is difficult to estimate. Many factors are involved, including joint funding arrangements, demand, value for money of individual schemes and other departmental priorities.

Primates

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has concerning the number of wild-caught primates imported into the United Kingdom in the last three years; and for what purposes these animals are used.

Mr. Baldry: In the three years to 31 December 1990, 11,428 live specimens of wild-caught primates were imported. Of these, 9,588 were imported for scientific or educational purposes; 1,766 for trade; and 74 for exhibition or breeding.

Waste Disposal

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set up a committee of inquiry into the matter of waste disposal.

Mr. Baldry: A committee of inquiry is not required. There have been a number of Select Committee inquiries into waste disposal in recent years and a full Government review of waste management policies culminated in the passing of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. That Act will be implemented with a full programme of supporting advice and guidance about which there will be continuing consultation.

River Pollution

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent assessment he has made of the presence of (a) heavy metals and (b) polychlorinated biphenyls in river eels; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: The National Rivers Authority is currently undertaking a monitoring programme for contaminants in river eels. Results are expected later this year.

Purchasing and Distribution

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many people in his Department are wholly or substantially involved in purchasing stores and distribution activities.

Mr. Heseltine: In 1989-90, some 180 people in the central administration of my Department were whollyt or substantially involved in these activities. For the PSA, because of the nature of its business, all of the 14,140 staff supported the purchasing activity to a greater or lesser extent.

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the full annual cost, including overheads, of his Department's purchasing activity.

Mr. Heseltine: The staff cost, including overheads, of the purchasing activity in the central administration of my Department in 1989-90 was £1·5 million. For the PSA, all expenditure on staffing of some £390 million was associated with purchasing.

Domestic Waste

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to increase the amount of domestic waste subject to incineration; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: Incineration can be a viable alternative to landfill as a method of disposing of waste, provided proper standards are observed. The higher standards that landfill sites will be required to meet under the Environmental Protection Act 1990, and the potential for energy generation from municipal waste incinerators, will also make incineration a more viable option financially. However, the final decision on the type of facility that is most appropriate in any area must lie with the waste disposal authority.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to ensure that there exist adequate facilities for incineration of domestic waste in compliance with the EC directive on large combustion plants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: It is for waste disposal authorities to ensure there are adequate facilities—including incinerators—and they will need to take this into account in preparing their waste disposal plans. Air emissions from existing municipal waste incinerators are covered by EC directive 89/429. The Government have allocated £62 million over the next three years to local authorities for works necessary to upgrade such incinerators to meet these standards.

Emergency Alarms

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all methods of Government funding available to local government that would enable them to purchase emergency alarm systems for elderly and disabled people.

Sir George Young: There is no single source of funding for the purchase of emergency alarm systems by local authorities. In most cases, it will be a matter for the local authority to decide the priority it places on alarms in relation to other demands and within available resources.

Government support for such purposes may be provided through one of the following routes—the usable part of capital receipts and credit approvals; minor works assistance under section 131 of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989; urban programme; revenue support grant; housing revenue accounts.

Pollution Inspectorate

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will publish in the Official Report the grades and salary scales of officers in the pollution inspectorate;

(2) what staff complement is considered necessary to enable his Department to discharge its duties in the field of pollution inspection; and how many vacancies currently exist for pollution inspectors.

Mr. Baldry: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Countryside gave the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) on 24 January, Official Report, column 269. To meet its increased responsibilities for integrated pollution control under the Environmental Protection Act 1990, Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution's staff complement has been authorised to expand from 233 to over 300 by 1 April 1992 and may thereafter need to increase up to around 400 when integrated pollution control is in full operation.

Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution currently has 14 vacancies for pollution inspectors. These vacancies, and the authorised new posts, will be filled from the recent recruitment exercise which produced 38 successful applicants.

The grades and current national rates of pay for pollution inspectors are listed below.

Grade	Minimum of scale £	Maximum of scale £	Maximum of performance range points £
Assistant pollution inspector (HPTO)	18,195	19,681	n/a
Pollution inspector (SPTO)	20,059	26,121	31,150
Principal pollution inspector (grade 7)	24,997	29,809	35,451
Superintending pollution inspector (grade 6)	27,229	35,451	41,681

Grade	Minimum of scale £	Maximum of scale £	Maximum of performance range points £
National rates of pay for pollution inspectors will increase from 1 April 1991 to:
	21,905	29,809	35,451

Consequential increases for more senior inspector grades are currently under discussion with staff representatives.

Saltley Renewal Area

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which roads were visited by the Minister for Housing and Planning during his visit to the Saltley renewal area on 26 February; and which residents' associations were invited to meet him.

Sir George Young: I visited the following roads in the south Saltley renewal area—Bowyer road, Hartopp road, Parkfield road, Couchman road, Alderson road, Ludlow road and Alum Rock road.

I had a full day in Birmingham on 26 February 1991. I visited a hostel for the homeless, saw two public sector estates as well as the south Saltley renewal area, and went to two recent housing association developments. I was unable to meet representatives of all the local associations, but I met a large number of tenants and residents during the day and I enjoyed my visit to the home of two residents in south Saltley.

Crown Suppliers

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement about progress in the privatisation of the Crown Suppliers' vehicle hire and maintenance business.

Sir George Young: The Government have not been able to reach agreement with the only bidder about acceptable terms for the sale of the Crown Suppliers vehicle hire and maintenance business.

There is little justification for retaining in Government a business which provides services commonly provided by other suppliers. Furthermore, the workshops are unprofitable and future profits from vehicle hire are uncertain. Consequently the Government have decided to close the business. Every effort will be made to find alternative civil service posts for the staff but some redundancies are inevitable. The trade unions are being consulted about the implications for their members.

We are urgently considering the interests of customers of the business with a view to proposing alternative arrangements to meet their continuing requirements.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Invalid Care Allowance Unit

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proposals he has to review the establishment at the invalid care allowance unit.

Mr. Scott: We intend to increase the staffing level at the invalid care allowance unit from 358 in 1990-91 to 400 in 1991-92.

Invalid Care Allowance

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the average time between the date on which an application for invalid care allowance is received and the first payment is made to a successful claimant.

Mr. Scott: Based on the year to 31 January 1991, the average time between the date on which an application to invalid care allowance is received and the first payment is made to a successful claimant is 47·5 days, which includes an average of nine days to cover payment preparation and dispatch processes after the claim has been cleared in the unit.

Emergency Alarms

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what income support arrangements exist to enable individuals to purchase or rent emergency alarm systems.

Miss Widdecombe: There is no specific provision in the income support scheme to help meet the cost of purchasing emergency alarm systems. However, where the eligible rent or eligible housing costs of an elderly, sick or disabled person include an inescapable service charge for an emergency alarm system, help with that charge can be provided through housing benefit or income support respectively.

Quality Assessment Surveys

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 28 February, Official Report, column 612, if he will send the hon. Member for Oldham, West a copy of the survey by Research Surveys of Great Britain when he places copies in the Library.

Miss Widdecombe: Yes. I will do so as soon as the report is available.

Multiple Births

Mr. Conway: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he will consider the level of child benefit for the first child where multiple births occur; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: Child benefit provides a worthwhile contribution towards the costs of bringing up children, but it has never been intended to meet those costs in full. The higher rate of £8·25 from this April for the eldest eligible child in each family at any one time recognises that, at all income levels, families with children face additional costs compared with other families. It is therefore the presence of any one child rather than the number of children which is significant in bringing about that difference in expenditure. The standard rate of £7·25 will of course be paid for all children who do not attract the higher rate. A mother whose first children are twins for example will get a total of £15·50 child benefit a week.

Disability Working Allowance

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many additional claimants would qualify for the disability working allowance if the functional test were applied for initial claims for those not receiving a qualifying benefit; and if he will estimate the numbers and net cost in each category for (a) claimants working in receipt of no benefit, (b) claimants working in receipt of income support and earnings, (c) claimants working and receiving housing benefit and/or community charge benefit, (d) claimants not working in receipt of income support without the disability premium, (e) claimants not working in receipt of unemployment benefit with no income support addition, (f) people not working and receiving no benefit and (g) people receiving family credit.

Mr. Scott: Estimates of the number of people who might claim disability working allowance (DWA) can be only tentative since they depend on assumptions about how availability of the benefit might influence behaviour. We do not believe that the test of functional disability as proposed would be a suitable alternative to the requirement to be or to have been receiving a long-term incapacity or disability benefit. However, our best estimate is that if claimants were able to qualify by satisfying the test of functional disability alone, the DWA case load would be increased by about 200,000 and the cost by roughly £200 million net of other benefit savings. It is not possible to estimate with confidence the numbers or net cost in the categories (a) to (g).

Care Homes

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list his estimate of the numbers of claimants in receipt of income support payments towards the cost of (a) residential care homes and (b) nursing homes for each of the last 10 years.

Miss Widdecombe: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Cousins) on 16 November 1990 at column 238.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps are taken by local benefit offices to ascertain whether income support claimants in receipt of payments towards the cost of nursing home care are (a) in need of nursing care and (b) in receipt of nursing care.

Miss Widdecombe: The level of income support payable depends on the type of care the nursing home is providing for the claimant. The adjudication officer must be satisfied that the home is recognised by the registration authority as able to provide a level of care and that the resident is receiving such care. We have no evidence to suggest that residents of nursing homes do not need to be there.

Disabled People

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 16 January, Official Report, column 535, giving figures on the hours worked by people with disabilities, if he will indicate the source of his statistics; and whether these figures have been used in determining the likely take-up of the proposed disability working allowance.

Mr. Scott: The information to which the hon. Member refers was obtained from the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys disability surveys. Estimates of the cost and case load of the disability working allowance have been largely based on data from these surveys.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Tertiary College (Truro)

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he intends to make a decision on the proposed establishment of a tertiary college in Truro.

Mr. Fallon: The Secretary of State has before him a proposal significantly to change the character of Richard Lander school, published on 1 November 1990, which relates to the establishment of the proposed tertiary college. Our aim is to decide such proposals within five months from the date of publication. The establishment of the college itself does not require a decision by the Secretary of State.

Welsh Registry, University of Wales

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) on what basis the recently announced 15·47 per cent. increase in funds allocated to the Welsh Registry, university of Wales, for the year 1991-92 was calculated;

(2) what performance indicators he intends to use to ensure that the £3·7 million allocated to the Welsh Registry, university of Wales, for the year 1991-92, will provide value for money.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The distribution of funds to individual institutions and the monitoring of related performance are, under the Education Reform Act 1988, matters for the Universities Funding Council.

University of Wales

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his policy in regard to the development of the university of Wales and its constituent colleges in the light of the likely economic and cultural needs of the people of Wales into the next century.

Mr. Alan Howarth: It is for each institution to plan its own development in the light of its perception both of national and other demands and of its abilities to respond to these, consistent with its general mission. The distribution of public funding in support of these plans is a matter for the Universities Funding Council.

Assisted Places

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he intends to introduce a new scheme for assisted places; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon: The assisted places scheme has been in operation since 1981 and has provided the opportunity for many thousands of youngsters from families on lower incomes to benefit from the education provided by good independent schools. There will be 35,000 places available in the scheme by the mid-1990s, following the admission of new schools to the scheme this academic year, many in the north of England.

We have no plans to introduce any new scheme.

WALES

Voluntary Organisations

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will list the main funding headings which are used in providing grants to voluntary organisations and any changes that have taken place over the last five years;

(2) if he will publish in a table under the relevant headings all funding given to voluntary organisations in the most recent year for which figures are available and for the previous four years.

Mr. David Hunt: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply given to her on 14 March by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Foxes

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide a table of moneys allocated to Welsh fox destruction clubs since 1979.

Mr. David Hunt: No moneys have been allocated to Welsh fox destruction societies since 1979.

Health Service

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people in the health authority area in Powys are awaiting surgery.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Under existing arrangements, information is collected about the number of people waiting for treatment at hospitals but not about their area of residence. From 1 April 1991, waiting lists become the responsibility of the health authorities of the patient's area of residence and, in time, published information will reflect this.

EMPLOYMENT

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment which of his Ministers has been given responsibility for energy use by his Department; and what is his brief regarding energy efficiency.

Mr. Forth: The Minister responsible for energy use is Viscount Ullswater, a Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State.

He has a dual role—

(1) As the departmental representative on the ministerial group on energy efficiency, which is chaired by the Secretary of State for Energy, he contributes to the implementation of the Government's policy to promote energy awareness and efficiency throughout the public and private sectors of the economy.

(2) As the Minister responsible for this Department's energy strategy he oversees the implementation of the strategy, the main objective of which is to reduce energy use by 15 per cent. over the next five years. He encourages energy awareness and efficiency in those areas of the economy where the Department has a sponsoring role—training and enterprise, tourism and small firms. He, with other Ministers in the Department of Employment, promotes energy awareness and efficiency at appropriate occasions during official visits and speeches.

Loan Guarantee Scheme

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he last met the chairman of Barclays, Lloyds, National Westminster, Royal Bank of Scotland and the Midland banks to discuss their involvement in the loan guarantee scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: I meet or correspond with senior banking representatives on a regular basis to discuss their general services to small firms, including their involvement in the loan guarantee scheme. I have also met the small firms sub-committee of the Committee of London and Scottish Bankers.

Between June 1981 and March 1991, more than 27,900 guarantees have been issued under the scheme, corresponding to lending of £891 million. The scheme continues to have a significant role in assisting small firms that cannot otherwise raise finance for viable business activities.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the number of loan guarantee schemes granted by (a) Barclays, (b) Lloyds, (c) National Westminster, (d) Royal Bank of Scotland and (e) the Midland banks in each of the last three years.

Mr. Forth: The number of guarantees issued for each of the banks is as follows:

	1988	1989	1990
Barclays	586	625	640
Lloyds	352	370	263
National Westminster	430	1,127	1,387
Royal Bank of Scotland	61	74	69
Midland	375	521	1,087

HOME DEPARTMENT

Remand Prisoners

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what proposals he has received for the provision of suitable alternative accommodation for remand prisoners in Greater Manchester;

(2) for how many prisoners on remand provision has been made for them to held in police cells in Greater Manchester for each month over 12 months; and if he will give the figures individually for Stockport, Cheadle Hulme and Denton police stations.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Vigorous efforts continue to be made to reduce further the number of prisoners held in police cells. This will be greatly assisted by the opening of an additional 140 refurbished places at Manchester prison this summer and by other new accommodation which is shortly to be brought into use in the north of England.

Emergency arrangements for the use of police cells when sufficient accommodation is not available in prison service establishments, and the use of cells in individual police stations, is a matter for the chief officer of the force concerned. Prison service management liaises closely with the police on the provision of accommodation, and the police are reimbursed for the additional expenditure they sustain.

Terrorism

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will name the three people who, according to Lord Colville's report on the operation in 1990 of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 (table 3) in 1988 were charged following detention and/or examination on account of their involvement in international terrorism; their country of origin; and the terrorist organisation or activity in which they are suspected to have been involved;

(2) if he will name the seven people who, according to Lord Colville's report on the operation in 1990 of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 (Table 9) in 1990 were charged following detention and/or examination on account of their involvement in international terrorism; their country of origin; and the terrorist organisation or activity in which they are suspected to have been involved.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: It is not the practice to disclose the names of those who are detained under the Prevention of Terrorism Act or the nature of their suspected involvement in terrorism. Of the three people who were suspected of involvement in international terrorism and charged with criminal offences following detention under the Prevention of Terrorism Act in 1988, one was born in Austria, one in Italy and one in the United Kingdom. Of the seven such people who were so charged following examination or detention under the Prevention of Terrorism Act in 1990, two were born in Egypt and one each in Brazil, India, Kenya, Pakistan and the United Kingdom.

Escapees

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answers to the right hon. Member for Swansea, West on 6 March, which of the six persons who absconded were on drugs-related offences and which owed money to the courts.

Mrs. Angela Rumbold: The six women concerned had all been convicted of drug offences. Of these, one was ordered to pay costs of £450 which is still owed to the court. None of the other women are known to have been in debt to the courts.

Ethnic Minorities (Attacks)

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what specific guidance he has given since 15 January to chief police officers regarding attacks on Muslims and other ethnic minorities and their properties; if he plans to give any further guidance in the immediate future; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Decisions about the deployment of officers and other operational matters are solely the responsibility of individual chief officers. It would therefore be inappropriate for specific guidance to be issued to chief officers about attacks on Muslims and other ethnic minorities and their properties.

All chief officers are aware of the continuing need to respond to racially motivated incidents as a priority. Close links are maintained between the Government and the Association of Chief Police Officers on community and race relations issues through regular discussions. These meetings have been used in recent months to ensure that all developments and tensions relating to British Muslims during the Gulf crisis have been closely monitored by police forces. The Government will continue to issue guidance as appropriate on the response by the police and other agencies in tackling these unacceptable crimes.

Electoral Registration

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the annual expenditure by his Department on electoral registration per London borough for each financial year since 1987-88.

Mr. Kenneth Baker [holding answer 12 March 1991]: Financial provision for local authority expenditure on electoral registration is made as part of the revenue support grant. Decisions about the amount spent on electoral registration rest with individual authorities.

Iraqi Nationals

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Iraqi nationals have (a) permanent residence, (b) exceptional leave to remain, (c) student status and (d) political asylum, as of the latest available date.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 12 March 1991]: It is estimated from the latest labour force surveys and immigration control data that, at present, some 7,000 Iraqis are usually resident in the United Kingdom, including students. In addition, some 1,300 Iraqis have been granted exceptional leave since 1983, and about 200 Iraqis have political asylum.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Share Ownership

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the approximate cost to the Exchequer in a full tax year of introducing a quoted company individual share ownership allowance on the first (a) £1,000, (b) £2,000 and (c) £5,000 of taxable income if (i) 50 per cent., (ii) 75 per cent. and (iii) 100 per cent. of taxpayers with sufficient taxable income used such an allowance to invest in new shares in quoted companies; and how much finance would be available to quoted companies as a result.

Mr. Maude: On the stated assumptions, estimates relating to 1990-91 are as follows:

Cost of income tax relief

£ billion

	Percentage take-up
Tax allowance £	50 per cent.	75 per cent.	100 per cent.
1,000	3·1	4·6	6·2
2,000	5·6	8·4	11·2
5,000	9·9	14·9	19·8

Amount of investment

£ billion

	Percentage take-up
Tax allowance £	50 per cent.	75 per cent.	100 per cent.
1,000	11·9	17·9	23·8
2,000	21·4	32·1	42·8
5,000	37·3	55·9	74·5

Corporation Tax

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the estimated effect on receipts of corporation tax over the next five financial years of replacing the existing capital expenditure allowance rates by rates of (a) year one 40 per cent., year two 40 per cent. and year three 20 per cent., (b) year one 33⅓ per cent., year two 33⅓ per cent. and year three 33⅓ per cent. and (c) the accounting rate of depreciation used in a company's accounts.

Mr. Maude: The effect would depend on a number of factors, including the levels of capital expenditure qualifying for allowances, which would be influenced by a change in the rates, and the extent to which companies would be able to set any increases in allowances against profits for tax purposes.

Mortgages

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to what level could mortgage interest relief be raised, at no net cost, if higher rate mortgage and relief were abolished.

Mr. Maude: The mortgage interest relief limit could be raised to about £37,000 on the basis of the 1990-91 figures if relief were restricted to the basic rate. The estimate excludes behavioural effects.

Pensions

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the annual cost of allowing taxpayers to offset contributions to an approved pension plan against higher rates of tax in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Maude: About £350 million at 1990-91 levels.

Capital Taxation

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the reduction in annual liability to (a) capital gains tax and (b) capital transfer tax in 1990-91 and 1991-92 as against the 1978-79 indexed regime, specifying in each case the total and average reduction per taxpayer and the number of taxpayers in each year.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 25 February 1991]: I regret the delay in replying. Latest available estimates for capital transfer/inheritance tax for 1990-91 and for 1991-92, based on the 1990-91 regime with statutory indexation, are as follows:

	Estimate
Reduction, compared with indexed 1978-79 regime in:
Total liability (£ million):
1990-91	690
1991-92	730
Average liability[1] (£):
1990-91	9,600
1991-92	10,300
Taxpayer numbers (thousands)
Indexed regime:
1990-91	72
1991-92	70

	Estimate
Present regime:
1990-91	23
1991-92	22

[1] The reduction in the average liability is calculated using estimated numbers of taxpayers under the indexed 1978-79 regime.

These estimates are based on the estimated value of taxable estates passing on death in 1990-91 and 1991-92 under existing rules and make no allowance for any impact which the indexed 1978-79 tax rate would have on the level of taxable estates.

The methodology used to compare the indexed 1978-79 capitals gains tax regime with the current regime has been examined. A number of major modelling assumptions have to be made for this comparison since, in 1978-79, tax was charged on nominal gains with gains accruing prior to 6 April 1965 being ignored whereas, under the current regime, the charge applies to gains after allowing for indexation and ignoring gains accruing prior to 31 March 1982. I regret that the conclusion reached is that it is not possible to provide sufficiently reliable estimates of the difference between the two regimes.

Latest available estimates of taxpayer numbers for capital gains tax for the present regime, excluding gains realised by companies and included in assessments to corporation tax, are:

	Thousands
1990-91 liabilities	110
1991-92 liabilities	95

HEALTH

Health Service Staff

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has on staff shortages and turnover rates among ancillary, nursing, administrative, clerical, professional and technical staff in the health service.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The available information is:

Staff group	Per cent. Vacancy levels[1]	Turnover rates[2]
Ancillary	not known	32·7
Nursing and midwifery	2·9	15·6
Administrative and clerical	not known	20·2
Professions allied to medicine	4·2	21·6

[1] Vacancies of three months or more on 31 March 1990 as a percentage of funded establishments.

[2] Calculated as numbers leaving health authorities year ended 31 March 1990 as a percentage of staff in post at 30 September 1989. Leavers include those moving from one region to another.

Purchasing and Distribution

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many people in his Department are wholly or substantially involved in purchasing stores and distribution activities;

(2) what is the full annual cost, including overheads, of his Department's purchasing activity.

Mr. Dorrell: The Department keeps no records of those employed on purchasing stores as opposed to services, or of those exclusively involved in distribution activities. Similarly, the management arrangements for the Department which involve devolved responsibilities in line with the financial management initiative means that it is not possible without incurring disproportionate costs to ascertain the costs of the Department's purchasing activity.

Sleeping Rough (Hypothermia)

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the figures for deaths due to hypothermia while sleeping rough, for each year since 1979, in (a) Greater London and (b) England and Wales.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is readily available for the years 1986-90, but for the earlier years could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

The table shows, for each year from 1986, the number of deaths registered with any mention of hypothermia recorded on the death certificate and where, in addition, the deceased was recorded as being of no fixed abode, or information on their usual residence was not known at time of registration.

Area	Year 1986	1987	1988	1989	[1]1990
England and Wales	10	12	8	9	6
Greater London	7	6	4	3	4

[1] Provisional.

Homeless People

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many of the deaths reported in England and Wales during the cold weather period ending 15 February were of homeless people.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Residential Homes

Mrs. Heal: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to ensure that before patients are discharged to private sector residential or nursing homes the financial consequences and the right of patients to choose to remain in the care of the national health service are explained and that patients and their relatives are not unreasonably pressured to leave national health service care.

Mr. Dorrell: The booklet of good practice guidance accompanying circular HC(89)5, "Discharge of Patients from Hospital", a copy of which is available in the Library, stated that arrangements for discharge to alternative care should be made in good time and be acceptable to patients and/or their carers. Information should be given in writing before the transfer as to whether the health authority would pay the fees under a contractual arrangement. No national health service patient should be placed in a private nursing or residential care home against his or her wishes if that means that he or she or a relative will be personally responsible for the home's charges. At the same time, authorities are not expected to keep patients in hospital when there is no clinical need to do so.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what research has been carried out into the proportion of residents in (a) local authority homes, (b) voluntary homes, (c) private residential homes, (d) private nursing homes and (e) private homes with joint registration who have been drawn from the immediate locality of the home concerned;

(2) what research he has undertaken into the client satisfaction of residents of care homes;

(3) what research he has undertaken into life expectancy in respect of inmates of residential care homes.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department has funded research projects on various aspects of the residential care and nursing home sectors over the past five years at a number of universities, notably at the personal social services research unit, University of Kent and the social policy research unit and centre for health economic, University of York. A project by the Policy Studies Institute, funded by the Department, on "Services for Elderly People—Choice, Participation and Satisfaction" is due for completion this summer.

We are not aware of research bearing directly on life expectancy of residents in homes or on the proportion of residents drawn from the immediate locality.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has as to the number of different codes of practice published by organisations or associations of care home managers or owners recognised by his Department.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department has endorsed the working party report, "Home Life", published in 1984, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Information about codes of practice published by the various care home associations is not collected routinely by the Department.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance is given by his Department as to the maximum number of residents who are relatives of a private care or nursing home owner or staff member and in receipt of board, accommodation and personal care, who are permitted to reside in the home concerned in the part of the building which is registered over and above the number of beds for which the home is registered.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: None. Part I of the Registered Homes Act 1984 requires that adequate accommodation is provided for the residents of residential care homes. If relatives of the proprietor or staff of a home are accommodated, the accommodation available for use by other residents must continue to meet their needs. Part II of the Registered Homes Act requires that sufficient and suitable accommodation and services are provided to any patient in a nursing home.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list by each registration authority the number of registered homes in the following categories (a) local authority homes, (b) voluntary homes, (c) private residential homes, (d) private nursing homes and (e) private homes with joint registration; and how many of these homes were purpose built.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Information about the number of residential care homes by registration authority is contained in table 1 of "Residential Accommodation for Elderly People and Younger Physically Handicapped People: All Residents in Local Authority, Voluntary and Private Homes Year Ending 31 March 1989 England" and, "Residential Accommodation for Mentally Ill and Mentally Handicapped People: Number of Local Authority, Voluntary and Private Homes and Places at 31 March 1989 England". Copies are in the Library.

Information about the number of private nursing homes and dual registered homes by registration authority is contained in, "Private Hospitals, Homes and Clinics Registered Under Section 23 of the Registered Homes Act 1984, Annual Summary Booklet 1988/89", which is also in the Library.

Information about the number of homes that are purpose built is not collected centrally.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list which organisations or associations of care home managers or owners are recognised by his Department.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department does not accord a preferential status or recognition to any particular care home organisations or associations.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance is given to registration authorities with regard to the provision of written details of terms and conditions of care provision to residents in care and nursing homes.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: "Home Life—a code of practice for residential care", which has been endorsed by the Department and commended to registration authorities, a copy of which is available in the Library, recommends that residents should be given a written statement of the terms on which accommodation is being offered before their admission to a residential care home.

We expect further guidance to be developed as part of the Department's caring in homes initiative.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance he gives to registration authorities with regard to the obligations of old and new owners of private care of nursing homes on their sale or transfer.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Residential Care Home Regulations 1984 require a person registered in respect of a residential care home to notify the next of kin of any intention to terminate the arrangements for the accommodation of a resident. The code of practice "Home Life", a copy of which is available in the Library, also recommends that residents are directly advised of any change of owner. New owners must seek registration under the Registered Homes Act 1984.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance is given to registration authorities with regard to the contents of complaints procedures within private or voluntary residential or nursing homes.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Residential Care Home Regulations 1984 require registered persons to advise residents of residential care homes in writing of their internal complaints procedures and also of the name and address of the registration authority to whom complaints may be directed. They must also ensure that complaints are fully investigated. The code of practice, "Home Life", a copy of which is available in the Library, suggests that complaints may cover any subject and that their handling should be recorded. The National Association of Health Authorities and Trusts handbook on registration and inspection of nursing homes gives specific advice about handling complaints.

Baby Milk

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his policy with regard to the World Health Organisation/UNICEF code of marketing of breast-milk substitutes (WHA 34.22).

Mr. Dorrell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) on 4 March, at column 24.

Maternity Cases

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list by national health service region (a) for 1980 and (b) for the most recent year, the hospitals in England which had consultant obstetric or general practitioner maternity beds giving the numbers of beds of each type in each hospital.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 22 February 1991]: The information requested has been placed in the Library. Due to changes in the type of information collected, the data for the years concerned are not strictly comparable. The data for 1980 identify the beds available in the type of unit concerned. Since 1987, the bed type has been classified according to clinical responsibility—by consultant, general practitioner or for joint use. In addition, many of the individual sites were not open during one or other of the years in question. While there has been an overall reduction in the number of beds over the period, this has been accompanied by a significant reduction in the average length of stay of approximately 30 per cent.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Exports

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total sum expended by the EC on export refunds for food and wine from free market and intervention stocks in respect of the export of food and wine to (a) central and east Europe and the Soviet Union and (b) the rest of the world, in the most recent annual period for which figures are available; and if he will include the payments in respect of food aid within these totals.

Mr. Curry: It is not possible to provide figures showing EC expenditure on export refunds broken down by destination. The table gives the total expenditure on export refunds and the amount within that attributable to food aid for 1990.

Export refunds 1990 by commodity (£ million)

Agricultural Exports

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total value of exports of (a) cereals and (b) other agricultural products in each year since 1979 in actual and constant prices; and what is the percentage increase in each case in constant prices, showing 1979 as 100.

Mr. Curry: The readily available information is given in the table in which the volume indices (1985 = 100) indicate movements at constant prices.

Wheat

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the average price of common wheat received by the producer in the United Kingdom, Germany and France (a) in national currency and (b) converted to £ sterling at the market rates prevailing on the latest date for which this information is available.

Mr. Curry: The national averages of market prices provided by the Commission of the European Communities for the week ending Saturday 23 February 1991, converted to pound sterling using spot rate values for 22 February, are set out in the table.

	Breadmaking wheat		Feed wheat
	National currency per tonne	£ per tonne	National currency per tonne	£ per tonne
United Kingdom (£)	137	137	126	126
Germany (DM)	391	134	381	130
France (FF)	1,276	128	n./a.	n./a.

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the average on-farm selling price of wheat in the United Kingdom for each of the years from 1979 to 1990 in actual and real terms, and also at constant prices, showing the 1979 price as 100.

Mr. Curry: Average prices received by cereal producers are shown in the following table together with the all-items retail prices index. Average prices in real terms have been derived by dividing the average prices by the RPI and re-expressing with 1979 = 100. It is not meaningful to refer to prices "at constant prices".

Calendar year	Average price (£ per tonne)	Retail Price Index (1985 = 100)	Average prices in real terms (1979 = 100)
1979	95·9	59·9	100·0

Green Currencies

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many differing green currency rates are operated throughout the European Economic Community.

Mr. Curry: There are currently 33 green rates in force in the European Community.

Food Prices

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the average price paid to producers for (a) wheat, (b) beef, (c) milk, (d) eggs and (e) pork in 1960, 1979, 1980 and 1990, respectively, in actual prices, at constant 1960 prices and at constant 1990 prices.

Mr. Curry: Average prices received by producers are given in the table. The prices quoted for 1960 have been derived from various sources and are not necessarily consistent with those provided for later years. These are inclusive of subsidies and exclusive of corresponding levies as shown in tables within section 5 of "Agriculture in the United Kingdom 1990". It is not meaningful to refer to prices "at constant prices" but prices "in real terms" may be derived by dividing actual prices by a general index of prices. The all-items retail prices index is provided for the specified years.

Wheat (£ per tonne)	21·00	95·90	99·30	109·50
Beef (p per kg dcw.)	32·00	130·00	137·00	180·00
Milk (p per litre)	3·07	11·55	12·77	19·23
Eggs (p per dozen)	18·30	38·90	44·20	58·00
Pigmeat (p per kg dcw.)	25·00	78·00	84·00	108·00
Retail Price Index (1985 = 100)	13·20	59·90	70·70	133·30

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will show the average price to the consumer of (a) a pint of milk, (b) a 2 lb loaf of bread and (c) a pint of beer in 1960, 1970, 1980 and 1990; and if he will also show the percentage increase between 1980 and 1990 in each case.

Mr. Curry: The table gives the available information.

Wool

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the guarantee price for the 1991 wool clip.

Mr. Gummer: Together with the Secretaries of State for Scotland, for Wales, and for Northern Ireland, I have reviewed the state of the wool market and the prospects for the 1991 clip. 1990-91 has been a very difficult year for the wool industry. Market conditions have continued to deteriorate and worldwide stocks of wool have built up to record levels. At home wool sales have been depressed by a slowdown in the property market with a consequent reduction in the demand for the furnishings and carpets which normally absorb quantities of British wool. Other factors, including the continued absence of China, a major buyer, and the decisions of Australia and New Zealand to abandon market price support for the present have further contributed to the depressed market situation worldwide. Currently the average market prices being achieved in the United Kingdom are well below the 1990 clip guaranteed price of 125p/kg. For 1991 the prospects remain uncertain.

Ministers have also had to take account of the Government's announced intention to end the wool guarantee and of the need for the industry to prepare for a smooth transition to market prices. In the light of this review, and taking account of current market conditions, it has been decided to set the guarantee at 120p/kg for the 1991 clip year—a reduction of 5p/kg on the 1990 guaranteed price. This constitutes a further step towards actual market prices and towards the ending of the guarantee.

SCOTLAND

Economic Assistance (Dumbarton)

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what economic assistance Dumbarton constituency has received since 1985; and if he will list the amounts and types of grant involved.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information is shown in the table:

	£'000s
Regional selective assistance	843·3
Regional enterprise grants[1]	84·8
Regional development grants[2]	4,959·4
Scottish Development Agency	3,092·0
Scottish Tourist Board	1,362·6

[1] Regional enterprise grants were introduced on 1 April 1988.
[2] Regional development grants were closed to new applications on 31 March 1988.

RENAVAL Programme

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress has been made in the implementation of the RENAVAL community programme in Strathclyde.

Mr. Allan Stewart: A programme of measures under the RENAVAL community programme was submitted, on behalf of Strathclyde, to the European Commission on 18 December 1990. The Commission's decision is still awaited.

Homicide

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cases of homicide remain unsolved in the period 1970 to the latest date for which figures are recorded; how many of these remain open; and what guidance his officials give to police forces on the advisability of continuing with investigations of unsolved homicides.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 14 March 1991]: Twenty-four cases initially classified as homicide remain unsolved from the period 1978 to 1989. Comparable figures for years before 1978 are not available. The initial classification of homicide may subsequently be altered, for example as a result of decisions on charges taken in the course of judicial proceedings or if death proves to have been the result of an accident.

The investigation of any crime is an operational matter for the chief constable, in consultation with the procurator fiscal, who has the right to direct the police in this regard. Unsolved homicides always remain open and the police are always ready to investigate further any case which has not been cleared up.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Soviet Union (Loans)

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much has been loaned to the Soviet Union by British banks for each year since 1985; and if he will give details of each loan.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Details of individual loans are not available, but total outstanding claims against the Soviet Union of UK-registered banks are given in table 15 of the Bank of England's quarterly report, a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

Burma

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the United Kingdom's relations with Burma.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We welcomed the free elections in Burma in May 1990 and deplore the continuing failure of the Burmese military authorities to respond to the people's clearly expressed will. We have repeatedly called on the Burmese authorities to release political detainees and to end violations of human rights. We shall continue to take every opportunity to make our views known to the Burmese authorities, along with fellow EC members and other like minded states.

The Gulf

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the companies employed on behalf of his Department to give advice, or to undertake other work on public relations and similar matters, during the Gulf crisis; if he will indicate the amount of money spent on remuneration for the companies involved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs gave to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on 28 January, at column 377.

Council of Europe, Madrid

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the recent meeting of the Council of Ministers of the Council of Europe in Madrid.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: An extraordinary meeting of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe was held in Madrid on 21 February. The United Kingdom was represented by my right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.

A copy of the conclusions of the Chair are being placed in the Library of the House.

Cocom

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the decision to postpone a recent meeting of Cocom.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The most recent meeting of COCOM was held on 27 to 28 February at executive committee level. This was originally planned to be a high level meeting, but since some outstanding technical issues in the exercise to reform the COCOM controls remained, the high level meeting was postponed until the new "core list" of controls is ready for implementation.

The executive committee meeting made much progress towards solving the problems. Work continues in order to resolve the remaining issues rapidly.

Europe

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment has been made of the intentions of the Soviet Union to comply with the conventional forces in Europe treaty.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We and our NATO allies continue to press the Soviet Union to comply fully with the treaty. We do not accept the Soviet claim that treaty limited equipment resubordinated to naval command is excluded from the scope of the treaty. We are also seeking Soviet clarification of their intentions as regards the large numbers of equipment currently being stockpiled east of the Urals. This Soviet action, while not illegal under the treaty, is a cause for concern in that it creates a potentially threatening stockpile just outside the area of application.

Israel

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Government still support United Nations resolution 242; what action he has taken in the past 24 months to enforce compliance with that resolution; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We continue actively to support UN Security Council resolution 242 as the basis for a comprehensive settlement of the Arab/Israel dispute.

Albania

Mr. Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent talks have taken place with a view to restoring diplomatic relations with Albania.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: British and Albanian officials met in Rome on 5 and 6 November and in Geneva on 18 and 19 December to discuss outstanding bilateral issues, including the possible restoration of diplomatic relations between the United Kingdom and Albania.

Iraq

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals he has to provide food aid and medical support for the people of Sulaimaniya, Arbil and Kirkuk in Iraq.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The International Committee of the Red Cross and United Nations agencies are making an assessment of requirements for humanitarian assistance throughout Iraq. We have already made a contribution of £2·5 million to the International Committee of the Red Cross for its work in the Gulf area.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the use of chemical weapons against Iraqi minority groups and others within Iraq; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have no evidence that chemical weapons have been used in the current disturbances. We have made very plain to the Iraqis that we would view any use of such weapons very seriously indeed.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of the Government on providing help to opposition forces in Iraq.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: It is not for us, but for the people of Iraq to choose the Government of their country, although we would have no regrets at the disappearance of Saddam Hussein's regime. We shall maintain our contacts with Iraqi opposition groups.

Israel

Mr. Ron Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received about the curfews imposed on the occupied territories by the Israelis; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: A number of human rights organisations and charities, honourable Members and the public have made representations about the curfews imposed by the Israelis. We welcome the relaxation of the curfews since the end of the conflict.

Food Aid

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs from which EC budget the 350 million ecu of food aid for the Soviet Union, Bulgaria and Romania will be paid; from which budget the United Kingdom's contribution will be paid; and in what proportion.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The 250 mecu food aid for the USSR will be funded from savings in the 1990 agriculture budget. Of the 100 mecu assistance for Romania and Bulgaria, 70 mecu will be funded from savings in the 1990 agriculture budget and from the 1991 budget, 20 mecu for medical assistance from the Poland Hungary Aid for Reconstruction of the Economy budget and 10 mecu from savings being realised in the EC food aid budget because of low world food prices. The volume of food aid to developing countries will not be affected. The United Kingdom share of these amounts will form part of our contribution to Community own resources in line with all other EC budget expenditure.

DEFENCE

Gulf Casualties

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the Government's policy regarding the funding of any adaptations to injured armed forces personnel's homes and any specialist equipment needs they may have because of injuries received in the course of their duties.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Given the demands of service life, individuals are unlikely to remain in the armed forces if their injuries are such that they require specially adapted housing or specialist equipment. Those who are medically discharged because of injuries attributable to service are entitled to the benefits of the armed forces pension scheme and the war pension scheme. Local authorities have the main responsibility for providing any necessary financial assistance to adapt accommodation for disabled people including ex-service personnel who would also be eligible for assistance from the services' charitable organisations.

Hunting

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what services are provided to hunts that are issued licences to hunt on Ministry of Defence land.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The licences issued to hunt on Ministry of Defence land do not include the provision of any services.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the procedure by which hunts may obtain a licence to hunt on Ministry of Defence land.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A hunt may obtain a licence to hunt on Ministry of Defence land by applying to the local defence land agent or the officer commanding the relevant establishment. If the application is approved, the defence land agent will discuss the terms of the licence with the hunt.

HMS Endurance

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the hydrographic output of HMS Endurance in the most recent year for which figures are available; and what other source of Antarctic expertise is available to the Hydrographic Office.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: During the 1989-90 deployment to Antarctica and the south Atlantic, HMS Endurance completed the following hydrographic surveys:

a. Gull harbour (Falkland Islands),
b. Husvik harbour (South Georgia),
c. Neumayer channel to Butler passage (Antarctic peninsula), and
d. Antarctic sound northern part (Antarctic peninsula).

In addition, her helicopters carried out 24 aerial photographic sorties in South Georgia, South Orkney, the Antarctic sound, James Ross island and Anvers island.

Some other national hydrographic offices, notably Argentina, the United States of America, the USSR, Chile, Brazil and Spain, carry out occasional hydrographic surveys in the vicinity of the Antarctic peninsula, and the results are received in the form of published nautical charts. Other information such as passage depth soundings and aerial photography is obtained from the British antarctic survey.

Antarctic

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what military presence is maintained in the Antarctic; and what military presence is maintained by other Antarctic treaty signatory states.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: HMS Endurance deploys to Antarctica each austral summer. Three United Kingdom service personnel also assist the British Antarctic Survey with the servicing of aircraft.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current peacetime role of HMS Endurance; what other naval vessels have been identified which could fulfil that role; and what information he has on the extent to which her capabilities are replicated by the new British Antarctic Survey vessel James Clark Ross.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer that I gave to the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) on 6 March 1991, at column 224, on the duties carried out by HMS Endurance. Consideration is currently being given to the requirement for a replacement vessel, but no decision has yet been taken. Full account will be taken of the capabilities of vessels operated by the British Antarctic Survey.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the meteorological output of HMS Endurance in the most recent year for which figures are available; and what other source of Antarctic expertise is available to the Meteorological Office.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Whilst maintaining a presence in the British Antarctic Territory, HMS Endurance makes contributions to climate data records maintained by the Meteorological Office. During the 1989-90 season, HMS Endurance was in or near Antarctic waters for 100 days, during which time 350 sets of observations were logged and later sent to the Meteorological Office.

Weather observations are also made in the Antarctic by a network of stations operated by international agencies, including the British Antarctic Survey. Real time data from these stations are sent to the Meteorological Office through the World Meteorological Organisation's global telecommunications network. Combined with climatological data, this information is used in weather forecasting and climate prediction work.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the costs of HMS Endurance are allowed for in his Department's latest long-term costings.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is not our practice to give details of the contents of long-term costings.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the annual running costs of HMS Endurance, in manpower and other terms; what is the current (a) service and (b) civilian complement; and what costs are borne on his Department's vote.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The approximate annual running costs of HMS Endurance are £2·4 million, excluding maintenance and refit. The current complement is 142, all of whom are service personnel. The entire cost of running HMS Endurance is met by the Ministry of Defence.

Procurement Executive

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has yet reached a decision on the future of the three airfields owned by the Procurement Executive; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: I hope to be in a position to make an announcement shortly.

Territorial Army Volunteer Reserve

The Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether "Options for Change" will include the role of the Territorial Army Volunteer Reserve and an assessment of the impact on traditional recruitment patterns.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The future, size, role and structure of the Territorial Army are being examined under "Options for Change". However, the Territorial Army will continue to play an essential part in national defence and we do not envisage any changes to the basis of existing recruitment patterns.

The Gulf

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many service women deployed in the Gulf have applied for maternity leave.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No service women applied for maternity leave while deployed in the Gulf. However, two service women in the Army were returned from the Gulf when they were found to be pregnant. One is now on maternity leave.

WE177

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if, when making the decision over a WE177 free-fall nuclear bomb replacement, he intends to also consider a WE177 nuclear depth bomb replacement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I can confirm that our future requirement for nuclear depth bombs is under consideration, but no decisions are expected to be taken in the near future.

HMS Renown

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if it is intended to decommission HMS Renown in the next 12 months.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No.

Shackleton Crash (South Harris)

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps have been taken to implement the recommendations of the report into loss of life in the RAF Shackleton crash on South Harris in 1990; and whether the full review of operating practices to be implemented with additional staff inspections will be carried out in all heavy aircraft squadrons.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: All the recommendations in the board of inquiry's report have been implemented, including the full review of the Shackleton squadron's operating practices. Similar reviews have not been carried out in other RAF squadrons, but lessons learnt from the Shackleton accident and review are being applied more widely across the RAF, where appropriate.

Signals Unit, Woolwich

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current demand for the services carried out by the special signals unit at RAF Woolwich Arsenal.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The work of SSU Woolwich continues to constitute an important part of the tasks carried out by the RAF Signals organisation.

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many staff are currently employed at the special signals unit at RAF Woolwich Arsenal.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: SSU Woolwich currently employs some 180 industrial and non-industrial civilian staff.

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to announce a decision about the future of the special signals unit at RAF Woolwich Arsenal.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces will write to the hon. Member.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Northern Region

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will list his Department's support for companies in the Northern region for (a) exports and (b) preparations for the single European market, since 1987.

Mr. Leigh: Under the enterprise initiative, my Department provides a wide range of assistance to companies. In conjunction with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, we are able to offer exporters access to market information facilities and a range of services designed to meet precisely the requirements of business. Our single market campaign has resulted in over 95 per cent. of businesses being aware of the implications of the single market and up-to-date advice and information is freely available to companies who wish to find out more about specific measures. Through the consultancy initiative, assistance may be available to companies that wish to use consultants to help prepare certain strategic areas of their business for the opportunities offered by exporting and the single market. The schemes operate throughout the United Kingdom, and separate figures are not readily available for take-up in the northern region.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which of his Ministers has been given responsibility for energy use by his Department; and what is his brief regarding energy efficiency.

Mr. Leigh: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has himself assumed responsibility for the Department's overall role in following up last year's Environment White paper, "This Common Inheritance". My noble Friend the Minister for Industry has responsibility for the promotion to business of the importance for competitiveness of environmental factors, including attention to energy efficiency and for energy management in the Department. On the latter, his brief is to achieve a saving of 15 per cent. in the Department's energy bill over the next five years.

Oil Spill Recovery Equipment

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if his Department has carried out any assessment of the total world market for oil spill recovery equipment and technology and of where the United Kingdom ranks in that market.

Mr. Leigh: No such study has been undertaken by my Department. However, one of my Department's executive agencies, Warren Spring laboratory, offers advice and expertise on oil spill clean up to the public and the private sectors. As far as specific opportunities are concerned, I see it as primarily for companies in this sector to assess these themselves and respond accordingly. Clearly, in the present situation the opportunities are significant.

Manufactured Goods

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give for each year since 1979 (a) the United Kingdom share of world trade in manufactured goods and (b) United Kingdom companies' share of domestic consumption in manufactured goods.

Mr. Sainsbury: The United Kingdom's share of main manufacturing countries' exports of manufactured goods is published by the Central Statistical Office in table E1 of "The Monthly Review of External Statistics".

Information on non-United Kingdom based companies' share of domestic consumption in manufactured goods up to 1987 is published in table 12·2 of the CSO's "Annual Abstract of Statistics". Data for more recent periods are available in table 15.10 of the CSO's "Monthly Digest of Statistics". Figures for 1989 and 1990 are not available because of lack of data on principal product sales, but estimates based on available data suggest United Kingdom-based companies' share of consumption of manufactured goods is 62 to 63 per cent. in 1989 and 1990.

All publications referred to in this answer are held in the Library of the House.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 187

SESSION 1990–91

4th March—15th March 1991

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc, between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes and cannot therefore, be used in connection with the daily part or weekly Hansard. For these versions use the Fortnightly Index.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There are, however, the headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one can find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc, under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Mr. Speaker and his deputies are brought together under the heading Speaker's rulings and statements.

Other contributions by Mr. Speaker and his deputies appear under the heading Speaker.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R=first reading, 2R=second reading, Money res=money resolution, Com=Committee stage, Rep=Report stage, 3R=third reading, amendt/amendts=amendment/amendments, *=matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of each daily part or volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
